This will, of course, imply a political "hands-off"; there should be as little political interference in these organisations as possible. So, for example government, as the sole shareholder, might wish to appoint highly competent boards of directors and leave them with all the freedom to operate their ventures successfully.

So that, for example, punishment for financial misappropriations or occupational incompetence and lapses will not be resisted by pressure from politicians, prominent chiefs and others. We have to apply rules and sanctions if our economy should be seen to be heading anywhere.

This principle we have hammered in the last few weeks and we will continue to do so until wisdom prevails.

AGRICULTURE MINISTRY DECREASES OWN DISTRIBUTION ACTIVITIES

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 19 Sep 81 p 1

[Article by C.S. Buabeng]

[Text]

THE Ministry of Agriculture's involvement in the distribution and marketing of farm inputs is being reviewed with the view to reducing its involvement in these areas.

Commercial firms are to be extensively used for the distribution of fertilizer, farm machinery and implements in farming areas where the firms have distribution net-works.

Mr Nelson Yao Agbesi, Minister of Agriculture, who disclosed this yesterday said discussions are already being held with such firms for the implementation of the new scheme.

He said it is in the pursuance of this policy that he directed in last January that the sale of cutlasses should go to the commercial firms.

Over the years, the various departments and units under the Ministry have been actively involved in the purchase and distribution of essential inputs such as fertilizer, seeds, agro-chemicals, breeding stocks, farm machinery, implements and mechanized services.

Consequently, extension services have not been effectively undertaken because of the Ministry's inability to cope with the wide range of activities.

Government therefore is of the view that because of the mounting costs arising out of those operations, commercial firms should be used.

The new scheme is expected to give officers of the Ministry ample opportunity to concentrate on their extension services.

BRIEFS

NEW SHIPS PURCHASED--A multi-purpose cargo ship of the Black Star Line (BSL)--M/V "Sissili River" has made its maiden voyage to Tema. She is laden with 13,000 cubic tonnes of farm machinery and 4,600 cubic tonnes of general cargo from Hamburg, West Germany, all of which will be discharged at Tema. The M/V "Sissili River" which is named after River Sissili in the Upper Region, is one of the four new ships which the Black Star Line acquired from South Korea last year to replace some of the old vessels of the corporation. A statement issued and signed by Mr K. Berko-Asamoah, acting public relations officer of the corporation, said each of the new ships had improved the cost effective performance as compared with the slower and smaller vessels in the fleet. Each of the new ships has a maximum cruising speed of 18 knots, a deadweight of over 16,600 metric tonnes: grain capacity of 22,306 cmb, bale capacity of 21,109 cmb and container-carrying capacity of 500 units including refrigerated containers. The statement said the use of containers "means greater security of cargo, faster loading, discharging and handling of cargo." Meanwhile MTR. "Fanoma", a fishing vessel of the State Fishing Corporation (SFC), has sunk at the main Tema Harbour. A spokesman for the SFC said yesterday that "Fanoma" purchased in July 1965 was on the list of aged fishing vessels earmarked for sale by the corporation. FOOD SELF-SUFFICIENCY BY 1990--Ghana will be self-sufficient in her food requirements by 1990. Dr N.K. Kalitsi, chairman of the West African Economic Research Organization (WAERO) and Executive Director of GHILSIR, UN/ECOWAS Development Programme, made this prediction when he returned to Accra from a WAERO conference in Lome yesterday. He said the practical programme for rapid production initiated by the Ministry of Agriculture is highly commendable. Dr Kalitsi pointed out that the programme sets in motion a veritable motor of agrarian revolution in the country. "The momentum of this systematic approach to food production, coupled with expeditious and effective implementation of the ECOWAS Lagos Plan of Action can make Ghana self-sufficient in food requirements by 1990," he said. Dr Kalitsi said consistent with the ideals of the Lagos Plan of Action, GHILSIR had embarked on mobilization of the rural youth for farming and organizing them into producer co-operatives with the right incentive and assistance for increased production. The chairman noted that more than 1,500 farmers and fishermen together with 225 technocrats are working with the organization. GHILSIR, he said, is also undertaking relief operations by providing food and clothing to the oncho-affected areas and isolated villages where life is unbearable to the rural dweller. OAU MEETING BOYCOTT 'SUBVERSIVE'--Mr Johnny Hansen, chairman of the Kwame Nkrumah Revolutionary Guards, has discribed the government's stand to boycott the summit of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in Libya, next year, as "subversive" to the principles of the organization. Contributing to a symposium in Accra to commemorate the fourth anniversary of the death of Mr Steve Bantu Biko, a south African Black activist, he asked the Limann Administration to explain to the whole continent what Libya had done to displease the government and people of Ghana. Mr Hansen said there was no justification for Ghana to refuse taking part in the OAU summit in Libya because majority of leaders who attended the last meeting in Kenya, agreed in principles to attend the next summit. He asked the government not to turn Ghana into a begger nation by "acceding to the pressures and ideas of President Reagan of America blindly". Mr Hansen regretted "why Ghana should be the leading nation in the anti-Libyan campaign" and questioned whether it was doing that in order to attract foreign investment and exploitation. He told the gathering that it was not Libya that was shedding African blood but the Reagan Administration with the tacit support of other reactionary regimes in Africa. Mr Hansen said the imperialist forces, led by the U.S. and other NATO allies were all behind that "dastardly and cowardly act" of aggression against Angola. FRG AGRICULTURAL LOAN--The Federal Republic of Germany has granted Ghana $45m for the establishment of the Volta Regional Development Agricultural Project (VORADEP) to provide farm machinery and high yielding seedlings to farmers in the region. Mr Mike Atsutse, Member of Parliament for East Dayi who disclosed this said the company will also construct roads to farming areas where there are no accessible roads. Mr Atsutse who was addressing a durbar of chiefs and people of Ve-Kolenu to mark their yam festival celebration, said VORADEP will also sink wells to provide water for the people. The MP expressed concern about the mad rush of Ghanaians to 'Agege' to undertake menial jobs while virgin forests lay fallow. [Excerpt] [Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 17 Sep 81 p 1]

RELATIONS WITH ISRAEL MAY BE ON MEND

Monrovia THE SUNDAY PEOPLE in English 4 Oct 81 pp 1, 8

[Text] Is Liberia thinking of re-establishing diplomatic relations with Israel?

This is the question high in diplomatic circles here and in other African capitals following Foreign Minister G. Baccus Matthews' speech before the United Nations General Assembly last week when he urged African States to review their relations with Israel.

The Liberian Foreign Minister said that since Cairo had now effected "a modus vivendi with Tel Aviv", African countries that had severed diplomatic relations with Israel after the 1972 war with Israel should now reconsider their policies towards re-establishing ties with Israel.

In that war Israel crossed the Suez Canal and occupied portion of Egypt in Africa. All African states holding relations with Israel broke off relations in obedience to an OAU Mandate.

But Israel and Egypt have now signed a peace treaty, have established diplomatic relations and Israel has not only withdrawn from Egypt West of Suez but is soon to hand over all the territory in the Sinai.

Observers here say that Liberia may likely take the lead in re-establishing diplomatic relations with Israel in the wake of the Foreign Minister's plea.

This move is not designed to radically change the Liberian Government's foreign policy, because in the same speech Matthews reiterated the PRC Government's support for Egypt's President Anwar Sadat's effort for peace in that region, and pledged the government solidarity with all "struggling" peoples of southern Africa who are resisting exploitation, discrimination and suppression.

On the home front Matthews told the United Nations that the appointment of a Constitutional Commission to draft a new Constitution for Liberia was a manifestation of the PRC Government's desire to return the country to civilian rule.

DEFENSE MINISTER WANTS IMPROVED BORDER SECURITY

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 28 Sep 81 p 1

[Text] Defense Minister Major-General Albert S. Karpeh, after a tour of some strategic check points along Liberia-Guinea and Ivory Coast borders in Nimba County, says there is a lack of logistics for the joint security at these borders.

According to LINA, the Defense Minister expressed concern adding that there is a need to improve security facilities at the borders. The Minister said he was also displeased over what he called poor housing facilities for soldiers in Nimba County.

Minister Karpeh told soldiers at the barracks that government would continue to provide adequate living quarters for them, but warned them against harassing citizens and foreign residents.

Defense Minister Karpeh and party, including Assistant Minister for Civil Works Captain Jackson Paye, the construction officer of the U.S. Military Mission to Liberia, Major Jack Weber, and Director of Staff, Brigadier-General Robert G. Saye, also visited the Blolehwee border and the Loguatuo custom check point.

Lt. Samuel Wonlue, Detachment Commander at Lamco, Yekepa, welcomed and escorted Minister Karpeh to Blolehwee and expressed gratitude to Superintendent Farngalo and Minister Karpeh for their demonstration of concern for the welfare of soldiers.

He appealed to Minister Karpeh for additional manpower, transportation and improved communication links along the borders.

Minister Karpeh and party left Sanniquellie Sunday for Zwedru, Grand Gedeh County to continue their inspection of army facilities now under construction.

GOVERNMENT LEADERS DEBATE PRESS FREEDOM

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 1 Oct 81 pp 1, 6, 8

[Text]

Information Minister Lt. Col. Gray D. Allison Tuesday appealed that the Ministry of Information be used as the "Clearing House" for stories on government policies and activities, but Vice Head of State Major Gen. J. Nicholas Podier, Jr. contends this interferes with freedom of the press.

The Ministry of Information, based on a mandate from the Head of State, issued a memorandum this week stating "with the Executive Mansion as the only exception, all releases and announcements from government Ministries and Agencies must be first approved by the Ministry of Information before they are broadcast on radio and published in newspapers."

The memorandum further stated that "releases and announcements on and about government Ministries and Agencies taken directly to the media must be rejected and sent back to the Ministry of Information for scrutiny."

Upon his return from the United States where he led government's delegation on negotiations with Lamco, the PRC Co-Chairman said press freedom should not be interfered with in revolutionary Liberia.

According to semi-official radio station ELBS, the Vice Head of State said the PRC Government will uphold the principles of free press at all times-for the promotion of government policies and programs.

General Podier disagreed that the scrutiny of press releases should be the sole responsibility of the Ministry of Information.

He said the Ministry of Information should provide means for effective dissemination of government's policies abroad.

General Podier said this could improve government's image to foreign investors.

He however appealed to local and foreign journalists to be factual and objective in covering events here.

In an interview with BBC Tuesday, Minister Allison denied that calling for the Ministry of Information as the "Clearing House" interferes with press freedom.

On focus on Africa, he said the move was aimed at creating an atmosphere for factual and objective reporting of national events. This, he said, was far from censorship.

During a meeting with local journalists, Minister Allison said the idea of a "Clearing House" is meant to arrest the flow to conflicting statements from government officials on government's policies and programs. He said government must speak with one voice.

He said his appeal was to ensure that the Liberian public was educated about the policies and programs of government. He said further that the dissemination of conflicting information about government's activities in the media was dangerous to national development.

"All government pronouncements excluding the Executive Mansion, must first be approved by the Information Ministry before they are broadcast on radio and published in the newspapers", according to Decree 46 creating the Ministry of Information.

Pronouncements about government emanating from government Ministries and Agencies

if taken directly to the media must be rejected and sent back to the Information Ministry for coordination purpose before publication, Minister Allison said.

He said "all public affairs programs,produced by Government Ministries and Agencies must be pre-recorded and broadcast only following coordination and approval by the Ministry of Information.

Minister Allison However, clarified that the new system was in "no way press censorship" since the government's pronouncements did not refer to "routine announcements and news reports" rather to information that could affect "major development policies."

He cited, for example, the increase in the price of gasoline which, he said, affects the lives of the Liberian people and as such needed "full explanation" to prepare the Liberian people long ore the announcement was made.

"We will not sit on any information once it is true" Minister Allison asserted, adding, "we want to release the truth to our people to understand national issues".

On the question of whether the Information Ministry serving as a "clearing house" was an obstacle to the PRC Government's commitment to freedom of the press, Minister Allison said "no" and explained that "government information must be coordinated for maximum effect".

The Information Minister stressed that the new system was intended to make Government Ministries and Agencies "speak with one voice" and to avoid conflicting information, which, we said, could create doubts in the minds of the people.

He assured the public relations officers that such meetings would continue and hoped that their deliberations would bear "fruitful results".

PRC Decree Number 46 is sued here last June, empowers the Ministry of Information to "select, in accordance with prevailing policies, subjects to be broadcast or covered by news stories, feature articles, slides, films, filmstrips, postcards, calendars, video cassettes and other means of communications for internal and external distribution.

Decree 46 states that the Information Ministry should "maintain close contacts with all ministries and agencies of government, and all national, private institutions and organization for the purpose of serving as a facilitator of their communication programs".

It further empowers the Ministry of Information to "counter unfavourable propaganda by disseminating a wide range of informative material that presents a true and accurate picture of Liberia's image, its aims and aspirations, policies, programs and institutions and progress to a world-wide audience.

The Decree said the Information Ministry should" maintain contacts with all Liberian Diplomatic and Consular Missions abroad, organize regional information offices in the political sub-divisions of Liberia and plan, execute, promote, coordinate, supervise and direct information programs and projects for these missions and regional centers in pursuance of the national and international objective of Liberia".

According to the Decree, the Information Ministry shall "perform such other functions as may from time to time be assigned by the Head of State.

HIGH TAXES WORRY LOCAL MANUFACTURERS

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 1 Oct 81 p 8

[Article by Napoleon A. Teage]

[Text]

High taxes on locally manufactured commodities is a disincentive for the expansion of the manufacturing industry here, local manufacturers complained Wednesday.

The manufacturers, during a meeting with Commerce Minister Capt. E. Sumo Jones at the Monrovia City Hall Wednesday, said the local manufacturing industry could be more viable and revenue generating provided current taxes are lowered.

A local businessman pointed out that international quality cigarettes could be produced locally but, he said, the present tax structure discourages that.

The businessman told Minister Jones that a branch of his company in Freetown, Sierra Leone, produces nearly 99 percent of all cigarettes in that country and provides annually some $25 million in revenue to the Sierra Leonean Government due to the incentive provided to local manufacturers there.

Assistant Commerce Minister for Industry, Isaac Randolph, speaking at the meeting, admitted that the current pricing structure by the Commerce Ministry does not provide incentives for local production.

Mr. Randolph said there is a need for a provision that would give incentives to people wishing to invest in the manufacturing and other industries in the country.

Minister Sumo Jones, however, noted that products manufactured here are of a low quality and cannot compete with similar products on the world market. "These products do not meet international standards inspite of the current incentives granted local manufacturers," he pointed out.

On the availability of locally manufactured commodities on the market, especially in the rural areas, Minister Jones told the producers that his Ministry intends to ensure that manufacturing industries devise effective distribution system.

He commended the United States Trading Company for operating a beverage distribution system which, according to the Minister, is one of the best in the country especially in the rural areas.

The sales manager at USTC, Mr. Samuel H.Shokumbi, who represented his company at the meeting, assured Minister Jones that USTC will continue to provide the kind of services that will meet the requirements laid down by the Commerce Ministry.

Mr. Shokumbi thanked Capt. Jones for his efforts in soliciting first hand information from manufacturing and other businesses concerning their problems in order to work out possible solutions that would be in the interest of both government and business establishments.

Wednesday's meeting was attended by representatives of the Monrovia Tobacco Company, USTC, Monrovia Breweries Inc., among others.

Meanwhile, Minister Jones has stressed the need for storing adequate spare parts by automobile dealers in the country.

Minister Jones was addressing car importers and garage owners in the country Tuesday, outlined difficulties which customers have been facing.

He said these range from poor services, sub-standard performance and delays in repairing vehicles.

He warned dealers to stop using Liberia as a "dumping ground" for cheap vehicles. Some cars, he said, were not made for the tropics but yet still some dealers imported them and ended up with no spare parts, according to LINA

SECURITY AGENCIES URGED TO REVIEW OPERATIONS

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 5 Oct 81 p 6

[Text]

A top law enforcement officer has said it was time for the various security agencies of government to take a critical look at their operations in order to restore public confidence.

The law enforcement officer, Captain Patrick M. Minikon, who is National Security Advisor to the Head of State, made the statement Friday at the National Police Training Academy in Paynesville where 37 recruits of the Special Security Service (SSS) received certificates at the end of a four-month basic training course in VIP protection.

Captain Minikon explained that within the past months, the nation had witnessed a "shocking situation" in which law enforcement officers were accused of criminal activities.

The loss of public confidence, Captain Minikon said, "had caused serious damage to the profession and had imposed an extra and unnecessary handicap on all honest law enforcement officers."

He told the graduates that the professional status of law enforcement was at stake and mentioned that corruption and inefficiency should be stamped out at all cost.

Captain Minikon said this could be done "through careful initial selection of applicants and an adequate training program throughout the period of employment."

He used the occasion to lash out at those who enter the profession with varied intentions and goals thereby seeking promotions through blind ambition.

Captain Minikon advised the graduates to place the interest of the state, justice and fair play above the quest for gratuities or pecuniary gains.

He further pointed out that when security officers concentrate on receiving gifts and money in the performance of their duties, they would develop the craving to peddle information or intelligence.

This, he said, could lead to the obstruction of the process, molestation of citizens and eventually damage the code of ethics of the profession and the image of the country.

Presenting the certificates to the honorees on behalf of SSS Director T.Gbeku Wright, the Assistant Director for Operation, Samuel P. Ajavon, congratulated them for their attainment and hoped that they would contribute meaningfully to the improvement of the special security service.

The program was attended by top security brass, relatives and friends of the honorees. - LINA

RURAL FOLK NOT TO BLAME FOR RICE PROBLEM

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 1 Oct 81 p 4

[Editorial: "Eating Foreign Rice: Who is Responsible?"]

[Text] SPECIAL MILITARY TRIBUNAL Co-Chairman A.V.W. Gayflor's suggestion that the sale of 'Pusawa' be restricted in rural areas and that any resident of Bopolu found buying Pusawa should be fined $100 are ideas with good intentions but they contain serious pitfalls.

COL. GAYFLOR, LIKE many other patriotic Liberians, wants to the nation self-sufficient in its staple food—rice. The question, however, is how? In answering this question, several socio-political and economic factors and variables ought to be taken into account.

THE CURRENT "BELIEF" that rural people contribute to our dependence on imported rice probably has some basis but it also has some illusionary aspects. To say that depriving rural dwellers imported rice will be an incentive for them to produce more rice is unfortunately incorrect; this is a dangerous way of assuming what is to be that cannot be.

PERHAPS IF THE rural dwellers were given the same forums to give their opinions, they could tell their urban country men that items such as palm oil, pepper, vegetables, etc. come from rural Liberia. Those who blame the rural people for food shortages could be told that without the productive application of their labor, the city people would be without these necessary items.

THE FEAR OF food shortages in many Third World countries, according to UN, findings has serious grounds. The inability of the Third World to feed itself is an issue that has mounting socio-political implications. Like oil, food is a viable political weapon that can be used by those that have it in order to achieve set objectives.

WHAT MANY DEVELOPING countries have done is to mobilize their entire populations for agricultural revolutions. The task of feeding the nation cannot be left to one Ministry or one sector. It is a task that requires mobilizing the people into an army of farmers.

GIVEN THE MEAGRE efficiency of many bureaucracies in Africa, this task requires the total utilization of nation's bureaucratic resources.

THE GRAVITY OF the problem denies quick "solutions" that will backfire. It is necessary to know why, for example, a rural person, with his minute financial resources, prefers to buy Pasawa rather than farm. Perhaps the theory of comparative advantage is at work.

LET'S BE CAREFUL and thoughtful how we offer solutions to the food problem.

WITHDRAWAL FROM MEDICAL ASSOCIATION--The Medical Associations of Ghana and Liberia will quit the World Medical Association (WMA) if South Africa is allowed to rejoin, the Anti-Apartheid Movement said in London Wednesday. The WMA Council recommended the readmission of South Africa which left the association in 1976, along with the admission of Transkei, South Africa's Bantustan "homeland" which is recognised only by South Africa. The Anti-Apartheid Movement said if the international medical community voted to admit South Africa and Transkei at the WMA conference in Lisbon next week, other third world countries could walk out. The Anti-Apartheid Movement is also applying pressure on the World Health Organisation (WHO) to withdraw the status of the WMA as a W.H.O. Consultative Body if South Africa is admitted. The London Times reported that a memorandum drawn up by Black South African Health Associations was being used to influence WMA members. The memorandum said whites had far more medical facilities that blacks and accused South African doctors of failing to abide by a Geneva Declaration of 1978 adopted by the WMA which said all doctors must put the health of their patients first without regard for race, nationality or religion, the report said. ACCORD WITH LIBYA SIGNED

[ANTA Report: "Libya-Malagasy Accord Signed"]

[Text] Tripoli. The working visit to Libya by the Malagasy chief of state was concluded with the signing of a cooperation agreement between Major Jalloud and President Ratsiraka on 3 September.

The agreement, which becomes effective as of November 1981, is a consummation of Libyan-Malagasy friendship.

The ceremony was attended by C. S. R. Jaotombo Ferdinand and Ministers Christian Remi Richard and Rarivoson Justin.

On the same day, ratification instruments were exchanged on the establishment of the Holding Company. This will lead to the organization of a mixed Libyan-Malagasy trade and industry company. Previously, President Qadhafi had received his Malagasy counterpart at the Green House in Tripoli. Their talk lasted one and one-half hours.

Mrs Celine Ratsiraka was Mrs Qadhafi's dinner guest on 2 September. The two ladies discussed the role of Libyan and Malagasy women in development.

Solidarity with the Libyan People

At the end of this conference of international solidarity with the Libyan people, the Malagasy head of state stated in Tripoli on the evening of 31 August:

"I will be brief but please know that anything I am about to say is from the heart, so that it will be sincere.

"To begin with, I congratulate Comrade Mu'amm Qadhafi for his initiative in setting up a national center for struggle against imperialism, colonialism, neocolonialism, Zionism and racism. You know that imperialism is not a myth. Imperialism does exist. It is no coincidence, it is no pure and simple coincidence that imperialism is aware of the fact that Libya is currently the champion of proletarian internationalism against imperialism. Imperialism knows that Libya is helping virtually all the national liberation movements throughout the world generously, selflessly and in a revolutionary spirit. It is no accident that today we find here Comrade Ortega from Nicaragua, in Latin American, Comrade Yasser Arafat, from the Middle East and the PLO, a representative of the martyred people of Lebanon and, if you allow me, myself as the representative of Africa.

"Several years ago Arab comrades asked us the following: 'For the sake of solidarity with the Arab world and solidarity with the Arab and African people of Egypt, break diplomatic relations with Israel.' We broke diplomatic relations with Israel despite the treason committed by some, and the hesitations, evasions and hypocritical behavior of others. Please know that in Madagascar we shall always remain loyal and will always support the Arab people of Palestine until their final victory. Imperialism has mounted an attack, an aggression in all directions. Everyone knows and so do we, better than anyone else, that, encouraged by imperialism, South Africa has committed an aggression against the fraternal people of Angola. You must know that imperialism provoked the Arab and African people of Libya in the Gulf of Syrta. You must know that imperialism is mounting provocations against North Korea.

"You must know that Zionism, encouraged, aided and armed by imperialism, attacked Iraq and Lebanon without a declaration of war. You must know that we, in Madagascar, the Malagasy people and their revolution, will always struggle against imperialism, Zionism, apartheid and neocolonialism, together with the Arab people of Libya.

"In 1963 I went to Lebanon. I was a young naval officer. I saw the ruins of Balbek but, next to them, I saw an attractive country, I saw Beirut, a hospitable city. I do not know whether I would recognize Lebanon and Beirut if I were to go back there, because of Zionism and imperialism. This is to tell you that it is not accidental that we are meeting here today, on the eve of 1 September, the Libyan national holiday. We are with you until ultimate victory.

"Imperialism has supplied itself with means with which to pursue its policy. We, the revolutionaries and progressive people the world over, must also give our policy the means for action. Your historical decision of creating a front, a center for international struggle against the common enemy known as imperialism, neocolonialism, racism and Zionism, is a historical and symbolic decision supported by the Democratic Republic of Madagascar."

REPORT ON CMD SESSION

[ANTA Report: "Marriage Between State Companies and Marketing Cooperatives"]

[Text] "Efficient utilization of road security centers and interventions by the trains-rural security regiment," were the items on the agenda of the second ordinary session of the Military Committee for Development, which was officially inaugurated yesterday morning at Tsimbazaza Palace, in the presence of Col Desire Rakotoarijaona, prime minister and head of government. The meeting, chaired by Col Edouard Rabeony, who is the president of that institution, was attended by Lucien Xavier Michel Andrianarahinjaka, president of the People's National Assembly, surrounded by the members of the standing bureau of the ANP [People's National Assembly], President Tilahy Robert (HCC), and many members of the Supreme Revolutionary Council and of the government, as well as other civilian and military personalities, including Retired Brig Gen Jilles Andriamahazo.

Decree No 81-215 of the president of the republic, summoning the CMD [Military Committee for Development] for its second ordinary session was read at the opening of the session by assistant speaker Cap Iandro Fenomanana. This was followed by speeches delivered by the president of the institution and by the prime minister and head of government.

President Edouard Rabeony began by welcoming and thanking the personalities for their presence, thus emphasizing the importance of this institution of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar. He then presented a short analysis of the two items on the agenda on which the CMD must submit suggestions. Rabeony said that the People's Armed Forces have already been at work on one of the items. However, since the time had come to draw the balance and engage in self-criticism, shortcomings must be repaired. In military terminology, it is a question of eventually adjusting the fire, naturally in order to hit the targets set by the Malagasy socialist revolution.

The revolutionary system entrusted the operation of road security centers to the gendarmerie by presidential decree dated 6 September 1976. What has been accomplished and what has not been accomplished over the past 5 years, Colonel Rabeony asked, stating that these centers are of major importance, for they protect human lives, and that, according to the revolutionary charter, man is the target of our socialism.

As to the train regiment, it was set up by the revolutionary system only on 15 June 1979. It is therefore quite new, Rabeony said. Nevertheless, it could be said that its mission had been carried out in the area of "transportation." However, since the country is big and the villages scattered, the problems of public safety have not been entirely resolved, for the revolution cannot progress without effective public safety.

Colonel Rabeony did not omit thanking the two military members of the CMD who had left the institution because of retirement.

Five Fruitful Years

He was followed by the prime minister and head of government who began by offering to these militant members in uniform the fraternal greetings of President Didier Ratsiraka, the noted leader of the Malagasy people. He did not conceal the satisfaction of the revolutionary system with the suggestions submitted by the CMD over the past 5 years. He expressed the wish that such cooperation go on.

The head of government then successively discussed problems related to food supply, the gathering of produce and public safety. On the last point, Desire Rakotoarijaona pointed out that last year, in 1980, the phenomenon of cattle rustling reappeared. This has always existed but, this time, it involves assassinations whose purpose is to discourage the population. In order to eradicate this evil, the revolutionary system has decided to mount an extensive operation specifically in the areas of Fianarantsoa, Toliara, Mahajanga and the midwestern section of Antananarivo, and operation which consists of a thorough search to be conducted in these areas. However, the head of government stated, the phenomenon will reappear after this operation, which must take 1 to 2 months, has been carried out.

As you have already emphasized in your reports, the prime minister added, one of the reasons for this phenomenon is precisely the inadequacy or even the lack of jobs and therefore the existence of unemployment. The cooperation of all ministerial departments is more than necessary if this problem is to be resolved, for which reason the revolutionary system has set up a national committee for struggle against cattle rustling. Cattle rustling has been declining ever since mobile quarters have been set up where charge has been assumed by decentralized collectives, particularly in the various areas of Fianarantsoa, Toliara and Mahajanga faritany. Actually, it is in that spirit that the revolutionary system decided to assign the exploitation of 20 hectares per firaisana to the mobile forces which will be technically assisted by ministerial departments. As to the marketing of the cattle, the system will be updated and improved by introducing sales receipts and mandatory passports. The decentralized collectives will be informed of these innovations.

The prime minister and head of government then discussed problems of food supply and produce collection. The Malagasy government, he said, has made tremendous efforts in this area. Nevertheless, the population is still having difficulties. The international economic crisis is one of the reasons for this. However, we are still experiencing the aftermath of the colonial structure. Our economy largely depends on the outside. We are not manufacturing spare parts and we have insufficient raw materials. The head of government emphasized that this dependence will last for a while.

On the other hand, Rakotoarijaona said, our food production remains insufficient. Furthermore, we are faced with a galloping demographic problem, whereas the big powers of the year 2000 will be countries which will be able to feed their populations first and export foodstuffs to other nations, he noted.

Difficulties are inevitable in the course of building a socialist society, the head of government said, and in order to achieve final victory, we need enthusiasm and steady work....

One of the solutions to this problem was the assumption of responsibility and the enhancement of the awareness of decentralized collectives, particularly in the struggle against illegal price increases. The prime minister also spoke of the reappearance on the market of domestically manufactured soap. This initiative must be encouraged by the revolutionary system, he pointed out. On the subject of the soap, the head of government emphasized that locally manufactured soap had vanished from the market after the war and that the economic structure at that time was in favor of soap imports.

The head of government then expressed his pleasure at the efforts made by the revolutionary system in economic matters, such as the establishment of new produce storing centers, improvements in the transportation system and nationalization of key economic sectors.

These efforts, the speaker emphasized, were carried out jointly by the revolutionary power and the decentralized collectives.

He then emphasized the importance of the activities of socialist marketing cooperatives or KPSV. There are 280 such cooperatives in the country or an average of two per fivondronana.

With a view to mastering the collection of produce, the prime minister said, the revolutionary system has taken other steps which authorize state companies to name their partners who will be responsible to them; in the decentralized collectives, where KPSV have been established, the latter will be in charge of this operation.

The KPSV will be increased in accordance with the economic development plan. Regional food supply committees will be set up, chaired by the chairmen of executive committees of faritany, he concluded.

Let us emphasize that the CMD, which is the fifth institution of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar, is a consultative organ whose opinion is required concerning any national defense and economic and social development program.

To these effect, it is participating in the formulation of economic and social development projects whose implementation has been entrusted to the people's Armed Forces.

ETHNIC SYSTEM DRAWS CRITICISM OF MIXED COUPLES

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 7 Oct 81 p 4

[Text]

ETHNIC CLASSIFICATION in terms of SWA's interim government system has drawn severe criticism from mixed-marriage couples in the Territory.

"The ethnic second-tier government system has been designed to protect minority group interests. It also crushes individual choice," a German-speaking Windhoek resident, Mr Uwe Sack said in an interview with Sapa.

Mr and Mrs Sack are one of the Territory's estimated 100 mixed couples who wedded after the abolition in 1977 of the Mixed Marriages Act. The measure was rescinded by the first Administrator General of SWA, Mr Justice M T Steyn.

Today, Mr Sack (classified White) and Mrs Sack (classified Coloured) have two children.

"I pay income tax to the Administration for Whites. Yet I am not entitled to enrol my children in a White school or to take them to a hospital for Whites," Mr Sack said.

Education to secondary school level and hospital services are among the Government functions resorting under the jurisdiction of the ethnic representative authorities.

11 GROUPS

In terms of Proclamation AG 8, which serves as a type of interim constitution for the Territory, there are 11 ethnic groups in SWA.

They are: Owambo, White, Damara, Herero, Baster, Caprivian, Coloured, Nama, Kavango, Bushman and Tswana.

Legislation governing the issuing of identity documents requires Namibians to be registered according to their ethnig groups.

Mr Sack said expectations had been around by talk of "a twelfth group" who would simply be called "Namibians" and administered by the first-tier authority.

"But the twelfth group, to whom we really belong, does not exist," Mr Sack said.

"We do not want to be part of any of the other group. If I give my wholehearted support to any single ethnic group, I will be insulting my wife.

Mr Sack's views are echoed by a Windhoek businessman who is running a publishing concern but does not want to be identified.

"We want the freedom to be classified either with a particular ethnic group or Namibians."

The businessman, a British subject, is married to a Coloured woman from Stellenbosch in the Cape. The couple have two children.

"Preferably, there should be no classification at all. We want to be Namibians," he said.

"The preoccupation with ethnicity is wrong and costly for such a small population."

Mr Sack said ethnic classification prevented SWA's population of one million to foster a national identity, and divided families.

"I should be able to bring up my children in the belief that they are first and foremost Namibians," he said.

REVERSED

"Instead, the situation is reversed – the first loyalty is to the ethnic group and then to the national state."

Mr Sack said in his view it would be impossible for an American Negro or a South African Zulu, for instance, to acquire SWA citizenship, because they could not be classified among any of the existing ethnic groups.

If a White should marry a Herero and they had children, Mr Sack said, three ethnic authorities would be governing one household.

Along with the abolition in 1977 of the Prohibition of Mixed Marriages Act, Mr Justice Steyn revoked a section in the Immorality Act dealing with sexual intercourse between Whites and members of other races.

Mixed couples who emerged in Windhoek's streets after the repeal of the legislation found themselves subjects of harassment and even assault.

NO HOSTILITY

Asked whether attitudes had since changed towards mixed couples, Mr Sack said that since the beginning of the year he had detected no hostility to mixed couples.

"Of course, in country towns one may still attract the odd stare."

Mr Sack said embarrassing and inconvenient barriers still occurred. Some doctors maintained separate waiting rooms and he and his wife had to wait separately before taking their children in for medical examination.

The Windhoek publisher said his family had encountered "nothing but goodwill and acceptance at all levels."

"Of course, we do not got to places where exposure is ill-advised."

SENSITIVE

Mixed couples were still a sensitive issue for many people and it was best "to avoid situations that could provoke confrontation."

He added: "a mixed marriage is a very personal choice.

"People should not rush into it for the sake of integrating."

Cultural differences and differences of approach even to everyday problems added to marital strains in a mixed marriage, he said.

"Integration or segregation should not be enforced.

"Neither should the people of SWA be seen as a snooker set, with different colours and different values." – Sapa

OIL CUSTOMERS OFFERED $1.50 PER BARREL REBATE

AB212142 Paris AFP in French 1805 GMT 21 Oct 81

[Text] London, 21 Oct (AFP)--Nigeria has just offered its oil customers a temporary and supplementary rebate of $1.50 per barrel, retroactively to 1 October, under the conditions that the bills will be settled within a period of 30 days, it was learned Wednesday from London oil circles.

Of late, Nigeria granted its customers up to 120-days payment period, the same sources say.

This new reduction, which is in addition to the $4 rebate introduced last August following the failure of the last OPEC conference, brings Nigeria's current oil price to $34.5 per barrel, which relatively is slightly lower than the price of Saudi oil. Although in fact, Saudi oil sells for $32 per barrel, Nigerian oil, because of its superior quality and its proximity to the big North American and European consumer centers, is generally sold at a $3 premium.

The OPEC countries are to meet at the end of next week in Geneva to try and reach a unified price level which will bring up the Saudi oil to $34 per barrel.

Nigeria would, on its part, bring its basic price down from the present $40 to probably $37 (including the quality and geographical proximity premium) and would abolish all its reductions.

In oil circles, the decision by Nigeria to communicate the supplementary reduction by telex to its customers a week before the Geneva extraordinary conference is evidence either of a desire to speed up the settlement of bills to meet a pressing foreign exchange need or a desire to put pressure on some still recalcitrant OPEC members to pressure them to adopt a positive attitude in Geneva this time.

Campaign To End Attacks

AB220750 Lagos NAN in English 0705 GMT 22 Oct 81

[Report by Lawrence Ukwu]

[Text] New York, 21 Oct (NAN)--Nigeria has called for an international campaign aimed at educating people all over the world on the need to curb criminal and offensive attacks on diplomatic personnel.

The call was made in New York today by the representative of Nigeria in the sixth committee of the UN General Assembly which deals with legal matters, Gboko Yough, during a session of the committee which examined attacks on members of the diplomatic corps in parts of the world.

Mr Yough said that such a campaign would go a long way toward exposing to all people the dangers and threat they posed to world peace by perpetrating acts of vandalism on diplomats. Mr Yough further recommended that countries that continually violated legal rules on diplomatic immunity should be black-listed with the purpose of taking drastic measures against them.

The Nigerian representative assured members of the committee that Nigeria would continue to uphold the Vienna conventions of 1961 and have been no breaches of those conventions on the Nigerian soil and no Nigerian representative or property has been the subject of willful attack.

According to UN official records made available to the News Agency of Nigeria, NAN, in New York today, last year there were 400 incidents involving breaches of diplomatic immunity in about 60 countries. According to the records, the most tragic incident occurred in October last year, when the Turkish consul general in Sydney and another official of the Turkish consulate in Sydney were assassinated by two terrorists who escaped on a motorcycle.

The governor told a five-man delegation of the Nigerian Enterprises Promotion Board which called on him on Tuesday that such an arrangement would save the nation from the intricacies of international oil politics. Chief Okilo also believed that more profit would be made if private companies were allowed to run the industry. The governor complained about some companies based in the state which were undermining the interest of his administration. He warned that his government would not tolerate a situation which would prevent it from participating in ventures in which it had interests. MDP'S GAMBIAN CONFEDERATION REJECTION

Paris AFRICA AFP in English 2 Oct 81 p 16

[Text]

DAKAR, October 1 - Senegal's opposition People's Democratic Movement (MDP) said here yesterday it disapproved of a confederation with Gambia proposed by Gambian leader Dawda Jawara after Senegalese troops in August crushed an attempted coup against him.

The MDP, a Socialist self-management party headed by former Premier Mamadou Dia, said the confederation would be the result of force of arms.

It would pose political and technical problems concerning monetary zones and freedom of movement, and would also increase Senegal's burdens inopportunely at a time when it was itself already faced with serious economic and financial problems, the party said.

On internal affairs, the MDP condemned police raids in the past few weeks on members of another opposition group, the Democratic Party (Labour-Oriented). The authorities' action amounted to "political terrorism", the MDP charged.

(The Democratic Party has reported the interrogation of 33 of its activists around the country, with eight of them still allegedly detained and subjected to torture). (A.F.P.)

COUNTRY REPORTEDLY ENJOYS POLITICAL STABILITY

Nairobi THE STANDARD in English 12 Sep 81 p 4

[Text] APPROACHING Lome by road across the marshy plains of neighbouring Ghana, the 30-storey Second of Februry Hotel and Conference Centre suddenly appears on the horizon.

With its 52 Presidential Suites, an equal number of ministerial apartments, several restaurants and a 200-seat theatre, it is one of the most luxurious hotels in West Africa. It is also the lynchpin in the government's policy of making this small country a major centre of tourism and international conference trade.

Diplomats say this one-party State enjoys a primary ingredient for successful tourism: political stability.

Weekend tourists from the economic and social turmoil of Togo's neighbours, Ghana and Nigeria, flock to Lome as an oasis in a troubled region. The President, General Gnassingbe Eyadema, who led a military coup in 1967, has held power for more than 14 years with the help of a strong police force.

Innumerable portraits of the Togolese leader, blown up to billboard size or miniaturised on the lapel badges worn by many Togolese, project a shrewdly-conceived image of benevolent paternalism.

In Togo, open criticism of the General is not tolerated and the Togolese know that the cost of arousing the strict disciplinary instincts of their leader can be high. The government argues that the General's firm grip keeps the country on a steady course toward greater development.

Officials point out there has been a certain liberalisation of the government with the election of a 67-member National Assembly, and the passage of a Constitution in December, 1979. At the same time, General Eyadema was re-elected as the only candidate of Togo's sole political party, the Togolese People's Rally with slightly less than 100 per cent of the vote.

Togo's National Assembly was dissolved and the old Constitution abolished after General Eyadema took power. Diplomats say the Assembly's 67 deputies, chosen by the party, have shown few signs of exercising any real independence from the executive. Assembly sessions are held in the national party headquarters.

Western diplomats say Togo's ambitious programme of building hotels throughout the country has a good chance of success and represents a reasonable option for a country with no known reserves of strategic metals and considerable natural attractons.

But the diplomats are less sanguine about the prospects of the Second of February Hotel, built at a cost of 35 billion C.F.A. francs (120 million dollars) or half Togo's 1980 budget. Sources close to the government say the construction of the hotel was a gamble at attracting the permanent seat of the Organisation of African Unity (O.A.U.) to Lome.

But 18 months after the hotel's opening, the O.A.U. remains firmly installed in Addis Ababa and the hotel's occupancy rate is still only a fraction of capacity.

Lome's older hotels have reached occupancy levels of 65-80 per cent, the government says. The Second of February was clearly the biggest gamble in an ambitious investment programme which left this country of 2.5 million people with a debt of about one billion dollars.

When the price of Togo's primary export, phosphates, quadrupled in 1974, the government seized the chance to expand the narrow base of an economy which depended on phosphates, cocoa and coffee for 90 per cent of its exports.

Heavy spending continued even after phosphate prices slumped in 1976. The fruits of the spending spree have been prolonged economic difficulties.

External debts have had to be rescheduled twice, in 1979 and again in February of this year, and diplomats say a third rescheduling is likely in 1963.

Just over six months into the second consecutive two-year IMF (International Monetary Fund) stabilisation programme, the Togolese are returning to Washington to renegotiate the agreement, says Finance Minister Tete Tei-eenuesefa.

Togo will be unable to service 18 to 20 billion CFA francs (62 to 68 million dollars) of its external debt by the end of this year as foreseen in the agreement because of low prices for Togo's exports, the high price of imported oil and a drop in phosphate production, the Minister said.

Economists agree that the results of heavy spending on industry during the 1976-80 development plan period have been mixed. Diplomats say a recent World Bank mission, which studied Togo's new industrial projects, recommended that some be closed down.

Spending in the late 1970s gave Togo an oil refinery with an annual capacity of one million tonnes, a steel mill which can produce 20,000 tonnes of reinforcing rods annually, a 50 million dollar textile plant and a 285 million dollar cement clinker plant owned jointly with Ghana and the Ivory Coast.

The oil refinery opened in January 1978 but shut down seven months later with debts of more than 40 million dollars. It re-opened in April 1979 under new management and made enough money to pay off all debts before high crude oil prices forced it to close again five months ago.

Profitable operations at the refinery are possible, depending on world prices for refined products, economists say, but prospects for the steel mill, which is forced to import scrap, energy and management to run the plant, and which operates only periodically, are less encouraging.

The opening of the textile plant has been delayed due to management disagreements and the clinker plant was forced to shut down from mid-July to mid-August when the refinery cut off its supply of fuel oil. Refinery sources said supply was interrupted because the plant had not paid its fuel bill since the beginning of the year.

The 40-million dollar expansion of Lome Port is likely to turn out to be one of the most succesful projects, economists say, as the port operates efficiently and profitably and port volume incresed by 15 per ent in 1980.

They also say that private commerce and services including banking operate very successfully in Togo and that investment in agricultue during the last plan period led to a four-fold incease in coton production.

Replanting of 5,000 hectares (12,350 acres) of coffee and 3,000 hectares (7,410 acres) of cocoa under World Bank sponsorship has also begun to yield results.

But the largest success of the Togolese economy appears to be its near self-sufficency in production of basic foodstuffs. Production has kept pace with population growth during the "Green Revolution" campaign which President Eyadema began in 1977.

"Peasants feed themselves and are able to sell 15 to 20 per cent of their production", one economist said. "That's what everybody in Africa dreams about — and in Togo it's true."

RAZING OF VILLAGES--A togolese opposition movement-in-exile asserted today that soldiers had razed villages, killed livestock and beaten peasants to clear them off land earmarked for the extension of a national park in the West African state. The Togolese Democratic Movement charged in a statement here that the Lome Government had recently ordered the evacuation of an entire area adjacent to the Keran reserve, in Northern Togo. In a "commando operation led by a high-ranking officer, all the villages were destroyed (and) recalcitrant farmers were brutalized by police and soldiers and saw their fields and cattle destroyed". The statement said some villagers fled into neighbouring Ghana and others to Mango, in Togo, where they remained homeless and were being fed by local authorities. The opposition group also said that 60 soldiers were posted around the seized land with orders to shoot on sight if anyone tried to re-enter it. [Text] [Paris AFRICA AFP in English 25 Sep 81 p 17]

KAUNDA SAYS ZAMBIAN DISSIDENTS BEING TRAINED IN SOUTH AFRICA

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 2 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Dennis Kapata]

[Excerpt]

BETWEEN 500 and 600 Zambian dissidents are being trained in South Africa with the aim of destabilising the country, President Kaunda disclosed here today.

The racist regime's involvement in the internal affairs of the country would be known during the treason trial.

Dr Kaunda made the disclosure in an interview with former Times of Zambia business editor Ruth Weiss now with the Link-up Radio Services (Trust) in London.

The President said Pretoria was involved in an attempt to rescue the alleged coup plotters from detention.

Dr Kaunda, who was explaining the situation in Southern Africa particularly the Namibian issue, did not indicate when the Zambian dissidents went to South Africa.

There were about 5,000 Zimbabweans and 10,000 Mozambican rebels in South Africa with the same aim of destabilising their countries.

On Zambian dissidents, he said the Government had established that they were between 500 to 600. Originally, the Government thought they were about 1,000.

UNZA PROBE COMMISSION TOLD UNZA NEEDS OVERHAUL

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 7 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE accounts department of the University of Zambia is in a mess because some of the people manning it are "incompetent."

Unauthorised borrowing, misuse of funds and other financial malpractices have contributed to the mess, the commission of inquiry probing the affairs of the university heard yesterday.

Chairman of the Party committee at the Lusaka campus, Mr Sitwala Lipalile told the commission in his submission that: "The whole system needs overhauling."

He charged that each time the university had money for loans, it was all borrowed by the "big fish" leaving the junior staff with nothing.

The priorities are wrong because, Mr Lipalile alleged, the central administration spent the little money available purchasing non-essential times chasing non-essential items which later gathered dust in the storeroom.

Some of the machines bought had not been used for a long time and nobody could explain why they were bought, he claimed.

He gave an example of a drilling machine that had been lying idle in the School of Mines for a long time until his committee queried why it was not being utilised.

No checks are carried out because some top administrative officers are also guilty of some of the irregularities," he charged.

Dr Gatian Lungu, head of the correspondence department and acting chairman of the Zambian Academic Caucus, said the administration should be pruned to save money.

Some top officers, he said, had two secretaries and a confidential secretary. This caused duplication of work.

The academic staff were suffering because the institution continued to maintain a top heavy administration at a great cost, Dr Lungu said.

Dr Lungu and the secretary of the Zambian Academic Caucus, Mr Geoffrey Lungwagwa both said the administration was weak resulting in ancillary staff such as cleaners being under-utilised because of lack of strict supervision.

The university bookshop no longer had sufficient text books, Dr Lungu said.

And nodding in approval, chairman of the commission, Mr Wesley Nyirenda said: "We visited the university bookshop last week and it did not look like one. It looked like a glorified secondary school bookshop."

SWAPO DETAINEES' RELEASE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

TWO Namibian girls married to Zambians who were rounded up last week for allegedly "deserting" SWAPO have been released.

This follows the intervention of Minister of Legal Affairs and Attorney-General Mr Gibson Chigaga. They were released on Tuesday to join their husbands in Ndola and Kitwe.

This was confirmed in Ndola yesterday by a lawyer from Ellis and Company who was engaged by the husbands of the women to secure their release on the grounds that the party cadres had resigned from SWAPO.

The lawyer who did not want to be named said he had written a letter to Mr Chigaga demanding an explanation over the detention and intimated that he would file a writ of habeas corpus if he was not given an answer.

He said Mr Chigaga was satisfied that the Namibians, Mrs Hertha Iifo Bwalya and Mrs Helvis Sheya Chipawa were legally married to Mr Lloyd Bwalya and Mr Daltons Chipawa respectively. Another Namibian Mrs Rosa Martin Mukuwa who is married to Mr Demus Mukuwa of Ndola was released on Sunday morning on humanitarian grounds because she had a three-week-old baby.

The trio were picked up from their homes on Saturday night by SWAPO freedom fighters who were accompanied by armed Zambian security forces.

They were told they had deserted SWAPO and were to be sent to Angola on Monday to be disciplined.

They were detained at Ndola Central police station awaiting departure.

SWAPO representative in Lusaka Mr Aaron Mushimba said the Namibians picked up on the Copperbelt could be among the list of those cadres sponsored by the party to study in Zambia, but upon completion of their studies, deserted the party to roam the streets.

He said this was indiscipline and the party would not tolerate such behaviour because sponsored cadres were expected to contribute to the liberation of their country.

Mr Mushimba said he was not against any member getting married to Zambians, but he did not like the idea of Zambians "grabbing" SWAPO cadres.

He promised that if the trio had documentary proof that their resignation and marriages received the blessing of the party they would rejoin their husbands.

SERIOUS FAMINE REPORTEDLY HITS GWEMBE DISTRICT

[Excerpt]

ABOUT 2,000 villagers in Gwembe district whose crops were destroyed by an invading swarm of locusts are surviving on wild fruits because of a serious famine that has hit the area.

District executive secretary in charge of Siavonga, Mr Lubasi Mutukwa, warned yesterday that unless appropriate action was taken immediately to alleviate hunger, many people would die of starvation.

Mr Mutukwa who has just completed a 10-day tour of Siavonga said the worst hit areas were Sikongo, Sianyolo and Katwebele where villagers were having to walk long distances in search of wild fruits.

Although no deaths have so far occurred, he said that people in the area were surviving by the grace of God since no relief measures had been undertaken due to lack of funds.

Mr Mutukwa said he had already dispatched a team of officers to the area including Mwacamvwa where elephants had also destroyed many fields, to ascertain the people's needs and submit a report to the provincial headquarters in Livingstone.

Gwembe district governor, Philemon Chipeso could not confirm the famine as he was reported to be in Lusaka for business while provincial veterinary officer, Dr Namasivyan Balasubramanium, was on tour of Choma farms.

Southern Province permanent secretary, Mr Ian Sikazwe said his office had not yet received a report from Siavonga, but "we shall wait to hear from the officers on the spot," he said.

ZFE SEMINAR ANALYSES CAUSES OF INDUSTRIAL UNREST

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Oct 81 p 5

[Excerpt]

THE imbalance of power between the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions and the Zambia Federation of Employers and poor communication between the two organisations on one hand and the Government on the other are factors contributing to industrial unrest in the country.

Consolidated Tyre Services general manager Mr Gwaza Banda said this in Kitwe yesterday when he opened a seminar for personnel managers and officers organised by the ZFE at Mindolo Ecumenical Foundation.

"To my understanding of Zambian industrial relations the main problem areas include those of imbalance of power and influence between the ZCTU and the ZFE, ineffective communications between the Government, the ZCTU and the ZFE, poor communications within organisations and problems of balancing wages and prices."

The ZFE should be strengthened to influence Government policy on economic matters. Mr Banda called on the seminar to look into ways in which the organisation could be strengthened to make it an effective employers' representative.

"Dialogue on industrial matters should be encouraged initially between the ZCTU and ZFE with the Government providing guidance and conciliatory services."

This could only be achieved if there was a balance of power between the two organisations.

The ZFE should speed up its efforts of bringing employer associations under one wing to improve its membership and quality of leadership.

It should be encouraged to research into industrial problems including industrial relations, industrial development, working conditions and legislation affecting industrial organisations to keep them relevant to changing needs.

Peace

Conflicts arising from fear and lack of trust would be eliminated in favour of peace, progress and prosperity in industry if consultations were frequently undertaken between the ZFE, ZCTU and the Government.

Mr Banda urged participants to look into the relations between the Party and works committees at places of work and managements to find out if these were necessary or could be merged.

ZR SOURCES CONFIRM GOODS TRAFFIC TO ZAIRE CONTINUING

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 8 Oct 81 p 5

[Excerpt]

ZAMBIA Railways has not suspended railway traffic to Zaire as reported by a foreign radio station on Tuesday night, Zambia News Agency investigations have revealed.

Zambia Railways sources in Ndola and Lusaka have confirmed that traffic of goods from Zaire and outside Zambia is still continuing normaly to Zaire.

Zairean Embassy counsellor Mr Nkumbi Kasongo Kitenge said he was unaware of the alleged suspension of traffic to Zaire. He said he had not received any information from either the Zambian Government or from Zaire over the issue.

A report on the British Broadcasting Corporation said on Tuesday that Zambia had suspended railway traffic to Zaire because that country had been defaulting in paying transportation charges.

There was no comment from Ministry of Power, Transport and Communications. All efforts to contact the Minister, Mr Rajah Kunda and his Minister of State Mr Maxwell Lufoma were fruitless.

A source at Zambia Railways freight section in Ndola said that he was not aware of the suspension of traffic to Zaire though he admitted that Zaire had not been paying transport charges for some time.

SWEDEN PROVIDES GRANT TO RUN PRIMARY, MINING SCHOOLS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 3 Oct 81 p 2

[Excerpt] SWEDEN has granted Zambia K2.5 million to run primary schools and the schools of mining and engineering at the University of Zambia.

The grant is a follow-up to another one signed last year between the two countries in which Sweden pledged to service various educational programmes in Zambia between 1980-83.

Yesterday's grant was a climax of two weeks of talks between the two sides in which they reviewed progress made in the fields receiving attention from the Swedish International Development Agency (SIDA).

The two countries will review the progress and examine constraints annually.

Speaking for the Government, acting permanent secretary for Education and Culture Mr Miles Banda, paid tribute to the Swedish government for its continued assistance to the nation.

It was obvious that until there were enough funds to inject in the educational system proposed changes would not succeed.

He hoped that Sweden's contribution would have a lasting effect on the Zambian educational system.

In reply, head of development cooperation at the Swedish embassy Mrs Brita Ostberg said her country would continue to help develop Zambia's educational system.

She added that the two countries shared similar objectives in the development of education.

JAPANESE GRANTS, AID

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

JAPAN has approved a K1.5 million grant aid to Zambia for tractors, the new Japanese ambassador to Zambia Mr Eiji Seki said in Lusaka yesterday.

Speaking in his first interview since his arrival a month ago, Mr Eiji said the grant, which was expected to be presented to the Zambian authorities later this month, was Japan's contribution to the operation food production programme launched by President Kaunda last year.

The envoy said his government had approved another K2,000 donation in medical equipment to the Ministry of Health.

He said the medical equipment was in addition to the K3,000 worth of drugs donated to the University Teaching Hospital early this year.

He said five major Japanese construction firms had tendered for the construction of the K6 million children's wing at the UTH funded by his government and work was expected to begin next month.

Project

Mr Eiji said feasibility studies on the micro-wave links had been completed and that the two countries were discussing the K25 million loan for the project.

A nine-man Japanese team was currently studying the ten-year-old nitrogen chemicals plant in Kafue with a view to rehabilitate it.

The plant was old and operating below capacity but the team would determine the degree of repair work required to bring it to full capacity.

Asked on Japan's possibility to develop one of the State farms, he said the two countries were exchanging views on what form of agricultural development should be given to Zambia although Japan was considering this country's grant for a K32 million loan to buy land clearing machines. — Zana.

AUSTRALIA PROVIDES GRANT FOR GOODS IMPORTS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Dennis Kapata]

[Text] AUSTRALIA is to give Zambia K2.5 million grant during the period 1981/82 to 1983/84 for importation of goods.

Under the agreement, Australia will make available to Zambia goods and services.

The accord was signed by Finance Minister Mr Kebby Musokotwane and Australian Minister of Foreign Affairs Mr Tony Street.

This has been announced in a memorandum of understanding between the two countries. The memorandum is a result of President Kaunda's official state visit to Australia.

The memorandum said in future years, the grant would be determined every year between the two governments in accordance with Australian bilateral allocations to Zambia.

Among goods Zambia would import from Australia would be raw materials for use by parastatal bodies, construction materials, agricultural inputs such as fertilisers, agricultural chemicals, seeds and livestock for breeding purposes.

Manufactured goods will include, agricultural, mining, transport, construction and industrial development equipment.

Other equipment will be for marine, communications, laboratory, power generation and transmission, water and medical.

And Zana reports: The Zambian Government will shortly open and maintain a non-interest-bearing account to hold a working balance with the reserve Bank of Australia in Sidney from which payments for goods imported will be made.

To facilitate transactions, the Zambian Government will appoint a local agent to arrange for the importation of goods, until Zambia establishes a mission in Australia.

The Australian government will meet the transportation costs, including shipping, handling, storage and demurrage charges up to the port of entry while Zambia will meet the costs incurred within her borders.

The grant is expected to go a long way in meeting some of Zambia's present equipment and raw material shortages. At the moment Australia supplies Zambia with wheat and dairy products.

bonds: the language, the system of values, its education through the English language," he told the Commonwealth summit.

But lack of vision of the future might reduce that through economic and immigration policies, the foreign minister, who is leading Malaysia's delegation to the summit, said.

"It will become so that only government supported scholars or the children of the very rich will get the sort of education they used to have," he said.

The Malaysian government, along with many others in the Commonwealth, has complained to the British government about economy cuts that have increased fees for students going to British colleges and universities.

LIVINGSTONE MOTOR ASSEMBLERS CLOSES INDEFINITELY

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 2 Oct 81 p 2

[Excerpt]

LIVINGSTONE Motor Assemblers has been closed down indefinitely, an Indeco spokesman said in Lusaka yesterday.

The closure was indefinite until the company was allowed sufficient foreign exchange to bring in car components and other replacements.

The closure would adversely affect the current diversification programme aimed at introducing other models at the plant and would result in redundancies.

The board of directors which met in Lusaka yesterday expressed serious concern at the deteriorating situation of the company.

It was particularly concerned at the increase in the number of cars recently imported using foreign exchange which could have easily been used to bring in more assembly components for LMA.

The spokesman cited a recent application for letters of credit worth K50,000 for replacement parts to complete assembling 50 vehicles which has not yet been approved.

The plant closed down on August 1, and about 150 workers were sent on leave at half-pay in the hope that components would arrive soon.

The company was to use the period of the closure to accommodate work on the diversification of the plant but this had not been possible because of lack of foreign exchange.

In the circumstances, LMA has no alternative but to extend the period of closure.

BUMPER MAIZE CROP COLLECTION INCURRING PROBLEMS

Expected 11 Million Bags

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE collection of the expected 11 million bags bumper maize harvest has run into a maze of difficulties ranging from lack of funds to impassable roads leading to rural depots.

Chairman of the Southern Province Cooperative Marketing Union Mr Amos Walubita said in Choma yesterday his union had run out of funds to pay farmers for their crop.

The situation had been aggravated by the Government's failure to give the union its annual grants since last year, now totalling K15 million.

Mr Walubita said the K18 million overdraft which the SPCMU got from a bank had been exhausted on paying farmers.

"Unless the Government releases the K15 million in time, we shall not be able to pay for more than 600,000 bags of maize collected from farmers."

If there were no immediate positive developments Mr Walubita would have no alternative but to meet Prime Minister Mundia in Lusaka over the issue.

This is because even after the union had sent its marketing manager Mr Thomas Mudaala to Lusaka for talks with top officials at the Cabinet Office and Department of Marketing and Cooperatives, there was no assurance that the Government would release the money.

Last month SPCMU general manager Mr Hassan Ramaswamy told Central Committee Member Mr Kapasa Makasa who visited Choma that unless the union received more money from the Government, it would not pay farmers for their crops. That was after Mr Makasa had given the union a two-week ultimatum to pay farmers.

More than 34,000 bags of maize are threatened with destruction by rains at Masompe in Namwala and the southern part of Kalomo because of poor roads.

Mr Walubita said the road to Masompe was impassable to heavy duty trucks because of its muddy condition and those south of Kalomo were too narrow for the big vehicles.

In Chipata it is reported that one million bags of maize bought by the Eastern Province Cooperative Union are exposed at main depots because of lack of tarpaulins.

Minister of Works and Supply and chairman of contingency coordinating committee Mr Haswell Mwale directed the Zambia Cooperatives Federation to despatch 2,000 tarpaulins to the area.

Mr Mwale ordered Namboard to ensure that haulers from' the province carried tarpaulins to protect maize from rains.

Mr Mwale on a tour of the province was told that the cooperative union had delivered 1,134,247 bags of maize to its main depots.

The union needed ten light commercial vehicles to transport 40,000 bags of maize and 20,000 bags of other crops from outlying rural depots.

But the ZCF has delivered to the EPCU tarpaulins ordered from Malawi for the union, a company spokesman said.

The union had made its own arrangements to bring in tarpaulin covers from Bombay in India but they had not arrived.

The spokesman said ZCF planned to charter a Zambia Airways cargo plane to airfreight tarpaulin covers from India next week.

In Ndola, Namboard has received 300 tarpaulins to cover maize to protect it from rains.

District manager Mr Gracewell Nkhata said the tarpaulins arrived a week ago and dispelled fears that maize at Bwana Mkubwa depot was soaked by rains that hit rains could not damage the maize which was still not off-loaded from wagons by yesterday.

There was fear from Ndola residents that the bumper harvest would be affected by the unexpected rains.

A Zambia Railways official confirmed that 68 wagons carrying maize from the south arrived in Ndola uncovered.

Farmers Responding to Production Appeals

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Oct 81 p 2

[Text]

THERE is tremendous response from commercial and small-scale farmers to increase maize production for self-sufficiency as well as for export market.

Power Equipment general manager Mr Tim Marshall said this in Lusaka yesterday when he commented on the arrival of four new 140 HP Massey Ferguson tractors from Italy via Zimbabwe for commercial farmers.

He said following Government directives to increase maize production, a lot of farmers in the commercial and small-scale sectors were increasing their hectarage.

Mr Marshall said with this enthusiasm he was optimistic the country should produce more maize next year to even enter the export market.

The four tractors were brought into the country with the help of a Zimbabwean firm — Affretair — which airfreighted the vehicles from Kenya to Salisbury because it was cheaper than bringing them directly to Lusaka.

Mr Marshall said that Zambian farmers recently required a shipment of tractors from Italy as a matter of urgency and that important work had to be completed before the start of the rain season.

In the meantime the four tractors were in Nairobi and Affretair, Zimbabwe's national cargo airline came to the rescue.

This was because of their roomy cargo aircraft which has hatches big enough to allow these agricultural vehicles.

Even with the large entry hatches, the rear wheels of each tractor had to be dismantled to get the tractors into plane. The total shipment value which weighed 22,130 kilos was valued at about K11,595.

On arrival in Salisbury, the rear wheels were re-assembled and transported to Lusaka by Power Equipment.

Mr Marshall said the speed with which the tractors were brought into the country demonstrated the growing interest from all farmers in boosting maize production.

LINTCO FORECASTS BUMPER COTTON CROP NEXT YEAR

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 6 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] THE Lint Company (Lintco) is poised to produce about 28 million kg of cotton next year if the weather will be favourable, general manager Mr William Mantanyani said in Lusaka yesterday.

This forecast is based on the company's improved input supplies to farmers and comprehensive training programmes.

Mr Mantanyani said the company was now studying the price of cotton, which now stands at 47n a kg, with a view of increasing it.

The support his company got from the European Economic Community (EEC) was making a great impact on the cotton industry in the country.

Trucks and motorcycles brought in by the EEC had improved the supply of inputs to farmers so greatly that even some areas which were impassable to motor vehicles were being reached by the motorcyclists.

The construction of 15 cotton depots in rural areas was expected to be completed by the end of this year together with two provincial depots at Mumbwa and Monze. A central depot is being built in Lusaka.

"The EEC programme has made us provide better services to the farmers," said the general manager.

Under the programme, farmers have been taught latest techniques in cotton farming while extension officers were taught how to help the emergent farmers.

"Our efforts are devoted to the training of extension workers and some farmerts."

Bumper

Mr Mantanyani said because of improvements in transport, input supply and training, the company hoped to buy about 28 million kg of cotton in 1982 compared to the projected 23 million kg this year.

"If all goes well, and allowing for good weather, we should have a bumper harvest."

He said a total of K7 million had been paid to farmers for their produce this year for nearly 16 million kg bought.

PARTY OFFICIAL ACCUSES POLICE OF ENCOURAGING CATTLE RUSTLING

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 6 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

A PARTY ward chairman has accused some special constables and policemen of encouraging cattle rustling in Kabwe Rural.

Kalola ward chairman Mr William Ndalama claimed at the weekend that there was a syndicate of cattle rustlers whose activities were abetted by police and special constables.

Addressing a meeting of village headmen Mr Ndalama said the racketeers obtained permits from the police to enable them to sell cattle which they did not have.

"After getting the permits, they go to steal the animals and sell them to a white farmer. In some cases, the racketeers pay money to special constables to steal the animals for them," he charged.

Mr Ndalama said special constables were being used in the racket because they did not get paid for the work they did.

During the meeting, it was revealed that in less than two months more than 100 head of cattle were stolen from the area.

Asked for a comment Central Division deputy police chief Mr Labby Kalombe said in Kabwe yesterday:

"We are human beings. We also make mistakes. If the chairman has evidence, let him come to the division and report to the commanding officer. If his story is true, we shall then take appropriate measures against officers involved."

Mr Kalombe said police wanted people who had facts and not those who made "wild allegations" against his officers merely to demoralise them.

"As a Party official, Mr Ndalama is not only responsible for Party organisation but to ensure that there is security in his area by cooperating with the police."

ECA COUNTRIES WORK OUT MINERAL STUDY PROGRAM

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 5 Oct 81 p 7

[Text]

EAST and Central African (ECA) countries have worked out a study programme of rock formation and characteristics in Zambia and Tanzania in their search for minerals.

The programme to cover the period from 1982 — 1984 was worked out at the recent Geology for Development in Africa meeting held at the Management Development Board in Lusaka and attended by representatives from five countries.

According to the programme released by director of Geological Survey department in Lusaka Dr Eli Mwanang'onze the regions to be covered are those in Zambia and Tanzania.

They include, the irumide belt which is the area lying between a line stretching from Kapiri Mposhi to Isoka and the Luangwa River.

Another region to be covered is the area right of a line starting from east of Isoka parallel to the Zambia-Malawi border going to Lake Tanganyika.

All the countries in the region should take an active part in the study to be financed by member countries and the United Nations Education Scientific and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO).

"Objectives would be to assess the mineral and economic potential of these belts and to disseminate all results and conclusions amongst the countries of the sub-region", it says.

The study is also envisaged to provide training in the methods of approach to the various disciplines of rock formations and characteristics to less experienced geologists from all the countries of the sub-region.

Among the studies to be carried out will include the chemistry of the earth, examinations of earth's properties, origin of metal, establishment of the rock's age, study layers of rock deposited in these areas, study alteration of rocks due to temperature and pressure, study of folded rocks and rock in liquid form.

Local relevant institutions in both countries are expected to assist in the study.

"Sufficient rock specimens will be collected from each geological unit for petrographic study, geochemical characterisation and study of metallocenic of belts", the programme says.

Participants to the meeting came from Tanzania, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Ghana, Belgium and UNESCO.

COMPANY TO PRODUCE IRRIGATION PIPES THIS MONTH

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 7 Oct 81 p 7

[Text]

AMIRAN Trading Company is to start producing irrigation pipes later this month.

The company's general manager, Mr Dan Nahmias, said in Lusaka that the firm had already received equipment to be used in the production of irrigation pipes for farmers.

He said that the company would be making pipes of different sizes and assured that the firm was able to meet local demand.

He said: "Provided we are able to get raw materials in time, we will be able to supply the nation's needs and have a surplus for export."

Explaining why there had been a delay in setting up the project, Mr Nahmias said that the company was waiting for the Zambia Electricity Supply Corporation (ZESCO) to make the necessary electrical connections.

On exports, Mr Nahmias said that the company would initially be exporting to neighbouring countries then to other nations elsewhere in Africa.

Mr Nahmias said that countries such as Tanzania would benefit greatly from setting up the project as she would be able to buy irrigation pipes from Zambia at a cheaper cost as compared to those imported from overseas.

He put the investment in the new venture at K1 million and added that once operational, it will save Zambia a lot of money in foreign exchange.

"We estimate we shall save the country about K600,000 every year in foreign exchange. In addition, we shall earn the country money by exporting the pipes to neighbouring countries," he said.

Initially, the company will employ 15 workers who will be trained in the skills of manufacturing irrigation pipes.

BRIEFS

ZR ELECTRIFICATION STUDY--The long-awaited feasibility study into the electrification of Zambia Railways has now started, a company spokesman announced in Kabwe on Thursday. If electrification proved to be feasible, it would result in substantial saving of foreign exchange which was being spent on importing diesel for locomotives. The study started in May and a final report was expected by March next year. Manager for industrial participation and public relations Mr Alex Lubinda said Zambia Railways had entrusted the work to Messrs Deconsult, a West German consulting firm. The study was being financed under the "World Bank railway project." Since the exercise was a capital-intensive project, it was found necessary that detailed technical-economic studies be made before taking final decision on the matter. ETHANOL PLANT FINANCING--Indeco has found alternative sources of funds to finance the establishment of an ethanol plant at Nakambala Sugar Estate, a company spokesman said in Lusaka yesterday. The alternative sources had already been identified and construction of the ethanol factory was expected to start next year. The spokesman was reacting to reports that Zambia had lost a K12 million deal clinched with Austria for the establishment of an ethanol fodder yeast plant at Nakambala. Indeco was working closely with its counterparts in Zimbabwe who are producing ethanol and the company will appoint consultants for the ethanol project soon. On Wednesday, Austrian ambassador to Zambia, Mr Horst Mezei said Zambia had lost the K12 million deal because since the two countries signed a loan agreement to start the plant on May 19, Zambia did not claim the money within six weeks as stipulated in the agreement, according to Zana. POSSIBLE WASTE OF SOVIET VACCINES--More than 2,000 doses of vaccines donated by the Soviet Red Cross for the immunisation of people in rural areas around Livingstone may go to waste because of lack of transport to deliver the medicine to the people. Livingstone Red Cross branch vice-chairman Mr Henry Kaluya said this yesterday when he appealed to business houses and organisations in the area for money donations to buy fuel for the immunisation campaign. He said the Red Cross was anxious to use the vaccines before they expired next January. The doses are for whooping cough, tetanus and diptheria. EIB INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT LOANS--The European Investment Bank (EIB) has announced loans worth about K8 million for small and medium scale industrial investment in Zambia. The bank said in a statement it had made a ten-year loan of K6.5 million at eight per cent annual interest to Zambia's National Development Bank which would lend the money to ventures approved by the EIB. The other loan of K1.5 million would be used for financing feasibility studies, equity participation and loans for very small ventures. Interest rate would be two per cent and loans would be for up to 25 years. [Excerpt] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 5 Oct 81 p 4]

COMMENTARY ON PRESIDENT SADAT'S DEATH

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 10

[Editorial]

[Text] ANOTHER world figure has fallen to the assassin's bullet. Whatever the motives of those who gunned down President Anwar Sadat, their dastardly deed must be condemned in the strongest possible terms.

President Sadat was a strong, courageous and controversial statesman. Such men make enemies almost as easily as they make friends and the Egyptian leader made more than his fair share of the former, particularly after he chose to follow the path of peace with Israel.

In the context of Arab solidarity and friendship it was a lonely and dangerous path. That the President knew the risks that were involved there is no doubt. It is a measure of his courage that he chose to ignore them as he pursued the course which he believed to be best for his country.

His passing must have a profound effect not only on Egypt and the Middle East but on the world.

Will his successor or successors, continue to promote peace with Israel? Or will the late President's policies be allowed to wither on the bough as a sacrifice to the cause of Arab unity?

The volatile and turbulent Middle East, with its oil wealth and strategic importance, has long been the scene of Big Power meddling. In post-Sadat Egypt these pressures will almost certainly be intensified.

It is a dangerous game. President Sadat played it and lost. Can the Egyptian people still emerge as victors? That will depend largely on the calibre of the new President. Is there another Nasser somewhere in the nation's military or civilian hierarchy?

NEW WORLD ORDER VITAL SAYS MUGABE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 11

[Article by Gareth Willard]

[Text]

A NEW international order will not reject economic interdependence but establish genuine interdependence with all states benefiting from increased trade, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said here last night.

He was giving the La Trobe Memorial Lecture at La Trobe University in Melbourne on his last night in the city before flying home by way of Queensland.

The establishment of a just economic order presupposed a world in which the equality of all men was accepted as a fundamental principle and the oppression of human beings on any grounds was not tolerated.

The ideal of a just world order thus could not be realised until apartheid in South Africa was eliminated. "It should simply be impermissible in these last two decades of the 20th century that certain groups of human beings should still be treated as virtual chattels or mere beasts of burden, rather than as full human beings."

Mr Mugabe said the aims of the new Government in Zimbabwe, to create a socialist society based on the abolition of exploitation, merged with the general aims of the Third World and the new economic order needed globally.

The new Zimbabwean Government had been accused, even by generally supportive scholars, of too radical an approach and too hasty a pace in restructuring economic and social institutions.

"The implication has been that the institutions we inherited were not only in reasonable repair despite the years of war, but also that they constituted a firm foundation on which further development of our country could be realised."

The colonial system was based on the exploitation of the majority by the minority with the pauperisation of the majority a condition for the privileges of the few.

He stated that he was not considering the subjective views, attitudes or behaviour of individuals or functionaries within the system but rather talking of colonialism as an historical objective system.

During the liberation struggle the nationalist movements had not fought a military struggle akin to a putsch, for if they had done so the technically superior enemy would have crushed them.

Instead, the process had been one of politicising, organising and mobilising the masses for a prolonged struggle with no exclusive reliance on military force.

"In resorting to arms we never lost sight of one prominent fact . . . that we were armed militants and not militarists."

National liberation meant more in Zimbabwe than national independence. "It encompasses the objective of gaining control over, and restructuring, the determinant institutions of our society in such a way as to enhance the material and cultural level and well-being of the mass of our people.

"It means redressing the institutionalised injustice that the colonial system represented and putting our people in the position to control their own lives and destiny as much as in the political as in the socio-economic spheres."

TODD EXAMINES SIGNIFICANCE OF RIDDELL REPORT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 4

[Text]

MANY attitudes will have to change if Zimbabweans are to carry out successfully the "revolutionary" change in their lifestyle as contemplated and recommended by the Riddell Commission, the Senate heard yesterday.

In a take note debate in the Commission's report, Senator Garfield Todd told the House: "The progressive liberation of the people is what the report on incomes, prices and conditions of service is all about."

The deliberations and recommendations of the commission, which was chaired by Mr Roger Riddell, had been governed by the concept of a "just society" in Zimbabwe based on the proviso that "a certain minimum standard" of living was to be achieved by all.

"That is the nub of the matter," he added.

Senator Todd said the general picture sketched by the commission was that Zimbabwe had 90 000 workers earning an average of $8 500 a year; 58 000 mine-workers who averaged about $800 a year; 229 000 commercial farm employees with an average of $540 a year; 114 000 in domestic employment averaging $360 a year; and some 750 000 peasant farmers with an average income of $220 a year.

While there are actually 750 000 peasant farmers, they lived on land which could support only 336 000, he added.

"When I read evidence given by the poor and under-privileged I was reminded of the case histories of 19th century workers and the under-privileged in Britain, as quoted by Karl Marx.

"The horrors are similar, but while Karl Marx could see no emancipation, no salvation except through world revolution and while all authority was against him, Roger Riddell is in a post-revolution situation and has the authority in this country.

The Government is committed to making what changes are required to "succour the poor", said Senator Todd. "Our Riddell report has been called for by a government which desperately wants to know what to do to meet the need of the people and which is committed to using the resources of the land to accomplish its purpose."

Senator Todd said the commission "speaks in terms of three to five years from major change and I hope that this optimism will be vindicated.

"What is quite certain is that many attitudes will have to change and I accept that this applies to me also," added the former prime minister of the then Southern Rhodesia.

Senator Todd had no doubt that "policies of laissez-faire will not produce the change which the people of this country need so desperatly and so quickly".

"The guns are silent, and thank God for that, but victory for the people's army just clears the way for peaceful change."

By this, he said, he did not mean slow or little change. "I mean that peace now gives opportunity for revolutionary change. It is revolutionary change that is contemplated and recommended in the report before us".

Saying there had been "misconceptions" regarding the commission's work, Senator Todd told the House: "Where the commission has highlighted dire need and has suggested ways to meet the need, or warned of present dangers, the Government cannot ignore and would not wish to ignore, such facts.

"Government may not accept the advice given and it does not have to do so, but in such circumstances the ministers concerned must put forward even better proposals to meet the need."

Giving his views on the report, he said: "Fifty years ago I was happily and comfortably a capitalist and a paternalist. Now I am uncomfortably, and at a very late age, declaring myself a socialist — anyway basically a socialist."

Senator Todd said the commission believed that the attainment of acceptable living standards depended on the rapid growth of the economy and that the Minister of Economic Planning and Development, Senator Bernard Chidzero, had said the growth rate must not fall below 8 percent a year.

"Let us not deceive ourselves," Senator Todd said. "We could use borrowed money for relief purposes instead of spending it upon basic development, but the edifice we build will surely crash unless it has foundations of real growth, proportionate to the weight of the building they support.

"The recommendations on the economy are not all acceptable to me but they have been carefully and honestly made and they merit painstaking consideration."

Senator Todd said the Minister of Labour, Mr Kumbirai Kangai had said he wanted a minimum wage of $150 a month, but the commission had estimated that, with policies of expansion, it would be possible to achieve a wage of $128 a month in 3-5 years.

"The limits in raising the standard of living of the poor are not set entirely or even substantially by a fairer division of what exists today. The ultimate barrier is the growth rate of the economy."

The debate on the Riddel report was adjourned until today.

'It's alarming, encouraging and challenging'

THE report of the Riddell Commission of Inquiry into Incomes, Prices and Conditions of Service was described in the Senate yesterday as a "remarkable document" for which Zimbabwe should be grateful.

Introducing debate on the report, former prime minister Senator Garfield Todd said the report would not be welcomed by everyone or its recommendations accepted in their entirety.

Despite this, he said: "It must be given high-priority consideration by Government and thoughtful and responsible citizens should study at least those sections which are of particular interest to them.

"I find this report alarming, depressing, frightening, encouraging, challenging." Senator Todd told the House.

Noting that the report was "slightly longer than the New Testament" with which it shared "a basic concern for the poor and a common exhortation to men to improve their relationship with one another", Senator Todd said the commissioners were right to produce so detailed a picture of the Zimbabwe of 1980 and the report would continue to be important as a source of information and advice.

"However, the size and the cost of the volume, plus the fact that copies are now unobtainable, has put it out of reach of most Zimbabweans."

Senator Todd suggested that to get round this problem the report should be reproduced in a condensed form as had been done with Mr Willy Brandt's North-South report on economic reform, which had been reduced to a 40-page booklet.

"In fact I would go further and suggest that certain chapters should be reproduced in vivid and sound educational form for use in secondary schools.

"I would also suggest that both on radio and TV it would be possible to introduce programmes which would bring information from the report with a strong impact to the public at large."

Senator Todd said the report was "not only of vital importance for present consideration, but it will be referred to by students around the world and by future generations of our own people as a dependable and vivid description of the conditions which prevailed in Zimbabwe in the year of independence — an account of what life was like for the people".

"The New Zealand Government, which has not been popular in Africa of late, deserves our sincere thanks for providing, at its own expense, the services of Mr Peter Harris, economic adviser to the trade union movement in New Zealand." Mr Harris was head of the research unit for the commission.

"This report has now been in the hands of Government for four months and my motive in seeking a debate is to let the country hear what the Government attitude is to the main thrust of the report."

MUGABE SHRUGS OFF SNUBS FROM STATE PREMIER

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Gareth Willard]

[Text]

THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, yesterday shrugged off a snub by the Premier of Queensland, Mr John Bjelke-Petersen.

The Australian state leader refused to meet Mr Mugabe, or host any state functions, because of his distaste for the Prime Minister's socialist policies.

Asked his reaction to the cold shoulder, Mr Mugabe said he did not mind. He had already met the Federal Prime Minister, Mr Malcolm Fraser.

He flew to northern Queensland in a Royal Australian Air Force plane for a brief visit to the part of Australia most like Zimbabwe in climate.

His first port of call was the giant mining complex at Mount Isa, deep in the interior. The mine is the biggest producer of lead and silver in the world and one of the largest 10 for copper.

Although unable to go underground because of the tight schedule, Mr Mugabe said he was impressed by the complex, its degree of modernisation and use of technology that some Zimbabwean companies want to introduce.

He also visited the Mount Isa flying doctor base, one of only 12 in the whole of Australia, and said he would ask health officials to study the idea and see whether it would be adapted to Zimbabwe.

He was less enthusiastic about the "school on the air" which teaches by radio, as it was designed for a sparse and scattered population. But he thought it was worthy of study for special problems faced by a few areas of Zimbabwe.

The Prime Minister's party then flew to Townsville, the second largest Queensland city, and was taken to a large commercial farm, about 75 minutes' drive away.

The owner, Mr Ray Hoey, showed Mr Mugabe the vast irrigated rice fields and sugar plantation.

A bull stud was also visited in the afternoon before the party returned to their hotel to prepare for a dinner hosted by the Queensland Education Minister, Mr Bill Gunn, who had accompanied the Prime Minister during the afternoon.

At the banquet Mr Mugabe said both north Queensland and Zimbabwe had a great deal in common, including food surpluses. However, the Australians had been involved in the technical improvement of agriculture for a lot longer and there was much Zimbabwe could learn.

The Prime Minister's team will arrive in Sydney shortly after noon today. It will move on to Singapore and will then travel home, probably via India and East Africa.

JUDGE HITS OUT AT GUERRILLA FACTION FIGHTS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

A SALISBURY High Court judge yesterday described as "unforgivable" an attack by two national army soldiers who kicked a young private senseless on learning that he was a former ZIPRA combatant.

A third soldier and former ZANLA guerilla, Tauya Chikwangwani, was jailed for six years by Mr Justice Beck for attempted murder of the private.

The judge found that Chikwangwani and a companion had probably murdered the private, Mr Enos Nleya, but there was no proof.

Mr Nleya's death was "yet another tragic result of the factional rivalry between ZANLA and ZIPRA in the country since independence", said the judge.

Chikwangwani (25) was found guilty of the attempted murder of Private Nleya at Sutswa, about 30 km from the Mudzi army camp, on the evening of January 25.

Mr Nleya's body was found the next morning in the bush where it had been dragged by Chikwangwani and a Mr Clyde Gwede, who was not found by police.

COUP DE GRACE

It was likely that Chikwangwani and Gwede did hasten Mr Nleya's death, said Mr Justice Beck. "What these two did was indeed the coup de grace that accelerated what would have happened anyway.

"It is likely that they therefore committed murder, but this is no more than an ordinary probability."

The court dismissed Chikwangwani's denial of his statement to police and ruled it admissible as evidence.

The version in the statement was in marked conflict with the evidence given by two NCOs of 22 Battalion — Mr Silver Chipunza and Mr Lloyd Chiwaka Muchemwa — said the judge.

In his statement, Chikwangwani said he was leaving the bottle store with Gwede and a Private Charambira when Mr Nleya tried to stab him with a knife. He disarmed him and sent for the battalion NCOs who were drinking in the bottle store.

The NCOs learned that Mr Nleya was a former ZIPRA man and they "proceeded to beat him up with the utmost severity and actually said that he should die", said Mr Justice Beck.

The court understood Chikwangwani's fear of disobeying the NCOs, but his decision to drag Mr Nleya into the bush and kill him revealed "quite a strong participation in the anti-ZIPRA activities of the NCOs", said the judge.

Mr Frank Smith appeared for the State and Mr Michael Gillespie defended Chikwangwani pro Deo.

ADVANTAGE OF ONE-PARTY SYSTEM PONDERED

Salisbury THE FINANCIAL GAZETTE in English 2 Oct 81 p 4

[Editorial]

[Text]

LIKE the distant rumblings of an approaching thunderstorm, the almost-daily propaganda for a one-party state is heralding ZANU (PF)'s wish to eliminate party politics in Zimbabwe.

It is, on a political-philosophy level, hard to see the justification for such a policy. However, seen in the light of real-politik, it seems that the present government is determined to remain in power. The threat of an alternative government will be removed with the introduction of a one-party constitution.

It is doubtful whether the move will be good for the country, however beneficial it will be for ZANU (PF). The elimination of true political debate cannot be replaced by discussions within a party. It is also certain that no party can have the only policy for development in Zimbabwe; any more than one party has the only policy for Britain or the USA.

The danger in the one-party system is that alternatives which do not conform to the party line are denied expression. Socialism may work in Zimbabwe — but then it may not. If it fails, will it be rejected by a party which is founded on that philosophy? — it seems hardly likely. But in a multi-party system there is an opportunity for the country to take a non-violent, constitutional change of political direction.

With the immense problems facing the country, there is an understandable wish to set aside party politics, on the basis that they divert the energies of government, which should be directed at national development. This loss, however, should be set against the greater loss of political freedom, which is not only justified in itself, but which guarantees human freedoms. It is no coincidence that such freedoms are less evident in some one-party workers' paradises in Eastern Europe and in some one-party states in Africa.

Already some ministers have made threatening remarks about their opposition. Mr Hove, the Minister of Home Affairs, considers that PF demonstrations against one-party rule may provoke violence. No such criticism is made of ZANU (PF) demonstrations for the principle.

The ZANU (PF) leadership bears a heavy responsibility for the future of Zimbabwe. They could be taking a road which, however, attractive politically, could be to the long-term detriment of the nation.

Their attitude to power-sharing within government after their landslide victory at the last elections impressed the world. Zimbabwe had learned from the mistakes made by misguided leaders elsewhere, it was said.

It is to be hoped that wiser counsel will now prevail, for although democracy may be inefficient in some respects, it is still to be preferred to other political systems. To flourish, it needs the cross-fertilisation of many viewpoints, represented nationally by legitimate groups of like-minded people. If this were to be suppressed, it would be Zimbabwe's loss.

FAILURE OF BUSINESSMEN TO ADAPT TO REGIME REPORTED

Salisbury THE FINANCIAL GAZETTE in English 2 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] A YEAR-AND-A-HALF after independence Zimbabwe's businessmen are only now coming to grips with the fact that the economic environment has changed, says Professor Tony Hawkins, the head of business studies at the University of Zimbabwe.

Making his inaugural lecture at the University, Professor Hawkins said that many businessmen simply refused to understand that the relationship that existed between them and the former governments has changed with independence.

"In the past", said Professor Hawkins, "state policy was to establish a climate within which business activity would grow and prosper. Little if any attention was paid to the basis on which the fruits of growth and prosperity were shared. In contemporary parlance, policy focused on growth without development."

But the new Government was committed to creating a different social order. It wanted to redistribute income, wealth and land, and ensure equality among all Zimbabweans, he said.

The problems created by these divergent views was complicated in Zimbabwe by what Professor Hawkins termed the "historical disrepute" of business because of its past and present identification with foreign interests, minority groups and a tendency, given the size of the local market, to monopolies and oligopolies.

But, he added, the new social order did not mean that the private sector would eventually be eliminated. Rather, based on the experiences of many countries in both the East and the West, there would be a convergence towards a more mixed economy.

The business community must now shift its emphasis away from the sole objective of profits to one of maximising social benefits as well. The profit motive and social consciousness were not mutally exclusive.

Local businessmen were now reacting badly to their naive and mistaken assumption that life would remain much the same after independence. And, like workers withdrawing their labour, they were withdrawing their investments. This reaction was very dangerous and could lead to even greater Government intervention, initiating a vicious circle.

In order to adapt and take its rightful place in the new Zimbabwe, businessmen had to come to grips with three realities.

- They had to understand that there has, indeed, been a fundamental change in Government thinking and evaluate it.
- They must accept the necessity for change, and avoid cosmetic measures such as appointing black directors or public relations and personnel officers.
- And they must take a long-term view and avoid ad-hoc measures, while making their organisations more flexible.

"In other words", said Professor Hawkins, "management is required to extend its financial cost-benefit analysis to cover a broader canvas, so that the return on capital is quantified socially as well as financially."

Government and business must also learn to trust each other, and local corporations must identify with the country.

"If the private sector wants to survive it must succeed — succeed if you like, in demonstrating that Zimbabwe would be poorer — socially and economically — without it," he said.

Equally, he added, Government must apply the same criteria to its own public endeavours.

"The public enterprise that fails to generate a surplus and imposes a financial burden on taxpayers is unlikely to make a net contribution to community social welfare," he said.

Equity achieved at the expense of efficiency and personal freedom would be just as disastrous as unbridled free enterprise. The ideal that Government and the private sector should be aiming for was the middle ground — a mixed economy.

Ultimately, he concluded, the kind of economy and society Zimbabwe has will be a political decision. But without greater co-operation between Government and businessmen, Zimbabwe might stumble into a "no man's land" that provides the worst of both worlds.

ACCOZ BOSS WARNS FIRMS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] Businessmen must adapt to the new social order or they will not survive, says the president of ACCOZ, Mr Abner Botsh.

He was responding to remarks made by Professor Tony Hawkins, head of business studies at the University of Zimbabwe, at his inaugural lecture last week.

In the lecture, Professor Hawkins accused elements in the business community of failing to adapt to the new social order and still trying to maximise profits without concern for people's welfare.

He said Zimbabwe would probably choose a mixed economy of State and private enterprise, and it was in the nation's and their own interests for businessmen to combine productivity with maximising benefit to the community.

In his response, Mr Botsh said about half the country's businesses were not changing their outlook or their methods to suit the new dispensation.

They were damaging their own long-term interests.

"If businessmen really had their own and Zimbabwe's interests at heart they would set about developing their own concerns and the country.

"Anyone who thinks that things have not changed is a fool. It is no longer the job of businessmen simply to make profits. The whole nation must benefit from our activities," said the president of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Zimbabwe.

Responding to Professor Hawkins's allegation that some white businessmen were employing black personnel and public relations officers to project a false image of progress, Mr Botsh said such employers were deluding themselves.

"Cosmetic measures are always transparent. Employers who appoint blacks to fool people are only fooling themselves. And anyone who takes a cosmetic job is silly--there is no job satisfaction or pride in perpetuating untruths."

Mr Botsh urged businessmen to adapt and develop Zimbabwe with a fair and progressive attitude.

Asked if industrial unrest and minimum wage violations were not evidence of a lack of adaptation by businessmen, Mr Botsh replied:

"I hope the Government does not judge all businessmen by the actions of a few individuals. There are always rotten eggs in every basket, but more and more businessmen are adapting. I know because I meet them every day.

"But nothing stays the same always, and businessmen must face up to their new responsibilities."

Mr Shamiso Mapfunde, a director of the Zimbabwe Businessmen's Cooperative, said he agreed wholeheartedly with Professor Hawkins's statements.

"Besides the total absence of social conscience by many businessmen, there is too much foreign control of the economy. Businessmen must start taking Zimbabwe--and not only their balance sheets--seriously," Mr Mapfunde said.

"Professor Hawkins is dead right. It's time businessmen started supporting the Government's development policies, and not simply moping in the corner."

The Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries and the Zimbabwe Institute of Management declined to comment.

MORE THAN 15,000 SQUATTERS CLAIM LAND

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 11

[Article by Susan Clayton]

[Text]

MORE than 15 000 squatters at the Epworth Methodist mission, 15 km from Salisbury, are adamant about their claim to live on the land. They say they have paid cash to people for stands on mission land.

But mission authorities accuse the squatters, who began arriving early last year, of disrupting community life.

The middlemen involved in the illegal selling of mission land to the squatters were racketeers, said the mission's superintendent, the Rev. Oswald Ramushu.

"These people are being exploited. The profiteers know how desperate they are for homes and use nicknames when selling land to these people. You cannot trace these racketeers."

Mr Ramushu said he asked the Government for help more than a year ago. He was told that the Government could not intervene because the mission was on private land.

Mr Ramushu said he had a meeting with officials from several ministries last week and another would be held.

Dr Eddison Zvobgo, the Minister of Local Government and Housing said yesterday he was aware of the situation at Epworth.

"The Methodist Church should seriously consider handing over a large portion of the farm so we can move in and plan the place and put up a proper township at Epworth," he said.

"We have two problems at Epworth. One is the fact that it is private property. The Methodist Church owns the land, and is apparently unable to do anything to bring sense into the place in terms of services, water and toilets."

OFFICIALS

Last year the minister met church officials and Mr Ramushu.

"I made it quite clear to them that the Government will not tolerate the situation much longer. Either the church does something to bring order to the situation or we will have to step in and stop the rot."

The minister said that the church did not want to "surrender one inch of land".

"We cannot use Government funds to put up a township on private property," he said.

The position at Epworth was getting worse, Mr Ramushu said. In 1979 the mission allowed refugees temporary shelter on the land. They sold their houses to others and the racket began.

One of the dwellers, Mrs Chimusasa Tapfuma, said that a man claiming to be a "messenger" from one of the headmen sold her a stand for $10 and came to get $8 every year. She believed she had the right to live on the land as she had paid for it.

Squatter families on the 3 600 ha mission have difficulty getting water and do not have adequate sanitation facilities.

Many work in Salisbury and women grow and sell fruit and vegetables on the grounds.

There are also about 500 to 600 refugees living at the mission.

Some squatters identified the land seller by the same name. One woman who came from Chitungwiza after her husband died, said she had paid $40 for her stand.

Although she had been unaware that she was tricked she now wanted to stay on the land as she had nowhere else to go.

Mr Ramushu said that about 10 to 20 people arrived every day. Squatters from Zengeza 4 had paid $30 to a man calling himself "Carbaretta". The man told them he would give them receipts next year and they did not question him further in case they lost their chance.

Another who moved in about two months ago, said he had also paid $20 to "Mr Carbaretta".

Mr Ramushu said the racketeers often said they represented headmen from the four villages at the mission.

The profiteering was being done by outsiders and some of the legal tenants, he said.

Mr Isaac Chiremba, the headman of the largest village, Muguta, said he had about 600 registered tenants and several thousand squatters.

The main reasons squatters came was that they would be near to Salisbury where they work and rates were cheap — only $8 annually.

Some people rented their houses in Salisbury and lived at the mission, Mr Chiremba said.

He added that his legal tenants were complaining that their grazing land was being occupied. About 40 ha of gum trees had beer cleared by the squatters and cattle were killed.

The mission used to sell about 30 000 to 40 000 bags of maize a year but they could not grow any now, he said.

One of the big squatter settlements is on an 80 ha site that was destined to be a secondary school for the mission.

Mr Ramushu said that one of the squatters had wielded an axe when builders arrived. Building is continuing but squatters are living on part of the site for the school.

There are 1 000 legal tenants at the mission. Mr Ramushu commented: "The situation with the squatters is chaotic because when you get an unorganised community it lacks discipline, a sense of direction and does not conform to the rules and regulations of the community."

COMMENTARY ON ROLE OF THE COMMONWEALTH

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 10

[Editorial]

[Text] THE Commonwealth has been a unique organisation since the sun finally set on the British Empire towards the end of the 50s.

It is not a United Nations nor an OAU; neither can it be compared with NATO, the Warsaw Pact, the EEC or COMECON. It has no hard and fast rules, shackling its members to certain defined norms of conduct.

Hence the informality of its summits, where the leaders, meeting quite often without the inhibiting presence of their aides, can exchange their views on varied subjects frankly and honestly.

The summit in Melbourne, although it spawned a Commonwealth declaration on economic relations between rich and poor nations, may not be as memorable as the 1979 conference in Lusaka, which helped bring about Zimbabwe's independence.

Yet it did articulate, in its final communique, Africa's and the Third World's anxiety over Namibia. Mrs Thatcher and Mr Trudeau will be expected to brief Mr Reagan, whose "game plan" on Namibia remains an enigma to the rest of the world.

Without the economic clout of Japan, West Germany, France and the United States, there was not much to be achieved by the Commonwealth leaders on the North-South front.

Since the group represents nearly a third of the world's population, there is no doubt that its views will carry some weight at the Mexico conference.

Despite its obvious weaknesses, the Commonwealth still works. Mr Muldoon may not remember Melbourne with any fondness (for which he has only himself to blame), but the rest of the leaders will be consoling themselves with the thought their "club" is still alive and well.

FPA ON COURSE, SAYS NEW CHIEF

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

THE acting director of the Family Planning Association, Dr Tom Chimbira, yesterday rejected reports that his organisation's services had been seriously disrupted since its take-over by the Ministry of Health.

In an interview, Dr Chimbira predicted that although the FPA's administration had been "slightly" affected by the resignations of 18 senior white members, "the situation will definitely return to normal by the end of the year".

The 37-year-old gynaecologist took over from Mr Peter Dodds who was dismissed last month while serving notice to quit the association in protest at the banning of the controversial Depo-Provera contraceptive drug.

He said although the association had adequate skilled manpower, it was facing an immediate shortage of contraceptive drugs because the previous administration had cancelled all orders before they left.

"But the situation will soon improve."

Dr Chimbira said he had already toured centres in Bulawayo and Gwelo and he would visit the rest before the end of the month "to get these centres operating smoothly again following the resignations".

The re-organisation exercise would be completed by the end of the year. As soon as Government policies on child spacing had been "thrashed out" steps would be taken to expand the services of the association.

Supporting the dismissal of Mr Dodds, Dr Chimbira said the move had provided the Government with an opportunity to destroy the racial imbalances that had existed in the FPA's administration. "We have already gone a long way towards correcting these imbalances.

"I felt quite strongly in favour of the move because it was frustrating to work with Mr Dodds. He was unco-operative with any efforts or suggestions to improve and promote the whole child spacing programme."

By using Depo-Provera the FPA was acting on the past racial belief that African women did not count. Other healthier alternative drugs were available.

Since he took over the administration of the FPA, the oral contraceptive pill and the intra-uterine contraceptive devices, which were being used in most countries all over the world, had been introduced.

"These are commonly used in most countries of the world except for the odd 70 — mostly in the Third World — who are still using Depo-Provera," Dr Chimbira said.

He denied claims that a large number of women were in favour of the continued use of Depo-Provera. "We would be the best people to know about this — but absolutely no one has approached us demanding the continued use of the drug."

He described the FPA's financial position as sound and said a fund-raising drive had been launched to secure additional aid.

"The Americans have already indicated that they are prepared to help us," he said. — Ziana.

STATE PLANS TO HELP NOMADS REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

THE Government plans to launch a massive programme to help the nomadic Doma people living in the Zambezi and Dande river valleys, the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Dr Eddison Zvobgo, pledged yesterday.

The Doma tribe, under Chief Chisunga, had long been neglected by previous regimes, Dr Zvobgo said, and although they are not concentrated on one area, they were a proud people and did not want to be told what to do.

The development programme would involve the provision of education and health facilities and politicisation so that the people could live like other Zimbabweans.

"These people are still backward and live only by hunting and on honey. They do not want to mix with other people," Dr Zvobgo said.

He said it was the Government's duty to ensure that the Doma people enjoyed social facilities in the country like any other tribe.

"These people are Zimbabweans and it is our duty to make them know that their country is free and urge them to use educational and health institutions," the minister said.

The exercise would be a joint effort by the Ministries of Education, Health, Local Government and Housing and other institutions. A study would soon start to find out the number of the people and their problems.

Dr Zvobgo said he would soon lead a team of Members of Parliament, experts and other senior Government officials to the area to hold meetings with the chief and the people in a bid to persuade them to live normal lives.

Chief Chisunga had told the Government that his people needed to be educated and to be aware of the changed political situation.

ZANU (PF) Members of Parliament for Mashonaland Central, led by Senator Freddie Moyo, this week called on the Government to launch a giant education programme for people living in the Zambezi Valley.

Senator Moyo singled out people in the area between Mana Pools and Kanyemba, whom he said were still not aware that there was a black majority government in the country.

He said efforts should be made to use former freedom fighters of Doma origin to help combat backwardness in the area.

ZAMBIA NOW THE MAJOR SOURCE OF IMMIGRANTS

Salisbury THE FINANCIAL GAZETTE in English 2 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

Zambia and Britain have replaced South Africa this year as the source of most of the immigrants to Zimbabwe.

Last year, a total of 1 841 immigrants from South Africa arrived in Zimbabwe. The British formed the second largest immigrant group with 1 779 people, and Zambia came a poor third with 849.

But during the six months of 1981 there was a marked change in immigration patterns.

South Africa dropped to third place and Zambia is now the chief source of immigrants to this country with 1 300 people — nearly double the figure for the same period last year — making their way to Zimbabwe.

British immigrants were also arriving at record pace, and 1 188 people — an increase of 68% landed in Zimbabwe between January and June.

South African immigrants to Zimbabwe dropped 30% to 691 during the six months in question.

In all, there was a grand total of 4 325 immigrants to Zimbabwe between January and June. Of the total, the majority, 2 556, came from African countries, followed by Europe 1 401, North America 170, Asia 130 and Oceania 68.

Although South African immigration to Zimbabwe dropped substantially the Republic was by far the most popular destination for emigrants from Zimbabwe. Of a grand total of 10 930 emigrants between January and June this year, two thirds (7 262) went to South Africa.

JOURNALIST SAYS 'MEDIA MUST REFLECT NATIONAL PRIORITIES'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 9

[Text]

THIRD WORLD media must aim for "professionalism with correct orientation", Zimbabwean academic and journalist, Mr Chen Chimutengwende, urged yesterday.

He said the question of a correct orientation towards the needs of the nation was paramount within the new international information order.

"The Herald needs a lot of changes mainly in the orientation of its news dissemination," he said.

He claimed the local Press did not carry enough development news and said he did not see many articles aimed at mobilising the masses for the reconstruction of the country.

"It has changed, but many more changes are needed," he said.

Mr Chimutengwende, acting director of the Nairobi University School of Journalism, spoke out on many issues concerning the development of Third World media, freedom of the Press, objectivity of journalists and the need for re-orientation.

In a wide-ranging interview, he condemned the control of all news dissemination by the major Western agencies — AFP, AP, UPI and Reuters.

CONDEMNED

He encouraged the formation and local control of locally-based media infrastructure in all Third World countries and praised the setting up of the Mass Media Trust in this country.

Mr Chimutengwende left Zimbabwe in 1965 at the age of 19 "because times were tough politically".

He worked as a reporter in Botswana and has since had a varied academic and journalistic career in England and Africa.

In exile, Mr Chimutengwende developed a keen interest in research and in academic and journalistic writing on Africa and international affairs.

His first book — The Press and Politics for Liberation in South Africa — was published in 1978.

At the moment he is working on his second publication, The Role of Mass Communication in International Relations, which he hopes to complete by mid-1982.

"The aim of my writing is to contribute effectively to the consciousness of the people for the socialist transformation of society at both the local and international level," he said.

Mr Chimutengwende is also a daily correspondent for Interpress, a radical Third World news agency based in Rome.

RADICAL

So-called freedom of the Press, he argued, was an "unaffordable luxury" in any developing country. "It is not possible because developing nations are in a hurry to build, develop, make progress and mobilise the masses for national goals.

"There should be debate, but not destructive debate," he said.

'HERALD' EDITOR ON FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THERE is nothing more lethal to a government than a newspaper continuously singing its praises and telling the leaders they are the greatest, the editor of the Herald, Mr Farayi Munyuki, told the Commonwealth Press Union here, reports Gareth Willard.

While the Press in Zimbabwe operated in a different environment from that in Canada or Britain the goal was the same: Journalism should be about telling the truth, dealing with facts however painful they may be either to the readers or to those about whom they are being written.

Speaking at a meeting of the CPU on Monday, Mr Munyuki said Zimbabwe was fortunate that her leaders had encouraged "open government" with the Prime Minister speaking candidly about some of his Government and party colleagues.

"He had proceeded to tell the nation why he was sacking them or demoting them from their posts. Thus in a nutshell, we try to tell the people what is being hidden from them."

In Zimbabwe the Press had a role of honestly and courageously helping the Government identify those programmes that would benefit the masses fully and to criticise those which did not meet the objective.

"Some of our journalists, because of the history of our country, have an inherent and, some would say, unhealthy bias for the underdog, the underprivileged, the downtrodden and the disadvantaged.

"Without exception every good journalist will write passionately (and sometimes emotionally) about the plight of the poor man who has been ill-treated by the authorities."

Mr Munyuki said his paper had journalists who saw themselves as crusaders, fighting for the rights of the poor and the weak, and the others who fought hard for no change at all.

"This can become such an obsession that it colours their thinking and writing, stripping it of objectivity." The Press could not rhapsodise about the advantages of rural life if life in these areas was not bountiful. It had reported improvements and new facilities but it could create an abundance in rural areas where there was none, and that too was pointed out.

The Press was a mirror of society and in Zimbabwe had come into its own even with partial Government ownership. "It cannot be written off simply as a mouthpiece. It may not have chalked up scoops in the tradition of Bernstein and Woodward's Watergate revelations, but give it time and it will."

The chairman of the Zimbabwe section of the CPU and the chairman and managing director of Zimbabwe Newspapers, Mr George Capon, talked of the electronic media and the Government's promise to reduce Government control, and described the new structure of the newspapers and the news agency under the Mass Media Trust.

NEW PASSPORT, CITIZENSHIP CENTER TO OPEN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Oct 81 pp 1, 2

[Excerpt] PROCESSING of passport and citizenship applications will be decentralised from next month, the Registrar-General, Mr James Chigwedere, said yesterday.

He said in an interview that registration offices would be set up next month in Fort Victoria, Umtali and Gwelo.

Besides dealing with passport and citizenship applications, the offices would handle registration of births, deaths, marriages and voters.

Treasury approval, he said, had been asked to set up offices in Gwanda, Marandellas and Sinoia next year.

Mr Chigwedere said the decentralisation of registration would ease the burden on his Salisbury and Bulawayo staff, and would make life easier for rural people.

"It shouldn't cost people a lot of money in travel to get a passport or register a birth," he said. "These offices will make people's lives much easier."

Mr Chigwedere said the national registration exercise was going as well as could be expected. Two mobile teams were registering people in the country in specially equipped caravans.

With previous registration taken into account about 1,5 million people had been registered. A major problem was that more than half the population was under the registration age of 16, and it was difficult to keep up with them.

At the present rate, he said, it would take 10 or 11 years to complete national registration.

"The problem is funds," he said. "If we could get more money and staff we could finish registration much faster. But with our present resources it takes time."

Zimbabwean parents who had children outside the country were taking advantage of the offer to make the children citizens of Zimbabwe.

MINISTERS TO VISIT MALAWI FARMS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Oc. 81 p 3

[Text]

TWO ministers leave for Malawi today on a two-day study tour of joint small-scale farming enterprises and rural growth centres in the hope of learning valuable lessons for Zimbabwe's development programme.

The trip, by Dr Sydney Sekeramayi, Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, and Senator Denis Norman, Minister of Agriculture, has been organised jointly by the Malawi high commission and Tabex, the tobacco concern.

Dr Sekeramayi and Senator Norman will start their tour with a visit to the Macpherson estate north of Lilongwe.

There, a small-scale burley tobacco farming scheme has been in operation since 1979, and is the model for Tabex's big project now getting underway near Mount Darwin.

On the scheme 284 farmers each have a six-acre plot, on which they grow tobacco, maize and other crops. The land is provided by a commercial concern at minimal rent, and the farmers sell their burley crop to the company at the end of the season.

"It's a highly successful enterprise, extremely profitable to the farmers," said Tabex spokesman Mr Bob Skonkin yesterday.

After touring Macpherson, the ministerial party will visit Kasungu to see the Nkhota rural growth centre — another development with valuable lessons for Zimbabwe — the Likasi veterinary farm and the Kasungu agricultural academy.

"The hard work and efficiency of the Malawi High Commission in organising this trip has been impressive," Mr Skonkin said. "We hope our party will learn much of value to Zimbabwe."

INFLATION UP AS ECONOMY EXPANDS

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] ZIMBABWE'S rate of inflation is at its most serious level in 30 years, but 1981 will be another year of above-average growth and expansion, according to the latest Standard Bank economic bulletin.

In its most recent economic survey the bank says that Gross Domestic Product will not grow more than 8 percent in 1981, mainly due to a doubling of inflation to around 18 percent.

The report says that by August this year the inflation rate had risen from 6.6 percent a year ago to nearly 19 percent. It estimated that inflation for the first eight months of 1981 was 14 percent, and predicts an annual rate of about 16 percent.

The bank says 1981 will be another year of above-average growth and expansion with the primary impetus coming from the agricultural sector with the value of output rising by an anticipated 40 percent.

The growth rate of manufacturing, however, is expected to decline from last year's 15 percent to around 12 percent.

The estimated 37 percent rise in Government expenditure, coupled with a record agricultural season, growing investment levels and continuing strong expansion in manufacturing, is likely to ensure current prices growth of well over 20 percent for the second successive year.

But the report warns that such effects are likely to be offset by falling mining production, a deteriorating balance-of-payments position and the introduction of Government policies designed to put the brake on an overheating economy.

The seeds of a worsening current account position are evident in the slump in the bullion price, the bulletin says. To improve the position, short-term funds have been borrowed from overseas, and import allocations for the final quarter have been cut.

Zimbabwe drew down its first tranche from the IMF earlier this year and subsequent borrowing is likely soon, the bulletin says.

Last year's trade surplus of some $70 million is likely to turn into a small deficit. Fortunately, however, the terms of trade remain extremely favourable.

On the question of consumer spending, the report says there is little evidence as yet that this has peaked.

"At the same time it is clear that the Government must renew its efforts to keep public spending in check, and to switch the emphasis away from military and public administration towards economic services," says the bulletin.

Commenting on the transport situation, the bulletin says that the seriousness of the problem cannot be over estimated. Because of the country's inability to move exports out, or vital imports — such as fuel — into the country, an adverse ripple effect is being experienced throughout the economy.

The bulletin predicts that with the reopening of the Beira pipeline, the purchase of new locomotives and the hiring of some 300 expatriate artisans, the position next year should show improvement.

The achievement of economic stability in the face of so many conflicting pressures is going to be an extremely difficult task, the report warns.

However, the rewards should comfortably outweigh the necessary sacrifices which will have to be made.

MINISTERS COOL DOWN LAND ROW

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

TWO ministers yesterday flew to Fort Victoria to mediate in a land dispute that threatened to spark indiscriminate land-grabbing around the Great Zimbabwe area.

Before the arrival of the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Dr Eddison Zvobgo, and the Deputy Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Mr Moven Mahachi, emotions ran high among the 240 Nemanwa and Duma families from Chiefs Charumbira and Mugabe, some of whom had already staked claims on Mzero farms one and two near Morgenster Mission.

The two farms were recently handed over to the Government for resettlement purposes by the Dutch Reformed Church Morgenster missionaries, but both clans claim ancestral rights to the land.

Telling the feuding families that had assembled a few kilometres from Great Zimbabwe, that the Government was "tribally blind" when it came to resettling people, Mr Mahachi disclosed that the resettlement exercise would begin today.

An additional six farms in the vicinity had been acquired for that purpose, he added.

"Those who took the law into their own hands and moved in without authority did not know what the Government had in mind," he said.

"Tomorrow we are going to register everyone who is on the two farms and those who do not qualify for resettlement will be asked to leave."

A list of deserving people, he added, had already been prepared by the Masvingo District Council which administers local government in the area.

Mr Mahachi explained that to qualify for resettlement, one had to be unemployed, adding that priority would be given to those people who had no land or had very little and unproductive land.

"Our plan is to give every deserving family 12 acres for them to grow enough crops to sell for profit," he said. "You are not going to be resettled according to your tribes or families because you are all one nation of Zimbabweans."

Mr Mahachi said people who could not be resettled on Mzero farms one and two, would be given land on the other six farms, but declined to name them for fear that people would arbitrarily move on to them before they were prepared for settlement.

Dr Zvobgo told the people that after the resettlement exercise was completed, his ministry would divide the area into district council wards.

He also warned them against spilling into the Lake Kyle and Great Zimbabwe protected area which, he said, would be fenced off soon to conserve the indigenous trees that were being cut down for fuel and building.

Dr Zvobgo said people who refused to be resettled could be arrested.

"We do not want 'manyemwe' (over-excitement about the fact) that the Government cannot arrest anyone because it is a people's government," he said. "You must be co-operative otherwise the Government will be forced to act."—Ziana.

RIO TINTO BUILDS MINE TOWNSHIP

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

A $4 million township is being built by Rio Tinto Mining (Zimbabwe) Ltd at its new Renco gold mine in the Lowveld, which should be in operation next year.

The housing scheme consists of 620 two-bedroomed fully-serviced semi-detached quarters for unskilled and semi-skilled workers, 36 for intermediate grade workers, such as gang leaders, and 26 married and 10 single quarters for skilled and professional employees.

The company has also built a clinic at Renco at a cost of $65 000, headed by a qualified nursing sister, and provision has been made to take serious cases to Chiredzi or Fort Victoria hospital.

"The clinic could be expanded if necessary, and while its main purpose is to serve employees, many patients come from neighbouring villages. It serves up to 4 000 patients a month," said a spokesman.

In addition three primary schools are being built by the mining company, one for children of mine employees, another for the children of local inhabitants, and the third school for resettled families.

Recreational facilities are considered an important aspect of mine life as the nearest entertainment is 100 kms away at Triangle, said the spokesman.

A further $200 000 is being spent on a social club, a country club with golf course and tennis courts, a soccer stadium, and small taverns which the company believes are a better concept than a large beer garden.

In the township a shopping complex is being developed. A supermarket is already operating and a number of smaller shops for rent will soon be in business.

The development of basic infrastructure has been undertaken by the company, including the provision of electricity, telephones and sewerage.

In conjunction with the Ministry of Roads, an all-weather gravel road is being built to link up with the main Triangle road, at a cost of $1 600 000.

The company spokesman said the ultimate aim is to develop a modern self-contained township for its mine workers.

BRUSH FIRE RUINS MAIZE HARVEST

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 6

[Text]

A MASSIVE bush fire swept through a farm in the Hartley area at the weekend and destroyed almost $40 000 worth of maize the day before most of it was to have been transported to the Grain Marketing Board.

And yesterday Mr Patrick Gatsi, who is in his first year as a crop farmer, stood among his charred harvest and said: "This could be my ruination."

Mr Gatsi described how his workers on Sunday had battled to prevent the vast blaze from reaching his land and homestead.

"I saw the smoke and flames about 5 km away and it was coming in our direction fast," he said.

As fierce winds whipped and fanned the blaze giant flames leapt above trees 10 m high.

"About six of us lit a fire - break about a kilometre from the farmhouse and help was sent to the beer drink for the rest of the workers.

"They all came running and about 40 of us were trying to beat back the flames. But the fire jumped over a stream and several dirt roads until it reached the homestead."

There were 3 000 bags of maize waiting to be collected on Monday stacked ready for the transporters to load them.

Using hosepipes the workers soaked them in a bid to save them, but the flames swept right through the homestead with the flames scorching the top of a tall tree next to the house, which was not damaged.

Mr Gatsi praised his workers for their efforts and said they worked "tremendously hard". One man had braved the flames to drive away a truck and a sheller.

"Women, children and men cried as they watched the workers' quarters being burnt down with all their belongings and the harvest being destroyed.

"I lost 2 500 bags plus about $8 000 worth of maize which was still to be shelled and some which had not yet been harvested," said Mr Gatsi.

The fire burnt itself out about 11 pm on Sunday about 5 km from the homestead.

Mr Gatsi, a former journalist who served three years in detention, leased the Johanna Dell farm, about 30 km from Hartley, in November last year. He said he was covered by insurance but did not know if he would be paid out.

"The insurance people have been here and they said they would let me know."

EFFORT TO SAVE SHANGANI MINE REPORTED

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Deric Bardo]

[Text]

SHAREHOLDERS in Shangani Mining Corporation Limited are to be asked to exchange their shares for shares in Bindura Nickel Corporation Limited in an effort to save Shangani mine.

Shangani Corporation reports that although the mine made a small operating profit of $176 000 in the year ended June, this was turned into a loss of $2,2 million because of interest charges on borrowed money.

As a result Shangani Corporation has only $1 million of its original $14,8 million shareholders fund remaining.

To save the mine, Anglo American Corporation and Johannesburg Consolidated Investments Limited the main shareholders and lenders, propose that for $20,8 million Bindura should take over Shangani's underground mine and claims for $25,2 million and negative working capital, a liability of $4,4 million. Anglo and J C I will take over the remaining loan debts of Shangani Corporation.

The $20,8 million purchase price will be paid by Bindura issuing 5,2 million of its shares on a 1 for 5 exchange basis to Shangani shareholders. The remaining $15,6 million debt will be left on loan to Bindura to be paid off at not less than $1 million per year, unless profits are less, and will carry a minimum charge of 6 percent a year.

Shangani shareholders must first approve the scheme and then Bindura shareholders will have to agree to increase their companies' share capital.

EARNINGS

If Shangani shareholders reject the scheme the company may be liquidated. But in recommending acceptance of the scheme both boards say it should cause Bindura's future earnings per share to exceed the amount that otherwise would result.

COMMENT: Support should come from the small Shangani shareholders, for they have nothing to lose and everything to gain from backing the scheme. But does the same apply to existing Bindura shareholders?

Bindura's earnings would be depleted if Shangani closed down — both directly from the income it gets through the existing agreement to refine Shangani's production, and indirectly by having to bear all the fixed costs on its smelter and refinery.

If Shangani mine is allowed to continue in the Bindura Group then future, annual operating results should be far better than the $176 000 earned to June. Those earnings came from the closed since December open cast works, which in the 1980/81 year had a low grade of ore.

The new underground mine started production during the year but only reached the planned level of 60 000 tonnes a month in July, a month into the current financial year.

The big worry therefore does not seem to be the mine and its production but interest charges and ore selling prices.

Nickel prices are at a low level at present and if this continues and reconstructed group may find it difficult to reduce borrowings and interest costs.

In the financial year ended June 1981 interest charges cost Shangani $2,4 million (at today's rates the same loans would cost $3,3 million).

Under the scheme the loan debt would be $15,6 million at 6 per cent and working capital borrowings taken over of $14 million at prime overdraft and acceptance rates (13 and 11,75 percent respectively). The interest cost on all of this would come to $2,7 million which is $0,3 million more than the 1981 charge on Shangani.

In fact the interest charge could rise further because Bindura would be responsible under the scheme for finding the $4,5 million needed to complete the underground mine (mainly the vertical shaft system).

BENEFIT

One benefit that should pass Bindura's way after the scheme is the tax benefit on the plant taken over. So the enlarged Bindura group must look to better mine operating profits from Shangani to make the deal pay; there will be no savings in interest charges.

Finally, with Anglo favouring the reconstruction, the small Bindura shareholder has no effective way of blocking the scheme. To issue the shares a 75 percent favourable vote is needed and Anglo interests own more than this.

However, all things considered Anglo and J C I are to be commended for deciding to keep Shangani going. By doing so they are showing confidence in the future of nickel and Bindura.

TRANSPORT SNAGS HIT TIMBER MERCHANTS

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

TRANSPORT problems between Umtali and Salisbury are causing shortages for many timber merchants in the capital who are hard-pressed to meet rising consumer demand.

Insufficient rail trucks and the expenses and shortage of road transport are the major stumbling blocks to a steady flow between the two centres.

Border Timbers, the country's biggest commercial growers of timber, has a huge demand for structural timber but is finding its rail truck allocation inadequate. This is causing a bottle-neck in Umtali and a shortage in Salisbury.

"We are getting only about 15 trucks a week and need double this amount to meet orders and avoid stock-piling," said a company spkesman.

The problem has prompted some manufacturers of timber products to approach the Ministry of Trade and Commerce, with a view to importing timber from South Africa. Border Timbers, however, say they will oppose the move as shortages are only temporary.

Salisbury firms specialising in timber products are only just coping with demand and some are having to work a seven-day week.

Kleko is working flat out in its industrial trading and joinery sections but is seriously effected by shortages of raw materials and hardware.

Dave Solomon Timbers is coping with demand but having to make do with open orders for timber, rather than rely on specifications.

Sandwiched between the two cities, Robertson Building Systems of Marandellas has a different problem. Timber is plentiful but they are finding it hard to deliver to their customers.

BRIEFS

BISHOP'S SON--The executive president and secretary-general of the recently formed Southern African Anti-Apartheid Movement, Mr Philemon Muzorewa, has quit the organisation following pressure "from certain quarters". Announcing his resignation from the movement he founded, the son of the former prime minister, Bishop Abel Muzorewa, said he had been under pressure to abandon SAAM. Mr Muzorewa denied that the organisation was a front for the enemies of the liberation struggle in Namibia and South Africa. "I have resigned from this pressure group and will back other movements that support the liberation of the people of Namibia and South Africa," he said. SAAM had been established to mobilise support for the suffering people of Namibia and South Africa, said Mr Muzorewa. Last week the ministry of foreign affairs denounced the movement and denied a claim by Mr Muzorewa that the Government had been consulted before it was formed. A spokesman for the ministry accused him of involving the Government to give credibility to the organisation. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Oct 81 p 5]

HOLLAND CRITICIZED--Mr Andre Holland, leader of the Democratic Party, was yesterday criticised by the National Front of Zimbabwe and the UANC for saying a one-party state might work. Mr Chris Sakala, publicity secretary of the UANC, condemned Mr Holland "as one of the worst hypocrites and a turncoat, not only to the white community, but to the whole nation of Zimbabwe". Mr Holland was "a declared enemy of Zimbabwe, a man who gives democracy with his left hand and takes it away with his right". Mr Peter Mandaza, president of the National Front of Zimbabwe, said his organisation deplored hypocrisy. "If Mr Holland is honestly talking about his wish for a one-party state, he should set an example by dissolving his party and rallying his support behind ZANU (PF)." LAND SURVEY--The university of Zimbabwe will soon have a land survey department, the Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Dr Sydney Sekeramayi, said in the Senate. Responding to questions during the committee stage consideration of the Land Survey Amendment Bill the minister said that there was not a land survey department at the university at present, but basic subjects in the discipline were being taught. He hoped first-year students would begin their studies in the new department by 1983. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Oct 81 p 1]

TOBACCO SALES--A record 67 356 109 kg of tobacco was sold at 183,76c per kg, compared with 79c last year, by the close of this season's flue-cured tobacco sales on Monday. Zimbabwe Tobacco Association's president, Mr Bert Palmer, said the 1981 season's success marked the country's acceptance into world markets and reflected the industry's stability. "Emphasis is now on the Government to recognise that the commercial farmer has his part to play in the future of Zimbabwe," said Mr Palmer. The ZTA president said the selling period was quiet, though dominated by the probe into the marketing of flue-cured tobacco conducted by international consultants who felt the auction system was "sound and healthy". Coal supply had recently given cause for concern and any change in the basic pay could "price the industry out of the world market", he said. "The second post-sanctions season has done much to encourage growers back into the industry," said Mr Palmer. "There has been a 14 percent increase in grower registration." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Oct 81 p 1]

PAC OFFICIAL--A central committee member of the Pan Africanist Congress says the situation in South Africa cannot be resolved peacefully but only through an armed struggle. In an interview, Mr Gora Ibrahim, PAC's director of publicity and information, said that from its inception, the organisation took the position that "apartheid South Africa could only be liberated through a concerted armed struggle". "It is not a question of trying to work out some compromise because there cannot be any compromise with racism. We are not an opposition party seeking democratic changes. "The PAC firmly believes the struggle must be waged by our own people inside the country. It does not believe in merely attacking installations and institutions because these are mere manifestations of the oppressive regime. "The real pillars of that oppressive state are the police, army and all those who uphold the status quo. To destroy apartheid you have to remove them," he said. Asked when South Africa would be independent, he said: "The PAC has declared the eighties the decade of the Azanian revolution. It will certainly happen in our lifetime." CO-OPS ENCOURAGED--The Minister of Agriculture, Senator Denis Norman, says communal farmers should think seriously of forming co-operatives. Officially opening the Msana Show at Bindura on Friday, Senator Norman said: "People should not wait for handouts, but try to improve their products using all their resourcefulness." He urged farmers to be patient when their requests were not attended to immediately as the Government had other commitments. Though disappointed by livestock entries, which consisted only of poultry, Senator Norman said he had been impressed by the farm produce and hoped that next year there would be cattle and goats. An Agritech spokesman said the communal farmers had not held a show for four years. The produce had been of high quality and entries in the women's section had been impressive. The spokesman said he had urged farmers to produce more and not just enough for consumption. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 5]

FREE LABOR UNIONS--Free, independent and apolitical trade unions are a vital link in expressing the thoughts of the labour force, Senator Bob Blunt said during the Senate Debate on the report of the Commission of Inquiry into Incomes, Prices and Conditions of Service. He said socialism, fascism, and a military dictatorship subjugated the individual to the will of the State and allowed a small elite to control it. He was not opposed to socialism, however, as it related to a mixed economy. "Some control of the economy by the State is essential and desirable," he said. Before the Government implemented the recommendations of the Riddell report the economy had to start moving in the right direction, he said. Senator Blunt said the greater the tax levied on industry and commerce, the greater would be the unemployment figure. The Government had to create confidence. In countries where industries were nationalised and production-orientated, the rate and effectiveness of industry decreased in proportion to the degree of nationalisation. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 11]

COUNCIL REHOUSES FAMILIES--Almost 1400 squatter families have been resettled in former township hostels, says the Salisbury City Council's director of community services, Mr Bev Taylor. Mr Taylor said that 1391 squatter families from Harare and the Kambuzuma/Westwood area had been resettled, according to a council health, housing and community services report. Altogether 829 families were resettled at Matapi hostels, 167 families at Nenyere hostels, and 400 families in low-cost Government accommodation. A further 72 families were awaiting screening before they were allotted accommodation. Earlier this year many squatters requested permanent residence in the Salisbury area from the city council. The applicants were screened before being put on a waiting list for permanent housing. A survey found that 47,2 percent of these people had lived in Salisbury longer than 10 years, 17,4 percent had lived in the city longer than five years, and 51 percent of the heads of families, of whom more than half were women, had three to five dependants. Their average monthly income was $49,83. The minutes said a number of the resettled squatters were subletting their rooms and returning to the rural areas. People who did this would have their tenancy cancelled immediately. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Oct 81 p 7]

NAMIBIA MISSION--A 15-man delegation of the Western contact group is expected to hold talks with the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, during its tour of the frontline states this month, a spokesman for the British High Commission in Salisbury confirmed yesterday. The group would consult the leaders of the frontline states on the latest moves to resolve the Namibian independence dispute. "We hope to arrange a meeting of the delegation with Mr Mugabe," the spokesman said. Britain is a member of the contact group, as are the United States, West Germany, Canada and France. The delegation is expected to begin its African tour on Thursday and to be in Zimbabwe around October 26. The delegation will be led by the US Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, Dr Chester Crocker. It will be expected to bring proposals for an amended Resolution 435, a ceasefire undertaking and an election under United Nations supervision. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 9 Oct 81 p 1]

SPORTS ARENA--The Chinese Government is to finance a 60 000-seat sports stadium in Salisbury, an embassy official said yesterday. A loan agreement was signed in September last year, allocating about $17 million for design and construction. The spokesman said that his government would not be providing equipment. A Chinese survey team will assess building costs and check the site and design. The feasibility study should start by the end of this year and should not take more than six months. The spokesman could not estimate how long building would take until the survey results. The stadium will provide football, track and field event facilities. Building materials will be both local and Chinese. Engineers and technicians from China will work with a local labour force. After the survey team completes its assessment, agreements will be signed. Recently, embassy officials were shown five sites in Salisbury suburbs by representatives of the Ministry of Youth, Sport and Recreation. The two largest possible sites are in the Warren area near Belvedere North. The Ministry of Youth, Sport and Recreation was not available for comment yesterday. PARLIAMENTARY SYSTEM--Zimbabwe needs to establish a parliamentary system more representative of the people's aspirations, says the Speaker of the Assembly, Mr Didymus Mutasa. Mr Mutasa, interviewed in Washington recently, said the parliamentary system in Zimbabwe was modelled on Britain's Westminster system as provided for under the Lancaster House agreement. When the agreement ended, a more representative system would be required. Mr Mutasa is leading a six-man parliamentary delegation on a month-long tour of the United States to study the US legislative system. After four days of meeting with congressional leaders in Washington last month, the Zimbabweans were most interested in the Congress committee system, reports the US information service. Members of the six-man delegation include Senator Tsitsi Munyati, MPs Mr Callistus Ndlovu and Mr Joseph Kaparadza, the deputy secretary to parliament, Mr John Wesley, and parliamentary secretary Mrs Alice Musengezi. Mr Mutasa told Americans that his delegation was one of several studying other legislations. Other delegations, he said, had visited Sweden, Britain and Cuba. ARMY DIVERS--The first four black army divers to be trained to military standards recently completed their course at the Army Diving School, Kariba. The school was formed earlier this year as a joint venture between the Corps of Engineers and 1 Commando Battalion to fulfil the requirements for scuba divers. The first course followed a 10-day selection period in July, attended by 31 members from engineers and the commando battalion. After rigorous screening six people were selected. Of the six, four qualified as army compressed air divers (Class 3) after eight weeks of training. The black army divers, the first in the country to dive to 67m at Sinoia Caves, are Captain R.J. Ellison, Lieutenant W. Makoni, Trooper Mutenda and Trooper Gumbo. The course at Kariba covered the theoretical side of diving as well as practical search dives, night dives and normal training dives, giving the trainees a total of 50 hours underwater. WORKERS QUIT--Most of the 40 employees of the Red Knight gold mine at Shabani who had refused to leave the mine when it was closed down on September 26 were persuaded to leave this week when they were visited for the second time by a labour officer. It is understood the mine, owned by Mr J. Louw, was closed because it had been running at a loss for three months. The workers had refused to accept a week's notice or their pay. FARM LEGISLATION REPORT--The economics and markets branch of the Ministry of Agriculture has compiled a report on legislation which affected the sector between January and June this year. The report notes standards of quality required by various marketing agencies and prices of controlled products. Farmers' licences, levies and service charges are also covered, as are regulations relating to the registration of specific crops and livestock. Information on prices of major agricultural commodities in neighbouring and overseas countries is also provided. "The overall purpose," says the report, "is to provide a body of information for use by the agricultural worker in areas of the industry where clear controls exist." ELECTRIFICATION PROJECT--The Government of Finland is ready to enter into a joint venture with Zimbabwe in the country's rural electrification programme, Finland's trade commissioner in Salisbury, Mr Matti Hyvarinen, said yesterday. To help Zimbabwe in the implementation of the project, Finland would first electrify a "pilot village" to be selected by the Zimbabwean Government, he said. Discussions between the two countries are already underway. Mr Hyvarinen told Ziana in an interview: "My country will supply all material, equipment, technicians and labour and will pay for other costs on this village." He estimated the pilot project would cost $150,000. He said once the two governments had agreed on the project his country would give Zimbabwe "attractive" credit terms and soft loans. MILITARY MISSION TO GREECE--The Greek Charge d'Affaires to Zimbabwe, Mr Yannis Azarias, wished success yesterday to five Zimbabweans who will undergo training at Greek military academies. At a reception last night he said: "The peoples of Zimbabwe and Greece have had a long and happy relationship as witnessed by the large and successful Greek community in Zimbabwe. "The young Zimbabwean officers who will be trained in the Greek military academies are but an indication of this new dimension of our friendship." Captain E. Ndlovu and Warrant Officer C. Georgants will study military medicine while two aircraftmen, Mr Simbarashe Muringa and Mr Richard Chiura, will be trained as technicians. A fifth member of the group will be trained as a pilot. REPORT ON ALLEGED CONSPIRACY TO OVERTHROW REGIME

Maputo TEMPO in Portuguese 4 Oct 81 pp 37-40

[Text] Important revelations concerning a vast conspiracy against the People's Republic of Angola involving the United States, Zaire, South Africa and Gabon were made by the Lisbon newspaper PORTUGAL DE HOJE in its 16 September edition. This paper provides clear information on the various attempts made by imperialism to overthrow the Angolan Government and replace it with a puppet regime subservient to it. These facts are connected with the aggression launched by South Africa against Angola.

The United States is interested in changing the regime in Angola and is strenuously attempting to create a situation that would lead the UNITA to power. Jonas Savimbi, the leader of the movement opposing the MPLA, is the man who, according to the Americans, will lead a new government.

Together with Zaire, South Africa and Gabon--among others--Americans are providing assistance to the movements opposing the Luanda regime and intend to create the necessary conditions to destabilize the Angolan political process.

Our paper gained access to secret Zairian documents recounting the various recent steps of the project. We were able to ascertain that the situation is well known to Portuguese diplomacy and to some members of the present government, but it has so far been kept a deep secret.

A certain Armand Iannarelli (or Agnarelli) was born in Paris on 13 March 1935. He lived at 32, 26 Aout Street in Noisy-le-Grand. He is presently residing in Kinshasa and his telephone number is 77007. His name was mentioned some time ago in the JORNAL DE ANGOLA, which branded him a mercenary.

The Luanda authorities, acting within the context of good relations with Kinshasa, had asked Mobutu to expel this Frenchman, and the reply had been affirmative.

He is a man with a busy past. In 1968 and 1970 he was in Biafra. In 1975 he worked for French security and established himself in Kinshasa. He used to be called "major." He left and then returned in 1976 to "work" with Holden Roberto in the FNLA.

It is not very clear how Iannarelli appeared in 1978 as the savior of the FNLA, after Holden Roberto fell into disgrace. He became associated with the Societe des Boissons de Kinshasa (SBK) headed by Pierre Castel and began to work with a special collaborator of Mobutu's, Kite Moko, political commissioner of the Popular Movement of the Revolution. Together with these two friends, he founded the Zairian Products Marketing Company (SCPZ) and set up a beer concession in the Kassongo-Luanda area on the Angolan border.

This commercial enterprise was the basis for the COMIRA [Military Committee for the Resistance in Angola]. Iannarelli introduced himself as Holden Roberto's successor (he had worked with him in the past) and mobilized the remnants of the FNLA, which consumed his product and carried out furtive operations on Angolan territory, stealing coffee and goats that were taken into Zaire.

The COMIRA was never very active. But not even the Angolan authorities deny its existence or the increasing burden it constitutes. Indeed, this was why they recently asked Mobutu to expel Iannarelli from the country and at first glance, the request was granted.

This man left with luggage and weapons on the Kinshasa-Paris flight on 30 May. No one saw him and nothing was heard about him until it was learned that he had been seen in Kinshasa on 9 June. On that Tuesday, Iannarelli was at the Kinshasa presidential palace and met with Mobutu's adviser, Sety Hale.

According to a secret report handed to the Zairian president, Iannarelli related his talks in Paris (from 2 to 5 June) with the military attache of the South African Embassy. Colonel Pretorius had been able to acquire a substantial quantity of war materiel for the COMIRA, the movement founded by Iannarelli himself with the support of Sony, Salva and Tona, personalities connected to both the Zairian Government and to Mobutu.

South Africa declared itself ready to immediately provide about 10 tons of war materiel, including 10 60-mm mortars, 10 RPG-7 anti-tank weapons, 100,000 bullets, (?762) howitzers for 60-mm mortars, 252 RPG-7 howitzers, 1,000 attack grenades, 500 defensive grenades, 800 kgs of plastic explosives, 10 radios, 100 kgs of medicines and 100 pieces of individual equipment.

The goods were transported on a C-130 Hercules plane from South Africa, via Franceville in Gabon, where the plane departed in the direction of the ocean, to then fly toward Zaire and drop the equipment by parachute in the area of Mount Quibokolo, in Angola.

In the report by Iannarelli to Mobutu's special advisor, it appears that the COMIRA has 4,200 men under arms on three fronts: 1,500 men stationed in the Bas Zaire, close to Luanda, 1,200 in the northeast up to the Cuango River and 1,500 in the province of Malanje. The mercenary gave a detailed account of his plans and of past accomplishments in an attempt to convince the Zairians of the need to change the Angolan regime.

Iannarelli referred to the quality of the South African equipment and stated that he had tested it in the area of Uije with excellent results. If Zaire would provide support for his movement, the situation could be even better.

Zaire would only stand to gain from this. It would acquire a significant part of the rich territory in northern Angola, it would have the railroad and would rid itself of a bad neighbor.

The mercenary did not have to work very hard to obtain Zairian support for his projects. Let us look at the conclusions reached by Mobutu's advisor in the document we have been referring to:

"If a genuine and active resistance establishes itself in Angola along the Zaire-Angola border, this could constitute an excellent buffer zone against rebel infiltrations in Zaire. We can even talk about Cabinda, where the presence of some elements of the former Katanga gendarmes under the leadership of Nathanael Mbumba and Antoine Gizenga has been noticed after March 1981....

"We know that the Zairian side promised Angola to expel Armand. Angola is convinced that Zaire has acceded to its request, since Armand left Zaire temporarily. He is now back and the Angolan intelligence services are aware of this. In our view, for reasons that are obvious to our security services, Armand, who is in our midst as a businessman, should be discreet and establish himself away from the capital. Indeed, his wish is to settle in Kassongo-Luanda where his economic activities are carried out.

"Despite our precautions, this could become known to the Angolan secret services. In this case, the Council of Ministers would present an apology and would say that Armand entered Zaire surreptitiously, in addition to lamenting the fact that Angola is not adopting the principle of reciprocity in relation to expelling Zairian dissidents from its own territory."

In relation to the opportunity for secret negotiations between Zaire and South Africa on the problems in Southern Africa and on COMIRA, Zaire would benefit fully from this cooperation which, however, ought to be conducted very carefully.

"At a diplomatic level, Zaire naturally cannot encourage the activities of the COMIRA and will even have to state that our country does not tolerate such activities on our territory."

President Mobutu Sese Seko did not hesitate. Military support to Angolan opposition movements would allow him to modernize his army, exchanging old equipment for new in return for the assistance he would provide.

Already in May there was news about a plan for Angola. The head of the Gabonese secret services, Jules Oyaby, visited Kinshasa to speak with the Zairian president about the cooperation with Angolan oppositionists.

Following his meetings with Iannarelli, Mobutu dispatched envoys to South Africa, the United States, France, Geneva and Brussels. He brought into the talks his deputy prime minister and the state commissioner for foreign affairs.

At the end of these visits, a report was presented to him, affirming that a meeting had been arranged in the military base of Kitona (in the strip between Angola and Zaire) between delegates of the UNITA, the two FLEC's and the COMIRA, besides the "indispensable presence of South African emissaries and Armand Iannarelli, the commandant of the COMIRA."

The report also states: "As we specified in our report on the visit by the U.S. undersecretary of state to Angola and the refusal by the Angolan president to reach an agreement with the UNITA, we shall use our influence to convince all sides to form a sole movement and to prepare a joint plan that would be ratified by the Americans within a few days.

"In accordance with their request, we shall attempt to obtain such plans from every participant....

"However, we shall, in the meantime, issue orders to the general staff to temporarily stop the materiel to Lubota in order to prevent any information leak, in accordance with your recommendation that extreme discretion be used. After the meeting we shall be able to continue sending the materiel for the FLEC-Lubota."

"We shall require two planes and helicopters for this mission."

In accordance with the plan, a meeting was held in July in the military base of Kitona to solve the Angolan situation.

In accordance with the report sent to President Mobutu, present at the meeting were the UNITA (three persons), the COMIRA (four persons), Armand Iannarelli, the Republic of South Africa (two military representatives), the United States (two persons, one of whom was a CIA agent stationed in Kinshasa), Zaire (three persons) and Gabon (one person from the presidency of the republic).

The meeting covered four points [as published]: 1) The change of regime in Angola, 2) the independence of Cabinda, 3) the political and military organization of the four Angolan opposition movements into an interventionary force.

According to the report, the basic questions were very favorably received.

"The U.S. delegate," the report of Mobutu's advisor states, "immediately stressed the vital importance of this meeting.

"Meanwhile, the U.S. emissary explained why the United States has decided to change the existing government in Angola (...). The U.S. idea to set Jonas Savimbi as head of the Angolan Government was expounded to those present. The Americans, moreover, asked for a very close collaboration with Armand Agnarelli, who was introduced as the contact agent."

Another report relates the meeting of the U.S. emissary with Jonas Savimbi. "Despite the fact that this meeting is secret, the U.S. position is clear: the United States is also secretly negotiating with some countries to find a joint solution to end the Cuban and Soviet presence in Angola. China is one of these countries. However, it would first be necessary to change the present regime.

"To this end, an interventionary force is needed that will soon intervene in the Angolan capital. This will be guaranteed by the U.S. emissary who participated in the Kitona meeting.

"Jonas Savimbi, the presumed next president of Angola, confirmed this at a meeting between the two personalities in the presence of the special advisor.

"The U.S. emissary asked the special advisor to facilitate the trip to Geneva of all the leaders of the UNITA, the COMIRA and the FLEC's, as well as of Armand Agnarelli, that should, in principle, take place at the end of July. Confirmation of this will be transmitted through a member of the U.S. Embassy in Zaire who was also present at Kitona and to whom we could address ourselves in the future."

Again in relation to the Kitona meeting, we gained access to another document by Mobutu's special advisor, in which it is affirmed:

"The Americans are willing to expel the Russians and the Cubans from Angola, to first change the leadership in Angola and then proceed to the separation of Cabinda from Angola.

"Up to now, we did not know the exact position of the Americans.... They will, of course, not make it public. We shall learn more details after the Geneva meeting, in which Zaire and Gabon will participate in accordance with the wishes of the United States.

"As for the interventionary force, South Africa is in charge of forming it and will present military plans in Geneva, but, unfortunately, we shall not have access to these documents and shall have to resort to our antennae in the United States.

"According to our sources, which closely followed this meeting, it seems that the Americans and their allies, the South Africans, have already directly and indirectly infiltrated Angola. They have their double agents within the SWAPO and the MPLA. These agents operate freely in Angola and gather the necessary information and documentation (...).

"Zaire will have to play a serious double game on this issue, especially in relation to our Angolan partners who are the direct target. If the coup is successful, Zaire would have no problems in the field of security, in using railroads, etc..."

According to the Zairian documents we have been citing, Gabon is very interested in this operation and has offered its services to the United States and South Africa, as long as deep secrecy is maintained. Its bases will be used to transport war materiel from the UNITA, the COMIRA and the FLEC.

Mobutu's special advisor proposed a meeting between the Zairian head of state and President Bongo to discuss the subject.

Besides the countries already mentioned, the reports refer to the cooperation of Morocco, and meetings with Moroccan leaders as well as the availability of the Ben-Guerir military base have been noticed.

AUSTRIAN COOPERATION--The delegation from the Ministry of Rural Development, constituted by comrades Miguel Lima and Antonio Rodrigues Pires, has returned from Austria. Talks were held in that country with the Austrian Ministries of Cooperation and Agriculture, Forests and Natural Resources. Our delegation submitted a project to the Austrian Government, which the latter had already intended to finance. A number of new projects were also presented for evaluation, mainly the establishment of a slaughterhouse/refrigerated warehouse, the construction of a complex of residences for technicians and of a recreational complex to be located in the agricultural "Justino Lopes" enterprise, and the establishment of a mechanical unit to assist users of agricultural equipment--particularly motor pumps. Since the production of bio-gas is of interest to Cape Verde, a proposal was made to establish a bio-gas unit in our country. It was accepted and work is to begin in October. Finally, the Austrian Government expressed its readiness to continue offering food assistance to our country. [Excerpt] [Praia VOZ DI POVO in Portuguese 30 Sep 81 p 4]

FRENCH MILITARY BASE--Paris, 16 Oct (AFP)--Comoran President Ahmed Abdallah said here Thursday after talks with French President Francois Mitterrand that he wanted the French-ruled island of Mayotte to return to the sovereignty of the Indian Ocean Island Republic in friendship and cooperation with France. He said he might allow France to set up a military base in the islands if that happened. He told a press conference that he was happy with his talks--the second round in 10 days--with Mr Mitterrand, who he noted had condemned in 1975 the French-backed secession of Mayotte from the island group, which declared independence from France in that year. He said no commitments had been made during the talks. But hinted that Mr Mitterrand favored the return of Mayotte. Since the secession, France has agreed to review Mayotte's status every five years. The Comoran Government had already made a gesture, he said, by enacting a federal constitution which protected each constituent island's individuality. The ball was now in France's court. Mr Abdallah said the Comoros also wanted France to return the Iles Glorieuses, which are also claimed by Madagascar. "The day we solve the Mayotte question, we will solve the issue of the Iles Glorieuses too," he said. [Text] [AB160845 Paris AFP in English 0735 GMT 16 Oct 81]

PRESIDENT RETURNS FROM FRANCE--Moroni, Comoros, Oct 17 (AFP)--Comoran President Ahmed Abdallah returned home today from a two-week visit to France and talks with President Francois Mitterrand. On arrival at Moroni-Havaya International Airport he said he was very satisfied with his fruitful talks with Mr Mitterrand, who he described as a great friend of Africa. During their two meetings in Paris the two leaders discussed the question of Mayotte, the fourth island of the Indian Ocean archipelago which voted in a pre-independence referendum in 1974 to remain under French administration. COMMENTARY ON EXECUTION OF MUSTAPHA DANSO

Banjul THE GAMBIA TIMES in English 5-6 Oct 81 pp 1, 2

[Commentary: "The Execution of Mustapha Danso Is No National Sin"; material between slantlines printed in upper case]

> [Text] /"The body was of a well built African male.... A wide open wound on collar bone which affected the muscles. Wound on right arm which had regular edges...bone scattered into various fragments. Further wound on base of thumb. Internal examination reveals that three ribs were fractured on the right side, the wind pipe torn, multiple fracture of the collar bone. The injuries may have been characterised by three gun shots penetrating through the chest affecting the left and right arms.... Death due to shock as a result of severe bleeding"... medical report (inter alia)/

The above is a Medical Report of the Late Mr. Eku Mahoney, Commander of Police attached to the Bakau Depot, who according to Mustapha Danso, the assailant, as he deposed in Supreme Court that "Yes it is true I gave 3 shots to Mr. Mahoney and whether he died or not I did not know."

In support of the Prosecution, Cpl. Biram stated "I saw Danso when he went to the back of Mr. Mahoney's Office with his rifle in his hand and he stood in front of the Sgt. Major's Office, holding his rifle in an 'On Guard' position and he fired the first shot at Mr. Mahoney who ordered him to stop but the accused did not say anything. He fired the second shot which hit Mr. Mahoney on his left shoulder and when Mr. Mahoney turned round, it was then he gave him the third shot which hit Mr. Mahoney on his chest and he vomitted blood." The very Judge did not recommend clemency.

In spite of the above crime, there were many people who stormed the Court Houses at Kanifing and in Banjul, anticipating that if Danso was convicted or condemned to death for such a beastly crime, something would happen. This caused the strictest precautions to be taken whenever the hearing was on. Glaring of the wonderful examples of the Creator was that on Monday the 3rd November 1980, the Step-Father of Danso arrived from Katchang, with the assurance that nothing would prevail from whatever hearing. While the Step-Father was making ablution to pray in Bakau the same afternoon immediately from the Kanifing Court, he collapsed and died immediately. Now that Danso had been executed not a single person appeared to fulfill the wish.

By the execution of Danso, justice had been done to the parents, friends and well wishers of the Late Eku Mahoney. By the stay of execution, the first act of the rebels was, to go and release Danso, thus releasing the inmates of the Prisons which boosted the number of the limited coup makers. Delay was proved dangerous, for rumours have it that he killed a lot of people within the uprising and his trip into the Royal Victoria Hospital was in pursuit of more intended victims.

It is reliably informed that the last execution took place in Banjul in 1951, some thirty years ago. Within the period therefrom, many were the sayings and actual killing of people who were innocent simply as there was a belief that 'As'Jawara is in the Chair, after killing, he will only keep in prisons, feed [word indistinct] and say thanks for the act.' When the Law is applied in its full force it would be discovered that the holding of a broken bottle or opening a knife against another person will all be limited since the implications upon conviction will be nothing other than enforcing the sentence be it Death or Lard [as printed] Labour. If Danso was executed, there would have definitely been no attempted Coup for the consequences would have been weighed and having the chances tested to be light, there would have been a complete abandonment.

We are sure that there will not be anything like killing in the nearest future except for anyone with pending charges for murder, etc. Glaring is the fact that since the 30th July 1981 to the 6th August 1981, when mass killings took place and while there is the enforcement of the Emergency Laws, no one has ever heard of anything like an accident that is fatal. There is the utmost precaution taken by all, and so it will continue to be, as there is a different approach to different things to make all look different.

The action of executing Mustapha Danso is confirmed by all Scriptures but with the clearance taken to perform the sentence was a clear indication that if Danso had not been removed from Prisons and had not taken active part in the wanton acts, surely he would have been alive to see the day.

The world in which we now live in could be taken in opposite directions when we consider human aspects. Take an example, when the rebels ruled with guns, no one dared refute the Curfew imposed from 7 p.m. to 7 a.m. but in opposition, the President's imposed Curfew from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. was actually flouted; but alas! when the Police took to the streets within the imposition, and anyone caught in Serekunda loitering no matter, that person is given a matchet to cut grass at the Police Lines Kanifing. About 50 such Curfew Breakers were in attendance but at the moment there could be found none in the Streets, so grass cutting without pay had been abandoned for good. It appears that everybody is in strict observance of the order. This is best for humanity.

The President had proved to be a Saint but his subjects deem him otherwise, why should he not then prove himself otherwise so that they could realise that in authority lies something hidden. Snake charmers die by snake bites. So let it be.

TRIBAL ISSUES PROMPTED COUP--Banjul, 19 Oct (AFP)--In a meeting in the west of the country, Gambian President Sir Dawda Jawara stated that the 30 July aborted coup in Gambia was prompted by tribal considerations. The coup attempt was carried out by a section of the field force, the only security agency in the country, and it was led by a supreme revolutionary council made of civilians and soldiers, most of whom were members of the Madingue tribe, the majority ethnic group in Gambia. Meanwhile, Sir Dawda has asked for the extradition of Kukoi Samba Sanyang, leader of the aborted coup who sought refuge in Bissau with nine of his accomplices after their aborted attempt. According to several sources in Gambia, the putsched-makers will not be extradited by Guinea-Bissau; instead they will be expelled to a country of their choice (Cuba, Angola or Sweden). The Gambian head of state has finally confirmed the death of Jibril L. Pingu George, Gambian socialist revolutionary leader, during the events in Gambia. Mr George, who had joined the putsch leaders, was shot following misunderstanding among them. [Text] [AB191809 Paris AFP in French 1350 GMT 19 Oct 81]

EULOGY TO SADAT POINTS TO HIS GREATNESS

Abidjan FRATERNITE MATIN in French 7 Oct 81 p 28

[Article by J. P. Aye: "A Great Man!"]

[Text] Sadat may be dead. The news began to circulate in this form yesterday afternoon, keeping alive the hope that death would not take this other great personality of our century who did not deserve to die right now, so important are his actions in Egypt, in the Middle East, in the Arab countries, in Africa... and in the world. Their continuation demanded that he be there, Anwar al-Sadat, this unreachable Egyptian who surprised the world with his audaciousness and his political courage.... But these actions will remain incomplete, or, if they are carried out, they will not bear the finishing touches of the Egyptian president.

Sadat is dead. This astonishing and terrible news cannot but affect everyone: politicians who are partners today and were adversaries yesterday; simple citizens either passive or active in our societies listening to the world. He was surely a great man. One does not even know what to admire most in this politician who wielded the weapon of surprise and "political pressure" with an obsession that no longer could hide his obstinate will to reach peace in Egypt and the Middle East. But not peace at any cost, only the kind of peace that would bring together those elements open to reconciliation; and there are many that could be.

Thus, Sadat chose to force the doors of peace by resorting to "challenges." When his "insane" project to go to Jerusalem was carried out, there were very few people around the world with some knowledge of the Middle East problem who believed in his initiatives: it was both spectacular and audacious. It precipitated the course of events, and the Egyptian president launched a triple challenge by making this trip. First of all, to his people, then to an Arab world astonished and divided, and finally to the rest of the world which, while appreciating Sadat's courage, nevertheless feared the perils hidden under his initiative. Thirty years of a dialogue between deaf partners carried out by intermediaries were erased all of a sudden, to open the way for a genuine peace process.

Sadat thus went to Jerusalem. Begin returned the visit by standing at the foot of the Pyramids. Ever since then, nothing could be the same any longer in this Middle East where everything had remained transfixed and where other wars were brewing.

The hope for peace was called "Camp David," a conclave, a tripartite summit between Sadat, Carter and Begin. And if today it may be said that little has been harvested from this field of hope represented by the summit, the Egyptian-Israeli rapprochement is undeniable, it is the new element cementing the dynamics of peace that will fire up in the average or long term this Middle East exhausted by its confrontations and wounded from fratricidal wars.

Has Sadat, the man who had so far won all the challenges, been the victim of another challenge, to be today an Egyptian martyr? Many will think so. They will become convinced of it because they had felt, some weeks ago, that the Egyptian president, by his massive arrests of religious leaders to forestall latent trouble, had struck too hard. But is it possible to strike too hard when one's name is Sadat, when one has a winning streak of so far unequalled "suicidal maneuvers" and when one is still politically strong and idolized by one's people? And when one is working toward peace for this people? However, all judgments always include an unknown element. Thus Sadat died, his staff in his hands, as a victim. Just like other great men--especially great men--died because they served too much and died as servants to their burdens, with the strong feelings they gave their all. Even their life. And Sadat died yesterday, violently, in our violent world, after fighting against the violence, one of the greatest figures in this convulsed century. He was a great man because of his political strength as much as his political weakness. A man whom history will remember, and rightly so.

REVIEW OF NATIONAL MERCHANT MARINE ACTIVITIES

London WEST AFRICA in English No 3344, 31 Aug 81 pp 1993-95

[Text]

THE Ivory Coast, too, has launched a determined campaign to build up its merchant navy, and so far has done quite well considering that with a population of less than 2.5 per cent of the population of black Africa it has something like 11.5 per cent of the regions merchant marine tonnage.

Mr. Lamine Fadika, the minister of the marine, has pointed out that while most industrialised countries import or export between six and 15 per cent of the GNP, developing countries tend to export or import more than 30 per cent of their GNP. In 1974, Mr. Fadika said, the maritime potential of developing countries was only sufficient to handle 8 per cent of their exports and 30 per cent of their imports. In the Ivory Coast's case he cites figures for 1976 showing that Ivory Coast vessels carried just over 2 per cent of the goods entering Abidjan port and 7¾ per cent of goods shipped out.

To help the development of the Ivory Coast's merchant fleet an Institute of Documentation, research and Maritime Studies was set up. In one survey that the Institute carried out it discovered that of 900 ships entering the port of Abidjan during a four month period each, on average, unloaded 1,790 tons of cargo (bulk liquids were excluded) and took on 1,400 tons, furthermore three-quarters of these "ship transactions" involved less than 1,500 tons per vessel although both the port facilities and the size of the ships would have allowed at least double that rate.

The Institute has also calculated that the increase in freight costs is as much the result of inefficient programming by lines serving Ivory Coast as it is of other causes. It points out that in 1976 the number of ships calling at Ivory Coast ports rose by 18 per cent while the tonnage loaded decreased, because of the world economic slow-down, by ten per cent.

To develop its merchant marine, so as to be able to take proper advantage of the UNCTAD Linerlode — which agrees that maritime trade should be divided as to 40 per cent for the country of origin, 40 per cent for the recipient country and 20 per cent open to all comers — the Ivory Coast set up several institutions.

It decided, for example, to breathe new life into the Societé ivoirienne de transport maritime (Ivory Coast Maritime Transport Company). Created in November 1967 by the French Government, SITRAM originally had 50 per cent of its initial capital allocated to France, 15 per cent to miscellaneous interests, and only 35 per cent to the Ivory Coast. In 1970, the latter became the majority holder and since March 1976, has been the sole owner. The Government also undertook to renew the entire fleet of SITRAM. In November 1977, the Yamoussoukro was launched, the first of a series of eight similar ships able to function either as container carriers or with classic packaged cargoes, but not with bulk goods. There are also seven chartered ships.

The ministry of the marine also set up three service companies. Sitram International Shipping Agencies (SISA) is a commercial agency entrusted with loading schedules, rotation of ships, control of commercial documents, claims and relations with shippers. Apart from SITRAM, 17 national shipping companies (eight African and nine European) have consigned their ships to SISA. After little more than a year of operation, it had improved the average cargo per ship by 22 per cent in Abidjan and 35 per cent in San Pedro.

The second service company is the Société nationale ivoirienne d'opérations maritimes (Ivory Coast National Maritime Operations Company). Its responsibility is handling, and it has at its disposal important modern equipment (trucks, tractors, cranes, tug boats, etc.) which allow it to load and unload ships at the enviable rate of 1,500 to 2,000 tons per day.

The third offspring of SITRAM, the Société ivoirienne d'engineering en transport maritime et en logistique internationale (Ivory Coast Engineering Company for Maritime Transport and International Logistics) was created in 1978, to be responsible for organising transport from producer to consumer, of goods and equipment imported or exported by state companies.

In 1975 the Ivory Coast took the initiative to call a ministerial conference of West African states (now 25 members) to decide on policy towards the "conferences" — the associations of shipping lines trading with West Africa. This ministerial conference still meets periodically. But regional cooperation does not stop there. It also extends to training, the area that could be considered the most important for the future of African shipping.

An agreement including Togo and Benin was signed in 1970 to create CREAM, Centre regional de l'enseignement et de l'apprentissage maritimes (Regional Centre of Instruction and Marine Apprenticeship) in Abidjan. Four years later, in response to the demand for officers' training, the Ecole supérieure de navigation (Institute of Navigation) was created as a national school. These two institutions today constitute the Groupe de écoles de la marine marchande (Group of Merchant Marine Schools) (GEMMA).

Already 80 per cent of SITRAM's personnel are Ivorians and the commanding officer, Yao Flavien Guessend, Master Mariner, "sole master after God" on board the Yamoussoukro, is an Ivorian. Others will follow, but the proper training of officers takes about ten years, so a lot of officers with Ivory Coast's merchant navy are foreigners, mostly French.

A lot of hopes are pinned on the Académie régionale des sciences et techniques de la mer (Regional Academy of Sciences and Techniques of the Sea) which was due to open its doors in October 1981. Unfortunately, delays in architectural studies and in the search for financing have postponed the opening.

Three schools are foreseen: CREAM, with a new capacity for 312 students; the Institute of Navigation, rebuilt to take in 178, and the new Institute for Maritime Transport for the training and specialisation of officers and shore personnel in all areas of maritime transport.

In addition, there will be a Centre of Professional Training for Maritime Transport to train handlers and dockers, a Coast Guard School for those whose duty it is to guard the maritime economic zones; and the African Centre for Fisheries Training, which will be set up with the assistance of FAO. The Academy will then be complete.

IDENTITY OF VIEWS WITH INDIA NOTED AFTER PRESIDENTIAL TALKS

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 14 Sep 81 pp 1,2,8

/Article by "TARATRA" NATIONAL INFORMATION AGENCY: "India and the Democratic Republic of Madagascar: Perfect Identity of Views"/

/Text/ After a three-day official visit to India, President Didier Ratsiraka left New Delhi, bound for Moscow; he was seen off at the New Delhi airport by President Neelan Sandjiva Reddy and Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. Political observers all agree that this indicates the success of all the talks that the Malagasy head of state held with the Indian officials. On Thursday afternoon, President Didier Ratsiraka had a talk with Mrs Indira Gandhi. The topics were the present international situation, the Indian Ocean situation, and bilateral relations. On Thursday morning, the two presidents and their parties visited the Indian Institute for Agricultural Research; 2,500 students are studying in this center, which was established in 1935. The institute is the largest agricultural research establishment in India. The Malagasy head of state made a point of praising the efforts so far accomplished by the institute.

As in Libya and in Algeria, the Malagasy head of state and his party received the warmest welcome.

A joint communique was published on Friday in the Indian capital at the end of this visit: the gist of it is given here.

"At the invitation of the president of India, Neelan Sandjiva Reddy, the president of Madagascar, his excellency Didier Ratsiraka, who was accompanied by Mrs Celine Ratsiraka, made an official visit to India from 8 to 11 September 1981. The visit took place in a warm, friendly, cordial atmosphere. The Malagasy president thoroughly discussed international problems with the prime minister of India, Mrs Indira Gandhi: the two leaders also reviewed the bilateral relations between the two countries and discussed the ways and means by which these relations could be strengthened and consolidated even more in future. The talks were held in an atmosphere of cordiality, trust, and mutual understanding."

The president of the RDM [Democratic Republic of Madagascar] and the Indian prime minister agreed that it is not possible to eliminate tension and confrontation in South Africa and to establish peace there unless the liberation of Namibia and the end of South Africa's illegal occupation are simultaneously achieved, as well as the dismantling of the apartheid structure. They reinterated their full support for the inalienable right of the Namibian people to peace and freedom, and their solidarity with the fight being waged by SWAPO, the only legitimate representative of the Namibian people.

The Malagasy president and the Indian prime minister condemned any attempt by South Africa that might lead to subversion of the United Nations plan for Namibia, as set forth in the security council's resolution 435 in 1979. Mr Ratsiraka and Mrs Gandhi deplored the actions of certain states tending to strengthen the arrogant position of South Africa, which is continuing to defy international opinion. The RDM president and the Indian prime minister strongly condemn South Africa's recent acts of armed aggression against the Republic of Angola, and demand the immediate unconditional withdrawal of South African forces from Angolan territory. They noted with concern the acts of aggression, tending to destabilize the independent states of East Africa, that are being perpetrated by South Africa.

President Ratsiraka expressed his appreciation for the firm support given by India to liberation movements in East Africa.

The Sahara

With respect to the Sahara, both parties reaffirmed their support for the relevant resolutions of the OAU and the UNO on this question. Then the president of the RDM and the Indian prime minister expressed their deep anxiety concerning the growing military presence of the great powers in the Indian Ocean, despite the legitimate protests of the seaboard countries in the region. They noted with anxiety the expansion of the military base at Diego Garcia as well as any other manifestation of increased military presence on the part of the great powers.

They urgently appeal to those powers for gradual reduction until total elimination of their military presence in the Indian Ocean.

They reiterated their intention of redoubling their efforts to obtain the rapid implementation of the declaration making the Indian Ocean a peace zone for ever. To that end, Didier Ratsiraka and Indira Gandhi express their full support for having the United Nations conference held in Colombo, the capital of Sri Lanka. In this respect, the Malagasy president repeated his proposal to hold a summit meeting of heads of state and government in Antananarive on the same concept of the Indian Ocean as a peace zone.

The prime minister of India recalled that the council of ministers of non-aligned countries held in New Delhi among other things favorably received in principle the president of Madagascar's suggestion. The two parties also expressed their grave concern over the accumulation of sophisticated arms systems in countries neighboring on India, and found themselves in agreement that such a situation could destabilize the present equilibrium, set off an arms race, produce a contrary effect on the process of normalization of relations among the countries in the region and on the establishment of an atmosphere of trust among them.

The two parties noted with anxiety the present situation in South East Asia, and are convinced that it could have dangerous consequences for the peace and stability of the region, and in this context the situation in Afghanistan was analyzed with particular attention.

Afghanistan

The two parties called for urgent political solution of the problem, based on respect for the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of Afghanistan. India and Madagascar also express their deep concern about the Iraqi-Iranian conflict which is still going on and which is likely to give rise to grave repercussions on the peace and stability of the region; they appeal to both countries to resolve their differences in accordance with the principle set forth in the charter of the United Nations as well as by the non-aligned countries movement.

Noting with anxiety the deterioration of the situation in western Asia, India and Madagascar call for Israel's immediate withdrawal from Arab territories occupied since June 1967, including the city of Jerusalem. The two parties stressed that the Palestine question constitutes the very heart of the problem, and they asserted that if this question is not satisfactorily resolved, with the PLO participating in negotiations as legal partners, no lasting solution can be found. India and Madagascar reaffirm the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to a homeland and a sovereign state, and its right to be recognized and restored. The two parties denounce the continual action by Israel to modify the status of the holy city of Jerusalem, thus defying the United Nations security council's resolutions 476 and 478 in 1980.

South East Asia

The prime minister of India and the president of the RDM reviewed the present situation in South East Asia: they expressed their anxiety over the increased tension prevailing in the region. They gave their support to the solution adopted by the ministerial meeting of non-aligned countries that took place in New Delhi from 9 to 13 February 1981.

Mr Ratsiraka and Mrs Indira Gandhi expressed the hope that through constructive dialogue the countries in the region will succeed in finding a political solution to the region's problem, one assuring full respect for the sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity of all countries of that region. Concerning Korea, India and Madagascar expressed their hope that its peaceful reunification be achieved as soon as possible. The president of the RDM and the prime minister of India reaffirmed their faith in the principles and objectives of non-alignment, and in the fact that non-alignment represents the hopes and aspirations of the majority of mankind, while becoming a dependable and positive force capable of assuring world peace.

They expressed the hope that through strict adherence to the principle of non-alignment and strengthening the common bonds uniting the non-aligned countries, the movement will continue to subscribe to a joint strategy and a consensus that would reflect the very essence of the spirit of non-alignment.

In this connection, the two parties noted with satisfaction the success of the meeting of the ministers of foreign affairs of the non-aligned countries which was held at the beginning of the year in New Delhi, and which coincided with the celebration of the 20th anniversary of the movement's first summit meeting. India and Madagascar reviewed the present situation of economic cooperation between the two countries; it was agreed that efforts will be made to strengthen this cooperation. The president of Madagascar recalled the proposals that he made in Havana in 1979 for the establishment of three fronts among non-aligned countries: the prime minister of India warmly welcomed this initiative, and recognized that all possible efforts must be made to augment the availability of resources for the benefit of developing countries. Both parties expressed their deep concern over the present impasse hindering multilateral economic negotiations. They noted that despite adoption by the General Assembly in 1980 of the new strategy for international development within the framework of the third decade of development, the international community has not been able to agree upon the overall negotiations leading to implementation of the strategy; in addition, it has not succeeded in focussing its attention on the problems of capital importance, such as the hunger problem, energy, internal energy sources for developing countries, and that of financial transfer, which require immediate attention. They agreed that developing countries must make every possible effort at every level to break the present deadlock by generating the necessary political will.

Caracas Program

India and Madagascar welcomed with satisfaction the Caracas program for economic cooperation in the developing countries, and stressed the importance of its rapid implementation.

They expressed the hope that concrete negotiations will be made concerning cooperation in the financial field for development, in accordance with the recommendations made in resolution No. 7 of the 6th Summit Conference on guidelines on the policy adopted for strengthening of collective self-management among non-aligned countries.

President Ratsiraka made a point of indicating to the president of India, and to the government and people of India, his deep appreciation of the warm hospitality afforded him and his delegation during their visit to India.

The president of Madagascar presented invitations to the president and the prime minister of India to make an official visit to Madagascar. The invitations were accepted with pleasure.

In Moscow

In Moscow, the wife of the Malagasy head of state, Mrs Celine Ratsiraka, accompanied by Supreme Council of the Revolution member Jaotombo Ferdinand and minister Gisele Rabesahala, visited the permanent exhibition of the achievements of the USSR, last Saturday.

The visitors had an opportunity to admire and become acquainted with the grandiose tasks achieved by the Soviet people from the time of Lenin to the present day.

MONJA JAONA SPEAKS TO PUBLIC MEETING IN CAPITAL

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 7 Sep 81 pp 1,2

/Text/ The first real public meeting of CSR /Supreme Revolutionary Council member/ Monja Jaona, national president of MONIMA /National Movement for the Independence of Madagascar/ KA MIVIOMBIO /expansions unknown/, with the population of Tananarive took place on Saturday afternoon. The meeting occurred in the covered stadium of Mahamasina, and was connected with the regional seminar of MONIMA militants of the Antananarivo Faritany /administrative district of Tananarive/, which ended yesterday.

He was accompanied on this occasion by this party's Political Bureau and Regional Committee members.

As usual, it was Dr Randranto, national vice president of the party, who was in charge of the demonstration.

This was an opportunity for President Monja Jaona to reexplain to the public of Tananarive the reason for, and the objective of, his party's withdrawal from the Front /National Front for the Defense of the Revolution/. "As we had a talk with the public of Tananarive just before our departure from t the Front, we owe it to ourselves to renew contacts and explain our return to it."

After this explanation, President Monja Jaona gave frank replies to the various questions asked by the Tananarivians.

In his responses, the national president of MONIMA gave a report on the results of the visits that he has made to plants, in Toliara, Antsiranana, as well as in Mahajanga and Antananarivo, in which he denounces all the shortcomings that need to be remedied, while at the same time presenting his party's suggestions for the nation's economic recovery. Such as the regrouping of the oppressed popular forces to fight against all the injustices.

As concerns the powers he has reportedly been granted to control food supply,

President Monja Jaona made it very clear that "these powers have not yet come to him, but he is already beginning to foresee the events."

On censure, he reiterated what he had already said to the press recently at the SOLIMOTEL [Malagasy Hotel]: "MONIMA insists upon the freedom of the press, but also insists that journalists who indulge in lies be subject to legal action."

MONIMA SEMINAR ON RENEWED TIES TO FNDR

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 5 Sep 81 pp 1,2,3

/Text/ The regional seminar of MONIMA /National Movement for the Independence of Madagascar/ KA MIVIOMBIO /expansions unknown/ militants in the Antananarivo Faritany /administrative district of Tananarive/ was officially opened yesterday morning by the dean of the CSR /Supreme Revolutionary Council/, Monja Jaona, national president of this revolutionary organization recently reintegrated into the Front /National Front for the Defense of the Revolution/.

In his opening speech, President Monja Jaona rejoiced in this first contact with the Antananarivian public since the big meeting in Ambohijatovo in 1977, during which he had explained the withdrawal of his party from the Front ("so as not to become the accomplice of certain dishonest high officials"), and the intention behind the withdrawal ("to make the leaders do some thinking").

After 4 years' absence, MONIMA has returned to the Front because of the nation's situation, which is daily growing worse: standard of living of the population down to the strict minimum, insecurity, famine, corruption, black market....

MONIMA's return to the Front means "continuation of the fight it has always waged along very clear lines: national recovery to liberate the oppressed masses so that they can work for the revolution."

It is true that the nation's economic situation is due to the crisis of capitalism, since the latter has led to a fall in the prices of our export goods and a rise in the prices of imported goods. But that is not the only thing: "the structure implanted since 1973, creating a new class (the bureaucratic middle class) which is oppressive, for it seeks only to amass wealth for itself, and as fast as possible, too, is also one of the reasons behind our present economic difficulties," MONIMA's chief specified.

President Monja Jaona then asserted that MONIMA's principle had never changed: a state run by the urban and rural proletarian class.

But he added that to do this, the masses of the people must control what takes place in every domain.

And CSR [Supreme Revolutionary Councillor] Monja Jaona quoted an example demonstrating the lack of such control during his stay in Antsiranana; he noted that out of the 1980 campaign sugar production quota, there is still a stock of 2,350 tons left in Namakia. Why has this quantity not been distributed, in Tananarive, for example?

"Which shows that our present problems are due to disorganization, the lack of a work program, and inadequacy of control by the people."

The latter cannot be achieved if there is no ideological training. This is the explanation for the three-day seminar.

Earlier, the president of the faritany's MONIMA federation, Tovonary Rabetsitota, explained the purpose of the seminar: to see how to regroup and organize the oppressed working-class forces so that they will be able to liberate themselves, that is to say, how to mobilize urban proletarians, peasants, the unemployed, and progressive intellectuals to liberate the oppressed masses.

Mr Rabetsitota made a point of stressing the importance of this seminar, which is being held in the capital: "it proves that MONIMA does indeed exist in this faritany, that MONIMA is working for the unity of the oppressed masses in the whole island, that MONIMA is not a party of the South, but of Madagascar as a whole, that President Monja Jaona is the father of all the Malagasy..."

He then presented an assessment, a rather gloomy one, of the faritany's socio-economic situation, in the urban environment as well as in the rural world.

For his part, faritany president Jonah Rakotoarivelo asserted that "his faritany cordially welcomes all those who want to work to liberate the oppressed people and lead it toward the light."

He concluded by wishing every success to the seminar and with the hope that in their deliberations, the MONIMA militants will think only of the interest of the popular masses and of the nation.

The representatives of the AKFM/KDRSM [Congress Party for Malagasy Independence/Democratic Committee to Support the Malagasy Socialist Revolution], Arsene Ratsifehera, of AREMA [Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution], Albert Zakariasy, of MFM [Militants for the Establishment of a Proletarian Regime], Mr Ramonja, and of UDECMA [Malagasy Christian Democratic Union], Mrs Pierrette Ratsarazafy, also spoke on this occasion to greet and congratulate MONIMA on its re-entry into the Front, to pay homage to the constant patriot that President Monja Jaona is, and to reaffirm that the revolution needs all militant forces to work in concert for its triumph.

After the official opening ceremony of the Antananarivo faritany MONIMA regional seminar, CSR Monja Jaona, accompanied by faritany officials, visited companies and plants to see where our staple product supply difficulties really originate.

TECHNICAL DETAILS OF NOVIB PROJECT DESCRIBED

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 15 Sep 81 p 2

[Excerpts] A few more words might be said about the weekend's event in Antananarivo: the official opening of the Fowl and Swine Breeding and Feed Center of Ambohitriniandrina Antananarivo-Avaradrano and the Dutch Government, presided over by Minister of Interior Ampy Portos, head of the decentralized collectives and acting minister of foreign affairs.

The following figures pertain to the fivondronana [village] of Tana-Avaradrano: area, 529 square kilometers; number of inhabitants, 124,103 (on 31 December 1980); number of families, 11,600; number of firaisampokontany [canton associations], 22; number of fokontany [basic units of economic, political and administrative organization], 204.

In order to promote its economic and social development, the people's council of this fivondronampokontany [union of village associations] has bet heavily on agriculture and more particularly, livestock raising. In August 1978, it decided to set up a swine and fowl breeding center.

In order to carry out the project, the people's council devoted a very large share of its financial and human resources to secondary investments that crisscross this fivondronampokontany. Out of the 30 million granted by the central government, 11 million were devoted to livestock raising. All credits granted by the MDRRA [Ministry of Rural Development and Agrarian Reform], amounting to 4.3 million Malagasy francs, were reserved for the development of fowl raising. The human investment required of the decentralized collectives amounts to over 11 million Malagasy francs. For the establishment of a large center, the basic infrastructure that would supply the subcenters, the Dutch Government (through NOVIB [Dutch Organization for International Cooperation to Development]) offered its aid for project financing. The fivondronampokontany put together its application for foreign aid, which it sent to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 31 August 1978.

It should be mentioned that: The fivondronampokontany has the advantage and privilege of having Radio Neederland established within its territory. The fivondronampokontany project corresponds to the NOVIB objectives within the framework of its activities of aiding less developed countries. This fivondronampokontany also fits into the objectives of the Malagasy National Plan.

In Africa, 26 organizations scattered throughout 17 countries are being financed by NOVIB.

With respect to Madagascar, NOVIB provides financing, in the form of a gift, for the construction and first year's operation of the Fowl and Swine Breeding and Feed Center of the Antananarivo-Avaradrano fivondronampokontany.

NOVIB was represented at the official opening of the Fowl and Swine Breeding and Feed Center by the organization's Secretary General Theunis.

Malagasy participation in the project amounts to 27.4 million Malagasy francs from the Revolutionary Government, the National Economic Development Fund, the Ministry of Rural Development and Agrarian Reform and the local decentralized collectives. Through NOVIB, the Dutch Government contributed 85.6 million Malagasy francs, making a total of 113 million Malagasy francs.

The Antananarivo-Avaradrano center is the first project financed by NOVIB in Madagascar. It has opened the way to close and fruitful cooperation between the Dutch Government and the Democratic Republic of Madagascar. Other similar projects aimed at the regional development of other decentralized collectives and the expansion of this center will consolidate the cooperation between the two countries.

MONJA JAONA VISIT TO TOAMASINA--Toamasina--Monja Jaona, head of the Supreme Council of the Revolution (CSR), met yesterday with the people of Toamasina and visited several large enterprises in the faritany [higher administrative unit], including the Autonomous Port. During his visit to the enterprise under Carnaud (metal packing manufacturer), the head of the CSR learned that 198 workers are employed there. The plant supplies packing materials to SOLIMA [Malagasy Petroleum Company], paint manufacturers, food industries, and so on. The factory produces some 80,000 barrels, 800,000 cans and several types of packaging, for a turnover of some 30 million francs a year. SOLIMA plans to produce asphalt and could order over 100,000 drums next year. However, the plant is experiencing difficulties because of the lack of raw materials, shipping or transport problems and the cancellation of orders by customers. The administrator of the company explained that Carnaud cannot help its Toamasina subsidiary because of the international situation. Monja Jaona then promised to pass this report on to the chief of state. He then met with plant employees to learn about their problems. The workers complained of their inadequate benefits. The problem of supplies was brought up and Monja Jaona proposed that quotas be reserved for enterprises so that workers would not waste their time lining up for their daily needs. He then emphasized the important role played by the workers in the revolution. "It is true that production is still inadequate, but everyone must be aware of what we have. This will enable us to realize our deficiencies and the efforts that must be made to avoid them in the future. (ANTA) [Text] [Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 17 Sep 81 p 1] 11,464

MAJUNGA TRANSPORT FACILITIES--Jean de Dieu Randriantanany, member of the Supreme Council of the Revolution (CSR), has inspected supplies and learned about transport conditions in Mahajanga. Yesterday, he observed progress on construction of the Avotra ferry, which will connect Mahajanga with its western part. Work is being done by the Malagasy Coastal Traffic Company. "We have come to learn what problems might arise," Randriantanany told the builders, who assured him that the ferry should be ready in 3 months at the earliest, because of the lack of necessary materials. Randriantanany reminded builders, technicians and elected officials of the need for frank cooperation and constructive dialog. "We must also think about using materials that we might find here instead of immediately thinking about importing foreign raw materials," he added. Randriantanany then met with supply officials and learned that 300 tons of soap were recently unloaded in Mahajanga. He also noted that rice collection was clearly under that of last year during the same period, whether it be SINPA [National Agricultural Products Company] or FIFABI [expansion unknown]. "Many peasants do not want to sell their rice to these government enterprises, which will again have an effect on supplies. Rice sold to intermediaries is sold at clearly higher prices and officials therefore urge producers not to let themselves be taken in by those who take advantage of their work and the hunger of consumers, thereby causing an economic crisis throughout the country." NRM TERRITORY, TACTICS, S. AFRICAN CONNECTION DEFINED

[Article by Paul Fauvet]

[Excerpts]

ON August 27 three women staggered into the small town of Machaze in Mozambique's central province of Manica.

Blood was still trickling down their faces, over their breasts, and staining the capulanas wrapped round their waists. And it seeped through the strips of linen they had tied round their heads in attempts to staunch the flow from the gashes where their ears had once been.

This horrific mutilation was carried out by members of the self-styled Mozambique Resistance Movement. It is part of a systematic campaign of intimidation against the peasantry in the southern part of Manica province.

In July, the Mozambican army launched an offensive in Manica, and cleared the MRM out of the area around Machaze.

The fighting in Mozambique's central provinces is an inheritance from the Zimbabwe war. The MRM was set up by the Rhodesian Special Branch, and was responsible for numerous acts of sabotage and terrorism inside central Mozambique on behalf of the Smith regime.

DESTROYED

While the Smith regime was still in power, the MRM established itself strongly in southern Manica, close to the Zimbabwe border. Over the past two years the Mozambique army has gradually been clearing areas of its influence. In June 1980, the main MRM base, in the remote Sitatonga Mountains, was destroyed. Earlier this year the MRM was cleaned out of the district of Sussundenga.

This left the MRM with strongholds in Mossurize, the southernmost district of Manica. Mossurize covers a very large area — it is slightly bigger than Swaziland — with a sparse and scattered population, few roads and lots of mountains.

But gradually the MRM presence in the district has been whittled down. Northern and central Mossurize are now quiet, and the centre of the fighting is in southern Mossurize.

Machaze is some 90 km from the Zimbabwe border, and about 50 km north of the Save River. It was chosen as the starting point for the latest army offensive largely because of its permanent supply of clean water. In an area where water is in short supply, this makes it very attractive. Security plus water is the secret of Machaze's remarkable expansion in population.

The MRM had never actually controlled Machaze — but they had raided the centre of the town and they had effectively besieged it.

The South African connection with the MRM is now well-established. Prisoners taken at Sitatonga testified to the arrival of crates of weapons which bore English and Afrikaans markings.

Bissarome Filipe, a 19-year-old MRM member captured by the army in the current offensive, told the Press that he had received military training from South African and Portuguese instructors.

MRM leader Afonso Dhlakama seems to spend much of his time commuting by helicopter between South Africa and Mossurize.

South African aircraft regularly overfly Mozambican airspace — sometimes on reconnaissance flights, and sometimes to drop supplies. The Ministry of Defence has counted 40 such violations but the figure is much higher, since it is quite likely that only a small proportion are detected.

The planes involved have included light aircraft, helicopters, fighter-bombers, and Nord-Atlas transport planes. The latter are used to carry equipment for the MRM into Mossurize.

Regions regularly overflown include areas of Maputo province in the far south, and the northern parts of Gaza province. The latter are areas through which overland infiltration routes could be established.

OFFENSIVE

To make their connection with South Africa easier, the MRM has been filtering bands southwards, and now has men operating in the northern parts of both Gaza aand Inhambane provinces, though the "hottest" area remains Mossurize.

As long as South Africa remains a secure base for counter-revolutionary activity, it will be difficult to get rid of the MRM altogether. But vigorous action by the army can drastically reduce the scope of MRM raids and influence.

In the current offensive great stress is being laid on close collaboration between the army and the local population. Indeed, the army relies on information given by the local people for its knowledge of the movements of MRM bands. And as more areas of Mossurize are brought under control, so the army brings the necessary goods to improve the people's lives — particularly new pumps to alleviate the problems of water supply.

While the MRM tries to persuade the people under its control that their throats will be slit by the army if they go to Machaze, the army in fact, follows a policy of clemency. Leaflets are distributed urging members of the MRM to give themselves up, and making the assurance that no harm will come to anyone who surrenders voluntarily. — Ziana.

JOINT PUBLISHING FIRM ESTABLISHED WITH PORTUGAL

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 12 Oct 81 p 12

[Excerpts] The National Book and Record Institute (INLD of Mozambique) signed an agreement on Saturday with the Portuguese firm "Ulmeiro" to establish a joint enterprise for the publication of books in Mozambique.

The agreement was signed by the INLD director, Joao Correia and by Santos Garcia, one of the administrators of the "Ulmeiro."

This firm will use the installations and equipment of the INLD. The "Ulmeiro" will provide technology, raw materials and additional equipment. The Portuguese publishing house will send to Maputo a team of experts to provide professional training for Mozambicans in Maputo and in Portugal.

The new firm will publish books for the local market, but the bulk of its production is intended for export. Books will be published for markets in Portugal, Angola and other Portuguese-speaking countries, and most of them will be in the education and children's literature fields.

The firm may also publish books in other languages, as, for instance, in Arabic, because of existing agreements between the "Ulmeiro" and Iraq.

The establishment of the mixed INLD-Ulmeiro company is part of an agreement for technical assistance financed through a line of credit opened between the Bank of Portugal and the Bank of Mozambique.

The cooperation between the INLD and the "Ulmeiro" firm may soon be increased through a project for the publication of an English-language magazine dealing mainly with the problems of Southern Africa. This project also involves Zimbabwe.

As a result of the experience to be acquired from cooperation with the "Ulmeiro" firm, the INLD may establish similar agreements with other foreign publishing firms in the near future.

MACHEL STRESSES SNASP MUST USE DEMOCRATIC METHODS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 12 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpts] "Our security services defend peace. They are not secret services, and that is why they have acquired prestige both nationally and internationally," the president of the FRELIMO and of the People's Republic of Mozamibque said yesterday at a ceremony celebrating the sixth anniversary of the foundation of the SNASP [National People's Security Service].

Minister of Security Jacinto Veloso, accompanied by some SNASP cadres and eight members of the vigilance groups, presented a message to Marshal Samora Machel.

In this message, the militants of the Ministry of Security gave their word of honor as communists to each launch a campaign for the observance of socialist legality at all levels.

The deterioration of world peace and security because of the escalation in international imperialism, felt in our region through the minority regime in South Africa, is one of the subjects of this message.

"We find our strength in the people and that is why the people must be respected, defended and cherished. That is why we cannot tolerate among us individuals who reject the most elementary principles for which our people have always fought," the message adds.

The chief of state pointed to the victories achieved by the SNASP as a result of its identification with the people. "The people see the security services as an entity at their own service and also as their own task; that is why we were able to dismantle the most sophisticated network with cadres well trained against criminality and corruption. Our work methods must be democratic, we must ceaselessly foster pride in every citizen without regard to his religion."

According to this study, there were 313 deaths from traffic accidents in 1979, while in 1980, deaths rose to 585. The number of injuries, which had been 2,581 in 1979, rose by 659 in 1980, to a total of 3,240. As for the number of accidents, the 1979 total was 2,094 compared with 2,410 in 1980. GOVERNORS ANNOUNCE NEW PAPER, NOTE COUNTRY'S PRESS NEEDS

Enugu DAILY STAR in English 29 Sep 81 pp 1, 3

[Article by Chris Nwokedi: "Fire for Fire"]

[Text] The Kano State Governor, Alhaji Abubakar Rimi has urged the new National newspaper--the "Satellite"--to fight against corruption and oppression in order to ensure peace, progress and stability of the nation.

Alhaji Abubakar Rimi was speaking in Enugu at the weekend while launching the N6 million Jupiter Press Limited, printers and publishers of the Satellite Group of Newspapers.

He described the Satellite as a newspaper that could and should return fire for fire and stressed the view that the birth of the Satellite was timely, especially now when a section of the Nigerian press had the belief that they could deliberately suppress or hide the truth.

Alhaji Abubakar regretted that some media like the NTA, the FRCN and the New Nigeria had been politicised and urged the Satellite to be fearless and fair and as well help in maintaining the rule of law.

He emphasised that a good newspaper would always criticise the government, group or individuals objectively and would also ensure balance in its news items.

Alhaji Abubakar expressed the hope that the Satellite would live up to expectations and observed that the management and staff of the establishment are made up of progressive elements that could enhance progress in the practice of journalism.

He commended all that contributed to the successful take-off of the paper and promised his government's patronage to the group.

He later asked that some correspondents of the new paper be posted to cover events in his state.

In his own remarks on the occasion, the Anambra State Governor, Chief Jim Nwobodo expressed the hope, expectation and wish of all that the Satellite would excel in its primary roles and functions which he enumerated as to inform and educate, to guide and protect, to interpret and balance and to entertain and not to abuse.

He said that Anambra State needed a virile press, capable of holding its own anywhere adding that it is his prayer that the Satellite would strive to lead the way, in the new brand of dedicated journalism meant to uplift the spirit of our downtredden people and so give them a sense of belonging.

The governor futher expressed the hope that the Jupiter Press Limited would live up to the highest ideals of journalism, face squarely the challenges, whether overt or covert, naked or subtle which he said the paper would have to deal with.

Chief Nwobodo emphasised that the Satellite was not established to abuse, to indict, to pour invectives and venom on human beings but to maintain fairplay as well as ensuring objectivity and honesty of information.

He also made it clear that the paper would not engage in protracted confrontation with constituted authority or deliberate falsehood and declared: "We are aware that the press enjoys unbridled sway and unfettered freedom in developed countries, but we are also aware that the practitioners and actors in the news media in those places, have amply demonstrated unqualified responsibility and left nobody in doubt that they exercise their freedom with objectivity, impartiality and restraint."

Chief Nwobodo pointed out that in an egalitarian society, a good newspaper should strive to help the government arrive peacefully, at the port of a contended society, not as an adversary but as a partner in social construction and in social progress.

He explained that such goal would be achieved only when a newspaper could be true to itself and adhered strictly to the norms of journalistic ethics.

Earlier in an address, the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Jupiter Printing and Publishing Company, Mr John Nwobodo had said that the newspaper was established following the need for a standard international newspaper in the country which would educate the public on the growing need and complexity of the social, political and economic life of the country.

The launching ceremony was attended by eminent personalities from all parts of the Federation including the Plateau State Governor, Mr Solomon Lar, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr Edwin Ume-Ezeoke, legislators from the national and state Houses of Assemblies, commissioners and top government and party officials.

The occasion featured traditional dances from all parts of the State.

HOPE FOR SUCCESS OF HARVESTING CAMPAIGN EXPRESSED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 18 Sep 81 p 4

[Article by Abdallah Faye]

[Text] If rain continues to fall steadily until the beginning of the month of October, the hopes aroused at the beginning of this agricultural season will certainly not be disappointed.

By 30 August, in fact, nearly all the crops looked satisfactory and pointed to a good harvest.

Except for the rain, obviously the most essential factor, the success of the 1981-1982 agricultural season mainly depends on basic preparation. Because of the poor performance of last year and the disastrous results stemming from the upset of marketing circuits (many merchants passing themselves off as big producers), the government learned the necessary lessons and took the required measures.

Return to the Country

Among these measures was an increase in the price to the producer to discourage any speculation and debt relief for the rural world in order to motivate peasants and restore their faith in the future.

These two measures produced the desired results because one could note great enthusiasm in the work of clearing the land, which said a great deal about intentions, and a return to the land justified by the increase in the price to the producer.

It must be added that in order to contribute effectively to the success of this season, the departments concerned took every possible measure to make the elements of production available within the framework of an agricultural program "imposed by the circumstances."

This program essentially consisted of supplying seed, fertilizer and fungicides.

Concerning seed, the amount was slightly over 120,000 tons (good quality peanuts), despite the mediocre results of the previous harvest.

In his report, the minister of rural development emphasized this last point, explaining that despite the fact that a large share of the capital comes from the blocked cooperatives, the seed is good, for it was based on the criterion of quality that the blocking of the cooperatives was done. A counter-valuation "in keeping with the provisions of the financing agreement on reconstitution of the seed capital was done by the Central Economic Cooperation Fund (CCCE) and confirmed this state of affairs because nearly 97 percent of the seed capital was accepted within the framework of the CCCE loan, following an analysis secco by secco [presumably cooperative counter-valuation]."

The problem was not so much the seed as it was the crop value, because a larger quantity of unshelled peanuts was needed to plant a hectare. The distribution of seed, which began early in May and was nearly finished by the end of June, totaled 122,394.431 tons. The share of the large producers was 942 tons, "distributed according to the provisions of a precise contract linking them with SONAR [National Oil Works Supply Company] and requiring them to market their next harvest through the cooperatives."

With respect to eating peanuts, nearly all the production collected was used to build up the seed capital and ensure the next operation. This capital of 1,326.780 tons was distributed to the peasants without major difficulty and on time.

Weakness

Concerning the other seed, the offers made to the people were weak because of the low quantities of seed and the near absence of financing. However, special mention should be made of rice. Nevertheless, SOMIVAC [National Company for the Development of Casamance], unlike SAED [expansion unknown], which was able to meet its needs from local production, imported some 200 tons of rice seed from Gambia.

There was no problem for cotton because essential needs were met in the required time.

Concerning fertilizer, only 50,000 tons were made available to the peasants because of the general financial situation and the indebtedness of the rural world. This limited program does not meet real needs, which explains the people's wish to see it expanded.

However, the fertilizer, begun late, could be spread in time except for urea, which will not be able to be used up this year because of various difficulties. By 1 July, SONAR had distributed 32,553 tons.

Good Rainfall

Since 24 June, nearly all areas have received rain, except for the north, making it possible to begin planting for types that have to be planted in moist ground and the consolidation of plants from dry planting and from the former, in moist ground.

A few areas in the Departments of Louga (Mbedienne), Kebemer (Darou Mousty), the river region (Podor, Dagana) and part of the Diakhao district could not be planted because of the absence or lack of precipitation.

However, with the rain that fell between 14 and 26 July, all these areas were seeded before the end of that month, except for Casamance, Fatick and Louga. This had not occurred for years. The development of the crops was entirely satisfactory.

This year, industrial peanuts had early planting because of the early beginning and intensity of rainfall. By mid July, nearly 90 percent of the areas had been planted and 90 percent of the fields in peanuts have been plowed at least three times.

There was nothing in particular to point out about peanuts, which developed in an entirely satisfactory manner. It should be indicated that after the early surveys, nearly 1 million hectares had been planted in peanuts and every region was able to achieve its crop objectives.

While eating peanuts follow the same trend as industrial peanuts, the same is not true of cotton, whose objectives were not completely attained. The reasons are not yet known. With planting plans totaling 46,000 hectares and harvesting estimates amounting to 40,000 hectares, only 33,185 hectares had actually been planted by 25 July, when peasants halted planting on their own. However, the surveys are correct and the maintenance and fertilizer spreading programs are continuing normally.

Millet and sorghum are going well, with 90 percent of the areas devoted to them made up of souna. Here again, progress is satisfactory, except in the north, where there is a very marked lack of nitrogen fertilizer for millet and sorghum.

Corn programs were limited because of insufficient seed and the absence of any precise system. Seeding involved a smaller area than last year. Only 47,000 hectares were devoted to it, much of this in Sine-Saloum, where 70 percent of the projects are.

Finally, other crops such as niebe, manioc and tobacco are progressing normally, despite some problems with parasites.

DLAMINI CRITICIZES PEOPLE FOR ADOPTING FOREIGN CULTURE

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 1 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE MINISTER for Justice, Mr. Polycarp Dlamini, yesterday strongly criticised the Swazi people for what he called indiscriminate adoption of foreign culture.

The Minister was speaking at the official opening of Entfonjeni Primary School in the northern part of the country where he represented King Sobhuza II.

He told a colourful gathering comprising both students from various schools in that area as well as parents that the Swazis had blindly adopted cultures of other nations even to detriment of their own.

He strongly rejected what he called the belief being held by some Swazis that to be educated was to speak English or take Western liquor as against Swazi traditional beer as many educated Swazis did today.

The Minister also condemned certain foreigners who he said came to this country and then imposed their own cultures upon the Swazis - such as those concerning marriages.

He said when these foreigners came here they imposed marriage by Western rites as against marriage by Swazi law and custom.

The Minister attacked Western marriage for what he called the problems associated with it such as divorce and the sole rights given to the woman over her husband's estate after his death.

He commended Swazi custom in that in the event of some misunderstanding between a man and his wife, family members of the couple are called upon to look into the matter with a view to finding an amicable solution.

If the Swazis decide to do away with Swazi marriage, he recommended that the lobola custom which is part of this customary marriage should also be done away with.

For the first time, the Minister disclosed to the public that eight people were recently hanged in the Mbabane Central Prison for ritual murder cases they had been found guilty of.

The Minister who criticised ritual murder in this country stated that he was informing the public about the hangings as a warning, as rumours were rife that many people who have committed this offence were never hanged in this country.

Murder for ritual purposes, he said was a new phenomenon in Swaziland and he recalled that Swazi muti men never ever came near a dead person, let alone touch it with their own hands. The muti men believed that coming into contact with a dead person would render their medicine powerless, he said.

ARMY, POLICE, PRISON FORCES IN SHOW OF UNITY

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 5 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Pat Nxumalo]

[Text]

KING SOBHUZA's concern at the rift between the army and the police during the past few years seeems to be yieldding the desired results.

This was indicated during the district diamond jubilee celebrations held at Entfonjeni near Piggs Peak when the bands of the Kingdom's three disciplined forces - the army, police and prison services entered the arena together to play the national anthem under the baton of one conductor.

Relations between the Umbutfo Swaziland Defence Force and the Royal Swaziland Police in particular have been sour ever since the establishment of the army about eight years ago.

King Sobhuza has condemned the rift between the two forces and made a strong plea for the creation of a climate of mutual understanding between them.

Saturday's public joint appearance by the three forces was hailed by the public. Members of the disciplined forces later told the Times they were looking forward to the strengthening of their relationships.

One senior Police Officer had high praise for Prince Gabheni, Minister for Home Affairs for what he called the practical role he has played in bringing the three groups together.

Confirming that he had a hand in the present mutual understanding between the three forces, Prince Gabheni said he had been highly impressed by joint performances by Britain's disciplined forces which he witnessed during Prince Charle's wedding.

This, he said, impressed him so much that on his return during preparations for King Sobhuza's Diamond Jubilee celebrations he raised this idea, and with the help of British Army Officer who was then in the country to train the army band, his idea was successfully implemented.

The British Army officer, Captain Roger Tomlinson who helped bring together the three bands, has since returned to Britain.

The three bands are reported to have given one joint performance before the King at Embo State House. They also appeared jointly during the fire-works displays at Lobamba..

Later at a garden party at Entfonjeni on Saturday they played music in turn, and are expected to stage more joint performances during the district celebrations.

The unity obviously has the support of most senior officers in all the three forces.

A senior army officer interviewed by the Times on Saturday was in full support of the unity, particularly after the King's remarks about the friction between the army and the police.

The army officer blamed the friction on senior officers of the two forces. Praising Prince Gabheni for helping bring the three together, a senior police officer stated: "Whoever will dare try to break this unity will have to be carefully watched and exposed."

Prince Gabheni is a member of the Defence Council, though his Ministry has nothing to do with the three disciplined forces.

Several thousand people turned up for Saturday's celebrations but King Sobhuza was absent though he was according to the programme scheduled to address the gathering.

School children in the district had a field day as performances by them dominated the programme.

The next district celebrations this weekend will be held at Siteki in the Lubombo district.

ECONOMIC FUTURE BLEAK, SAYS LECTURER

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 9 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

AN ECONOMIST at the University College of Swaziland has painted a bleak picture of the economy of Swaziland whose growth in total and sectoral production he said has been slowing down since independence.

Dr. M.S. Matsebula, head of the Economics Department at the university, who was giving a lecture on the fiscal effects on production, employment and migration in Swaziland at the Kwaluseni Campus this week stated that while growth in production has been slowing down, growth in population has been accelerating.

The net result, he says has been a slow-down in the growth of per capita incomes, The situation, he stated is worse on Swazi nation land where average standards of living have been declining over 1974 to 1978.

"Latest estimates also indicate that average standards of living are falling for Swaziland as a whole," said Dr. Matsebula who, also stated that the slow-down in the growth of production since independence is coupled with rising urban unemployment.

Associated with the slow-down in production growth and rising urban unemployment, he said is rising migration. The picture painted by presently available figures, Dr. Matsebula stated: "is that all is not well with the Swaziland economy."

He noted that it was now widely recognised that the public sector could be instrumental in improving the situation.

Dr. Matsebula listed a number of what he called appropriate fiscal options which should be followed if government is to encourage an increase in agricultural production plus an increase in the urban employment rate.

These include reducing the rate of public consumption out of public revenues; which he said meant reducing the proportion of public revenues allocated to the recurrent account of the public budget.

However he pointed out that reducing the rate of public consumption need not entail the reduction of public services, but that it could be achieved through a reduction in the waste of public resources and an increase in the productivity of civil servants.

"The recently gazetted guidelines for the use of public vehicles is a welcome thing as it is designed to reduce public waste without reducing the delivery of public services," he stated.

He also suggested raising the average effective tax rate on urban wage income or urban rental income. This, he explained need not entail raising the nominal tax rates in the income tax legislation.

"It can be achieved via an increase in the efficiency of tax-officers so that tax actually collected equals tax payable. It can also be achieved via a removal of some of the deductions whose existence can be questioned on equity and efficiency considerations, he stated.

Another suggestion is raising the average effective net indirect tax rate or urban wage subsidy.

The wage subsidy, according to Dr. Matsebula, has the effect of lowering the wage paid by the employer without lowering the wage received by the worker.

"Faced with a lower effective wage, the employer will be able to increase the number of workers taken on. This will result in higher production, higher tax resources flowing into government coffers, and higher public spending which generates further production in agriculture and non-agricultures, and so on," he said.

He also pointed out that the wage-subsidy need not entail the disbursement of actual cash by the Treasury, but can be granted by adjusting tax payable by employers.

"Finally, it is important to note that this wage-subsidy should be applicable to all employers in the urban sector; not just a few in selected industries," said Dr. Matsebula.

He also observed that it would seem that minimum wages in the urban sector can be raised without adverse effects on agricultural production and the urban employment rate, provided the urban wage subsidy is raised.

IMPORTATION OF S.A. VEGETABLES, FRUITS STILL BANNED

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 2 Oct 81 p 2

[Text]

PEOPLE reading the latest Government Gazette may be attracted by a notice concerning the importation of plants into Swaziland and get the impression that the ban on the importation of vegetables and fruits from South Africa has been lifted.

Not so - it is still in force.

The Permanent Secretary for Health, Mr. Mboni Dlamini, said the ban will continue for as long as the cholera menace exists. The September Government Gazette notice in question states that plants and living materials which do not require a permit for importation into the country include: Assorted fruit and vegetables (including no more than 20kg. citrus per person) and candied citrus peel.

It also includes cut flowers, wreaths and herbaceous plants. A sub section includes plants bearing fruit.

The notice is published by the Ministry of Agriculture.

What is likely to make people reading the notice think it refers to actual fruit and vegetables is that one sub-section specifically refers to trees bearing fruit and another reads is if it refers to actual fruit.

Mr. Dlamini said he believes the responsible Ministry refers to seedlings of vegetables and fruit.

The amendment of the Public Health Regulations which prohibits the importation of fruit and vegetables reads in part: "prohibits the importation into Swaziland of any animal, article or things from any place or area outside Swaziland which place, area, animal or article or thing is considered to be infected with any disease. Impose conditions on the importation or exportation or conveyance."

It specifically names South Africa and Mozambique as such areas.

When a Times reporter read the notice to the Minister of Health, Dr. Samuel Hynd on the telephone he said: "I am worried this may confuse people. If you publish a story about that, you had better include the Public Health Regulation under which the ban is covered."

A person convicted of contravening this regulation is liable to a fine of E100 or imprisonment for three months or both. The vegetables or fruits may be forfeited and destroyed or disposed of in another way.

The public should be reminded then - until the ban imposed because of cholera is lifted, vegetables and fruit may NOT be imported, despite the Gazette.

Plants and Living Material Which Do Not Require a Permit

These must be bought in the Republic of South Africa only, by private individuals for immediate use or consumption only and not for sale. Source of origin must be documented.

A. Any tree, shrub, herb or vine, including ornamentals or plants bearing fruit and soil, originating at a state registered nursery in the Republic of South Africa. These must be accompanied by proof of origin (nursery labels, invoices, receipts etc).

B. Assorted fruit and vegetables (including no more than 20kg. citrus per person, and candied citrus peel.

C. Cut flowers, wreaths and herbaceous pot plants.

The Ministry of Agriculture notice in the Government Gazette. Confusing? Better not, the fruits and vegetables ban is still in force--contravention of which is E100 or 3 months imprisonment.

ZAMBIA, ZIMBABWE HEADING FOR BOUNDARY DISPUTE OVER LAKE KARIBA

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 12 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA AND ZIMBABWE are heading for a protracted boundary dispute on Lake Kariba due to the non-availability of data to show where the boundary lies on the lake.

The boundary between the two countries, is the course of the River Zambezi but since the formation of the lake in the 50s, the course of the river on the lake has become difficult to trace.

Commissioner of Lands, Mr Tennyson Banda and Director of Fisheries, Mr Ephraim Muyanga agreed that the confusion with regard to the boundary would in future cause a lot of problems when the fishing industry on the Lake improves.

During the tour of Siavonga and Lake Kariba with Minister of Lands and Natural Resources Mr Clement Mwananshiku, it was learnt that Zimbabwe claimed ownership of several islands on the lake which were only a short distance from Zambia.

Most of the islands were possessed by Zimbabwe during the liberation war when fishing on the Zambian side had ground to a halt due to raids by rebel troops in the area.

It was, also extemely difficult for Zambian fishermen to know where the boundary between the two countries was because there were no floaters on the lake to mark the end of the Zambian territorial waters, Mr Muyunga observed.

District executive secretary, Mr Lubasi Mutukwa also complained of the influx of Zimbabwean fishermen on the Zambian side.

He said there was a lot smuggling of Kapenta from the Zambian side to Zimbabwe at night by fishermen from that country.

"Several white Zimbabweans have applied for licences and plots on the Zambian side because they have the necessary equipment to launch full-scale Kapenta fishing. But it would be better to balance between indigenous people and Zimbabweans to avoid problems in future," Mr Mutukwa told the minister.

"There is also the risk of security because these people take kapenta to their side," he said.

At a meeting with fishermen at the boma, Mr Mwananshiku urged them to remember that Lake Kariba was a shared resource between two countries and that the only way to derive maxium benefit from it was through co-operation.

"Zambia and Zimbabwe should work together to exploit the resources of Lake Kariba peacefully and in an orderly manner," he said.

He said the people of Siavonga have been for many years greatly disadvantaged and it was now time that they enjoyed peace and prosperity.

MINISTER GOMA HAILS CZECHOSLOVAK MANPOWER AID

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 15 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

FOREIGN Affairs Minister Lameck Goma has said Zambia welcomes any help aimed at overcoming the shortage of trained manpower by her international allies.

Speaking in Lusaka yesterday Professor Goma said this had been and continued to be one of the most serious handicaps to development since independence.

The minister was speaking at a luncheon he hosted in honour of outgoing Czechoslovak Ambassador to Zambia, Mr Vaclav Maly.

Professor Goma said Zambia appreciated Czechoslovak aid in this field which was in form of the many experts working in various development projects, and Zambians training in that country.

He said Zambia realises that it can learn a lot from Czechoslovakia's experience in building an industrialised economy.

"It is against this background that our two governments have concluded a number of agreements covering many fields," he added.

Professor Goma said these include the supply and production of skilled manpower, urban transport, tractor assembly and food storage which are important to Zambia's development efforts.

The minister said President Kaunda's visit to that country last year opened up many more avenues of co-operation and went a long way in assisting to lay a firm foundation for progress in many fields.

Professor goma also praised Czechoslovakia's stand on international issues, in particular its efforts to identify itself with the aspirations of the oppressed people of the world, and Southern Africa especially.

"We in Zambia greatly appreciate the generous assistance your great country has rendered and continues to render in this respect", he told the ambassador.

He thanked the envoy for the good work he had done since his term started in 1978 which has led to the strengthening of relations between the two countries.

Ambassador Maly told the minister that Czechoslovakia admired the Party, leadership and people of Zambia's bravery against the acts of aggression against them by imperialist and racist forces in Southern Africa.

He pointed out that despite these acts from the former Rhodesian rebel regime and now the South African apartheid regime, Zambians have stood firm and continued to help their brothers and sisters in Namibia and South Africa to fight oppression.

Mr Maly said Czechoslovakia condemned South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia and its apertheid system inside South Africa and will continue to support morally and materially liberation movements like SWAPO.

SOME PARTY OFFICIALS IN SOLWEZI ACCUSED OF SMUGGLING GOODS TO ZAIRE

Minister's Statement

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

SOME top Party and Government officials in Solwezi are involved in smuggling of essential commodities to Zaire, Minister of State for Legal Affairs and Solicitor-General Mr Ludwig Sondashi charged in Lusaka yesterday.

Some of the leaders were openly using Government vehicles to transport essential commodities to the Zairean border town of Kipushi where they sold them at inflated prices.

The minister was speaking on his return from a tour of his Solwezi East constituency.

Police and customs officers found it difficult to control smuggling because top Party and Government leaders were involved in the racket.

Villagers, especially those in Chieftainess Musaka and Chief Chikola's areas, saw no reason why they should stop smuggling when top leaders from Solwezi openly carried out the racket.

Mr Sondashi said he could not conduct political education effectively among the villagers to persuade them to stop the racket when leaders broke the law with impunity.

No person in authority in Solwezi could claim he was ignorant of the racket because it was common knowledge that smuggling was being encouraged by people in regular employment.

AND NO ONE IN THE PROVINCE WAS PREPARED STOP THE RACKET WHICH THE MINISTER SAID WAS TARNISHING THE IMAGE OF THE PARTY AND ITS GOVERNMENT.

In Luanshya, the Party and its Government wants stiffer punishment meted out to ~~people found hoarding essential goods~~ and overcharging.

This is one of several resolutions passed at the end of a two-day UNIP district annual conference at the weekend.

Freedom House Awaiting Report

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 14 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

FREEDOM House is awaiting a full report from North-Western Province on charges that some top Party and Government officials in Solwezi are involved in smuggling of essential commodities to Zaire

Freedom House administrative secretary Dr Henry Matipa said this when he commented on reports that leaders in Solwezi were using Government vehicles to transport essential goods to the Zairean border town of Kipushi where they sold them at inflated prices.

The racket was reported on Monday by Minister of State for Legal Affairs and Solicitor-General Mr Ludwig Sondashi on his return to Lusaka from a tour of his Solwezi East constituency.

Mr Sondashi said police and customs officers found it difficult to control smuggling because top Party and Government leaders were involved in the racket.

Villagers, especially those in Chieftainess Musaka and Chief Chikola's area saw no reason why they should stop smuggling when top leaders from Solwezi were openly involved.

Dr Matipa, who is Member of Central Committee, could neither deny nor confirm reports that UNIP headquarters was investigating the matter.

Authority

Mr Sondashi had also said no person in authority in Solwezi could claim ignorance of the racket because it was common knowledge that smuggling was being encouraged by people in regular employment.

But Solwezi governor Mr Sylvester Sikufweba said yesterday he was not aware of any top Party and Government officials who smuggle essential goods to Zaire using Government vehicles.

However he conceded that some top civil servants were aiding smugglers by leasing their private vanettes for hire to Zairean women to transport essential commodities to Kipushi.

Mr Sikufweba said he was not aware some top Party and Government leaders in the district were using Government vehicles to smuggle commodities to Zaire.

"This is complete news to me. All I know is that some civil servants had been leasing their private cars for hire to Zaireans to take them to the border and these have been warned to stop the practice."

Mr Sikufweba said several people involved in the practice had been reported to the police but were later released for lack of evidence.

Smuggling was difficult to prove unless the culprits were actually seen crossing the border with the contraband.

Mr Sikufweba said the absence of a police post had made it difficult to control smuggling at the border.

He said he would investigate Mr Sondashi's charges.

TAZARA TO CONTINUE TO DEPEND ON CHINESE EXPERTS

PRC Diplomat's Statement

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 12 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

ZAMBIAN railway technicians and engineers are not yet competent enough to run the Tanzania Zambia Railway Authority (Tazara) without the help of Chinese technical advisers, acting Charge d'affaires to Zambia Mr Chen Yiming said yesterday.

Mr Chen, who is economic counsellor, said it would be difficult to make comparisons between the Zambian and Chinese rail experts but stressed that the Chinese in Tazara were competent enough to serve on the line.

He was referring to Press reports that some Zambian technicians and artisans were resigning because Tazara was recruiting Chinese "experts" who had been on the same course with Zambians.

Tazara has Chinese technical advisers brought in under an agreement reached during a tripartite meeting of Tanzania, Zambia and China in August last year.

Reports that the Chinese experts were recruited by Tazara were false, said Mr Chen.

He confirmed that some Zambians continued to leave Tazara for greener pastures but said that was purely the Government's problem as the Chinese were in Tazara merely to help in its operations.

"Monetary issues are for the Zambian and Tanzanian governments to solve," said Mr Chen.

He praised Tazara general manager Brigadier-General Charles Nyirenda who he described as competent. But some of his administrative staff were said to be incompetent resulting in mismanagement.

He cited shortage of qualified staff to run the railway as the major problem facing Tazara.

Under the third phase China has offered Tazara loans in form of spare parts.

Under phase two of the accord China had over 700 experts in Tazara, 311 of them in Zambia. Under phase three 150 were brought in, out of which 54 were based in Zambia and the rest in Tanzania.

Tazara would continue to depend on Chinese experts for some time, he said.

Mass Resignations by Zambians

Lusaka SUNDAY TIMES in English 11 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

TANZANIA Zambia Railway Authority cannot retain trained Zambian personnel because of low salaries and lack of advancement.

Out of the 74 Chinese-trained Zambians who joined Tazara at its inception only 16 have remained, according to reliable sources in Lusaka.

The sources said most of those who quit the railway which is jointly owned by Tanzania and Zambia were in middle management, technicians and artisans.

Some resigned because the organisation recruited Chinese "experts" who had been on the same course with Zambians.

The sources disclosed that Tazara had lamentably failed to staff the accounts department on the Zambian side because of poor pay.

Management was now understood to be recruiting Pakistanis whose pay scale started at grade 15 which Zambian accountants felt was not equated to their profession.

Seven years ago Tazara employed 17 locally trained artisans, but only five were still in employment.

Most of those who left joined parastatal organisations including the mining industry where they are reported to be earning twice as much.

The situation is equally bad for University of Zambia graduates who are said to have quit because of frustrations. Of the eight recruited directly from Unza, only four were still in their jobs.

The others joined parastatals and Government ministries where they now hold senior positions.

The sources said a proposal for increased pay was turned down by the board of directors after the council of ministers had approved the recommendation.

The board rejected the proposal for fear that if salaries for Zambians were raised their counterparts in Tanzania would demand a corresponding rise.

The Tanzania region had managed to retain most posts including those supposed to be filled by Zambians.

The Railway Workers Union of Zambia officials were understood to have suggested to the Government to subsidise Tazara so that Zambian workers received salaries equivalent to those paid to their counterparts on Zambia Railways.

Tazara is Zambia's lifeline to the sea. It played a crucial role during the Zimbabwe independence war when the southern route became unreliable because of rebel commandos raids.

Lack of incentives, low salaries and stagnation contributed to mass resignations by Zambians.

MINISTER SAYS NATION TO RECEIVE IMF FUNDS FOR AUGUST, SEPTEMBER

Minister's Press Conference

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 15 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA's flagging economy is headed for a major boost when the country finally draws K180 million in Special Drawing Rights from the International Monetary Fund under the K800 million package signed early this year.

Finance Minister Mr Kebby Musokotwane said in Lusaka yesterday that Zambia would draw the money for August and September because she had now met IMF conditions.

Mr Musokotwane was addressing a Press conference he called to explain why there had been delays in making the second draw from the K1 billion loan facility from the IMF.

The minister who has just returned from Washington announced that the IMF had approved a K59 million compensation to Zambia to help her sort out foreign exchange problems.

Compensatory money is given to countries experiencing foreign exchange problems.

Mr Musokotwane said the country was going through serious economic problems because of disruption in the flow of imports like machinery and spare parts.

"These caused severe problems in the economy and it affected the balance of payments position. If I said that things have improved in the last nine months, I would be telling a lie, the truth is they have not."

Highlighting some of the problems, he said copper prices had beed depressed and the country was not meeting production figures on the mines while cobalt prices had dropped.

"Since mining constitutes our economy, these problems have continued to be a source of grave concern and the result of this is that both our forecasts on the IMF and foreign exchange have been proved wrong."

The foreign exchange forecast was off target by K179 million.

The other development was that because of the fall in foreign exchange earnings, the country had continued to experience foreign exchange shortages in industry and a number of industries were running below safe margins.

These drawbacks disrupted Government plans because goods were not coming in and no revenue was collected from sales tax and customs.

Because companies were working below capacity, they had not generated enough profit and could not pay tax.

"This is what the IMF team found out when it last came here to review the performance of our economy."

The other problem was that the Government increased salaries of workers at all Government levels including political leaders.

"This meant certain unavoidable expenditure in the first part of 1981 and for a number of parastatal organisations to continue to grow, the Government allowed them to charge economic prices and to catch up, they needed fresh injection of funds."

Because of depressed prices of copper, Zambia could not reduce the pipeline in the balance of payments, "and this is where the IMF found us when they came".

It was clear that the Government was not in its limits as far as local borrowing was concerned because its revenue sources had been disrupted.

It was not easy for commercial banks to be within limits because they had to fund various important areas of the national economy like problems connected with the bumper maize harvest.

If Zambia had met the performance criteria required by the IMF, two draws would have been made after the one made in June of K120 million.

"After making these findings, the IMF team reported to its board and recommended that we get this facility."

The first drawing of K120 million had been used to help the banks' overdrawn position and to clear freight arrears in South Africa and at Dar es Salaam port.

The compensatory allocation would be used to reduce the pipeline.

Mr Musokotwane would not say whether it would not have been prudent for the Government to cancel an order of new Mercedes Benz cars for the top leadership in view of the foreign exchange crisis.

He was not the right man to answer the question since he did not make the decision but admitted that consideration should have been given to the issue.

Money Must Revive Business, Industry

[Editorial]

[Text]

ZAMBIA can breathe a sigh of relief now that the International Monetary Fund (IMF) has agreed to release the second drawing of the K800 million loan facility negotiated early this year.

The hard-nosed chiefs of the IMF had withheld the money after the first drawing of K300 million because, the grapevine has it, we did not fulfil the set conditions.

We were in a "fix" that forced Finance Minister Kebby Musokotwane and Bank of Zambia governor Bitwell Kuwani to dash to Washington and to almost renegotiate for the money.

When he announced the result of his trip at a Press briefing yesterday Mr Musokotwane would not disclose what terms we failed to abide by and what new ones have been set for us to draw K90 million and make monthly withdrawals thereafter.

We are lucky we succeeded but we should not hope to be third-timers.

Be that as it may what is important is to see that the money is put to good use to revive business and industrial activity which is at a standstill. That's what the IMF loan is for, isn't it?

According to economic circles the first drawing did nothing to activate the economy or even relieve companies which had run up huge credits with overseas suppliers.

That shouldn't happen again or else it is a waste of time calling the business and industrial community to symposia like the one last month in Ndola and the other being opened by Prime Minister Mundia in Livingstone today.

People are attending these meetings with the full confidence that the Party and its Government is keen to find solutions which will bring Zambia's economy back on an even keel.

The discussions at those meetings are candid as everybody is concerned to see an economic upswing.

Let us build on that confidence by living up to our commitments. The announcement that the Government had stopped payments to its creditors erodes confidence.

Mr Musokotwane says: "We are scrutinising all payments so that we only pay what we can afford. It is only a stupid husband who spends K600 when he earns K200 per month."

That is true but is he forgetting that many companies — private and parastatal — are going to be affected as they have done jobs for the Government? They need the money.

However, we are hopeful that this "hold payment" order is not going to last into the next budget at the end of January 1982.

Perhaps it is a measure to stop some ministries which have squandered their budgetary allocations from signing cheques which are bound to be dishonoured.

But many firms like contractors depend on being paid for jobs they have done to be able to pay their workers. With this ruling some contractors will not only fold up but there are likely to be more uncompleted Government projects.

MONZE APPEALS TO ZAIRE RAILWAYS TO PAY ARREARS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA Railways has threatened to stop moving the Zairean cargo if the National Railways of Zaire does not settle more than K4 million it owes Zambia Railways, general manager Mr Basil Monze said in Kabwe yesterday.

Zambia Railways has suspended indefinitely credit facilities to Zambian Government departments and companies which have not paid their arrears.

But Mr Monze said goods in the pipeline for Zaire would be transported.

Railways industrial participation and public relations manager Mr Alex Lubinda said in a statement issued earlier that Zambia Railways had not suspended goods for Zaire.

"But we have asked our sister railways in Zaire to pay whatever is due to Zambia Railways to help in diesel fuel cash payment for our locomotives which haul the imports and exports to Zaire," he said.

His company needed the money for the smooth running of the system and the continuity in the flow of Zairean cargo.

"This is a two-way process and Zambia Railways is keen to help Zaire."

The Zaireans were not being given an ultimatum but Mr Monze appealed to them to pay the arrears as quickly as possible.

Mr Monze declined to name Zambian companies and Government departments affected by his action but said they owed his company K2.5 million.

"For us, this is a lot of money."

Meanwhile, the board of directors of the defunct Rhodesia Railways unitary system has approved the budget for 1981/82 to support the staff and meet operational expenses.

Permanent secretary in the Ministry of Power, Transport and Communications, Mr Esau Nebwe, who did not disclose the amount allocated in the budget, said the money would be spent on the running of the defunct railways.

Mr Nebwe was speaking at the Lusaka International Airport on arrival from Zimbabwe where he attended a board meeting.

He was accompanied by Mr Monze, senior under-secretary at the Ministry of Finance Mr Peter Magande and chief accountant Mr Cuthbert Sengebwila, according to Zana.

MONZE SEEKS RECONCILIATION WITH RWUZ OFFICIALS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA Railways general manager Mr Basil Monze has called for reconciliation with the Railway Workers Union of Zambia which opposed his appointment.

The union had accused Mr Monze of creating problems for the workers when he was permanent secretary for Power, Transport and Communications and chairman of the railways board.

It still opposes his appointment because of his alleged implication in the controversial Mumpanshya commission report on Zambia Railways.

Mr Monze, who was last permanent secretary for Lands and Natural Resources, says in the latest publication of Railway News that he had considered issues raised by the union.

"I have carefully and seriously examined the points raised by RWUZ officials following my appointment, believing that their concerns are the viability of Zambia Railways and the welfare of workers.

"For my part, these are my concerns and since my arrival I and my managers have paid specific attention to constructive suggestions made."

Fair demands such as clean railway stations and office premises are welcome provided they are consistent with the actual earning capacity of the company.

He is pleased "with the change" and the chance he was given of having direct parastatal experience, "especially with the mandate to run Zambia Railways in the interest of the whole nation".

"Zambia Railways is centrally crucial not only in terms of transport but I am also conscious of the international ramifications connected with the company's operations."

He calls for harmony among railway employees through "vigorous and impartial" application of staff rules and industrial procedures.

"Personally, I have not shortened my long temper, nor have I indulged in self pity. In official work, I am determined to maintain a thick skin and keep it so clean that mud aforethought will not stick when slung to blind my natural goodwill towards others."

He discloses that the recent salary increases for the railways workers have aggravated the financial position of the company.

When he took over as general manager last July, Zambia Railways was operating on overdrafts varying between K7 million and K9 million.

Asked what plans he had to take the company out of the crisis, he said he had asked the Government to examine the capital structure and persuaded the mines and the Government to rationalise the copper traffic allocations to make the company's share sizeable to avoid subsidies.

Other measures included expanding and improving the service to attract local traffic, re-examine the traffic rates selectively against actual cost of transportation, selling off unutilisable and obsolete railway property profitably

AUTHORITIES FAIL TO RESPOND TO IPRD ECONOMY BLUEPRINT

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Oct 81 p 5

[Excerpt]

THE Industrial Participatory Democracy Department's blueprint on economic recovery has not received any response from authorities it was referred to, IPD director Mr Alexander Kwibisa said in Lusaka.

The reason for this could be pressure of work on the authorities expected to review it.

Mr Kwibisa was commenting on whether the controversial document, which was circulated early this year, had been thrown out.

Highly-placed Government sources say the Office of the Prime Minister had thrown out the document.

In April, Prime Minister Mundia quizzed the department on how the document was made public before the Central Committee, President Kaunda and the Cabinet had discussed it.

The document titled "Blueprint on the implementation of Party economic policies" was circulated in Lusaka in February and the Sunday Times received a copy from provincial political secretary in the department Dr George Chambo.

Central Committee Member in-charge of the department Mr Shadreck Soko has since dissociated himself from the circulation of the document which he said was "issued while I was away in Moscow".

Mr Kwibisa said his department had not been informed that the blueprint had been rejected. "If it is thrown out, we could do nothing since we are beggars."

Since the document was given to the higher authorities early this year, there had been no further developments on it. "Even on our part, we have not initiated any moves aimed at discussing the document," said Mr Kwibisa.

PARTY OFFICIALS PRAISE GDR RELATIONS, AID

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpts]

Meanwhile, Party Secretary-General Mulemba has praised the German Democratic Republic for its commitment to the social and economic well-being of Zambians.

In a message to GDR leader Erich Honecker on his country's 32nd national day, the Party chief said Berlin's commitment to improving Zambia's social, economic and technological standing had been proved in many ways.

"The arrival in Berlin recently of many Zambian young men and women to learn the various skills in your country signifies the determination and commitment of your government to assist us in our struggle for economic, social and technological emanciation."

Speaking at a reception on Wednesday night, administrative secretary at Freedom House and Member of the Central Committee Dr Henry Matipa said Zambia appreciated the assistance she was receiving from that country.

Dr Matipa said Zambia particularly appreciated the role the GDR was playing in the establishment of State farms to improve food output.

Since 1970 Zambia and the GDR had signed agreements which have resulted in the setting up of various joint projects.

The GDR is engaged in the training of Zambians in journalism, mining, agriculture, forestry and engineering.

He thanked the GDR for its material and moral support to liberation movements in Southern Africa.

Such support strengthened the fighting cadres in their efforts to free themselves from racist and fascist bondage.

He called on peace-loving nations to give assistance to SWAPO and the African National Congress of South Africa in their fight for self-determination.

Progressive nations should render assistance to Frontline states, to enable them to defeat the enemy.

Dr Matipa said recent developments in Angola and Namibia were of great concern to Zambia as racist South Africa continued to murder innocent people while the world looked on helplessly.

He observed that GDR, like Zambia, supported the principle of detente in Europe based on the principle of good neighbourliness, sovereignty, equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of another country, mutual advantage and peaceful co-existence.

MINISTER SAYS CUBA OFFERS FIVE HUNDRED ZAMBIA SCHOLARSHIPS

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 10 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

CUBA has offered over 500 scholarships to Zambians to train in agricultural and mechanical engineering, Lands and Natural Resources Minister of State, Mr Nephas Tembe, said yesterday.

He said that it was now up to Zambia to make a formal request to Cuba if it wants to take up the scholarships.

Mr Tembo, who has just come back from Cuba, where he went to attend that country's 20th anniversary of the defence of the Cuban Revolution together with Lusaka Urban district youth chairman, Mr William Banda, said his delegation was highly impressed with the agricultural development taking place there.

"We in Zambia can learn a lot from Cuba in so far as agriculture is concerned. We were impressed by its scientific management of agriculture:

The Cubans know exactly how many tonnes of crops they expect each year, rains or no rains," he said.

The Minister of State added that Cuban agriculture was highly mechanised. At the moment, he said, there were about 32,000 tractors in use in Cuba.

CSIDA TO SET UP SPARE PARTS MANUFACTURING UNIT

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Oct 81 p 2

[Text]

THE Commonwealth Secretariat Industrial Development Association is to set up a spare part manufacturing unit in Zambia to help the country save thousands of Kwacha in foreign exchange.

This was announced yesterday by leader of a three-man association team Mr Roy Mattar at the end of its tour of parastatal and private companies in the country.

He was speaking when the team called on Foreign Affairs Minister of State Dr Mutumba Bull.

Mr Mattar said the team came to find out how the country's industrial sector was operating and establish in which way the Commonwealth could help in implementing remedial measures where necessary.

While the team noted with admiration how the country's industrial sector had rapidly developed, it also identified areas which needed expansion.

During the tour his team, Indeco and the National Commission for Development Planning earmarked numerous projects which needed expansion.

Apart from backing those industries with good potential for expansion, the association would work on the establishment of a spare part manufacturing unit.

Mr Mattar said the setting up of the unit to produce buiding equipment spare parts would save the country thousands of Kwacha in foreign exchange and this would bring to an end their importation.

The association evaluated some existing feasibility studies and that what remained now was to ascertain ways in which assistance could be brought in.

Dr Bull said Zambia would put everything possible at the disposal of the association in its efforts to boost industrial activity.

COMMONWEALTH BODY TO ASSIST IN SETTING UP STEEL, SPARE PARTS INDUSTRY

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 9 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE Commonwealth Secretariat is to assist Zambia to establish two industries to manufacture steel and spare parts for cars, tractors, caterpillars and other industrial vehicles.

Disclosing this yesterday, Mr Roy Mattar, leader of the three-man delegation from the Industrial Development Unit of the Secretariat, said this was in response to a request by the Zambian Government which has asked them to start preparing plans.

This will help Zambia to save a lot of foreign exchange spent on steel and spare parts which are imported at a high cost.

Mr Mattar, whose team has just concluded a study of problems facing Zambia's parastatal organisations, was speaking in Lusaka when his delegation called on the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, Dr Mutumba Bull.

He said his delegation had held discussions with officials from the Industrial Development Corporation (INDECO) and identified many industries that needed expansion.

The Secretariat will provide the required expertise to assist ailing parastatal companies improve their operations.

"We all have problems, but our aim is to find out what your problems are and how the secretariat could assist to solve them," he said.

His team was impressed with the "great strides" made by Zambia in the industrial sector and has prescribed remedial measures to help some parastatal organisations overcome some of their economic ills.

The team also evaluated various feasibility studies and has advised the government on the economic viability of some of the industries it intends to establish.

Mr Mattar said both the steel and spare parts industries, once established, woiuld help the country to save valuable foreign exchange now spent on importing the products.

The steel which would be manufactured would be used by the construction industry.

In her welcome remarks, Dr Bull said the economic mission undetaken by the Secretariat was important and promised to facilitate the delegations meetings with officials of the all the relevant ministries.

It would afford Zambia the opportunity to have an insight of the problems that have beset the parastatal sector and learn how some of these difficulties could be overcome.

NATION SEEKS TO EXPLOIT COAL, PROMOTE CANADIAN OIL EXPLORATION

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 14 Oct 81 p 7

[Text]

PARIS. — Minister of Mines Mufaya Mumbuna has invited the French consulting firm, Sofremines, to take part in the exploitation of newly-discovered coal deposits in the Western and Southern provinces.

Speaking at a luncheon he was given by the company on Monday, Mr Mumbuna said because Zambia wanted to diversify her sources of energy and preserve her natural forests, it was keen to exploit her coal potential.

The uncontrolled felling of trees for fire-wood had done much damage to the country's natural forests, he said.

The minister told the luncheon, which was attended by senior officials in the French mining industry, that Zambia was safe for their investments and had much economic potential.

Mr Mumbuna also visited the headquarters of the Association of French Manufacturers of mining equipment where he met representatives of various companies related to the industry.

In August, it was announced that a consortium of Canadian companies would spend K30 million in a four-year oil prospecting venture which starts in Western Province next year.

Mr Mumbuna, who signed the agreement with Luena Hydro Carbon Company, described the deal as a landmark and turning point in the country's mining industry.

With Zambia spending about 20 per cent of her earnings on oil, a breakthrough in the venture would greatly help the country achieve a fuller development.

The agreement was the result of a direct appeal by President Kaunda to a Canadian government delegation at a luncheon he hosted in October last year.

President Kaunda asked the group to solicit for assistance on behalf of Zambia among Canadian oil exploration industry in a comprehensive programme of exploration for oil in the country. — ZANA/Business Mail Staff.

CORPORATE PLANNING OFFICER NOTES BAD ZAMBIA EFFECTS OF BLACK MARKETEERING

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 13 Oct 81 p 7

[Text] A Corporate planning officer has said that black marketeering has serious adverse effects on economic development.

Zambia Railways corporate planning officer, Mr. David Musona was speaking over the week-end when he presented a paper on problems and prospects of economic development in Zambia.

Mr. Musona was speaking at the UNIP district annual conference for Kabwe Urban held at Kabwe Trades Training Institute.

Mr. Musona said Party members should be reminded of the existence of black marketeering in country and the need to find "a permanent cure of this disease."

Mr. Musona said black marketeering was nothing but exploitation of man by man and had serious effects because it affected economic development of a country.

He said the other factors which inhibited economic growth included weakness in the plan implementation machinery at both central and provincial levels.

Mr. Musona said however that the Third National Development Plan, in its present shape, represents a major national endeavour to correct the past trends. – Zana.

ENERGY COUNCIL RAPS PROPOSED TRAM TRANSPORT FOR LUSAKA

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 10 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE newly-formed National Energy Council has described as "a disaster" the proposed introduction of the tram transport system in Lusaka.

Chairman of the council, Mr Abel Mkandawire vowed in an interview with Zana in Lusaka that he will fight against the introduction of trams in the city because it is a costly venture.

Speaking from his office at Behrens Engineering where he is Managing Director, Mr Mkandawire said Lusaka with its population which is less than one million people does not need a tram system of transportation.

"This is a disaster. Lusaka does not need trams. I am confident about it," he said.

He said, however, that what the city needs is the electric trolley bus transport system which is cheaper to operate and install.

Mr Mkandawire, whose Energy Council came into existence late last year by an Act of Parliament, said the tram system is costly because its installation called for the widening of roads and streets.

He said in addition, a great amount of work need to be carried out to lay rails, and overhead electrict lines.

"But if we are to introduce trolley buses, all we need do is to install overhead electric lines," he said and added that this venture would not need the installation of poles because the existing street poles used for street lights can be used.

He disclosed that a number of European countries were going back to the trolley buses abandoning the trams because they are expensive to install and operate.

He pointed out that it would be advisable for the Zambian authorities to go back to the country which has offered to install trams to, instead, provide trolley buses.

"From my personal knowledge, the country providing trams is also very good at manufacturing trolley buses," the Energy Council chief said.

Mr Mkandawire said the introduction of the trams in Lusaka will dominate discussions at the next meeting of the Energy Council scheduled for the end of this month before advising the government on the issue.

"From any engineering point of view, existing street poles can be used for a trolley bus network. We will fight to the bitter end against the trams," he said.

But, Commercial Councillor at the Czechoslovakia Embassy, Mr Milan Kruma told Zana that experts from his country have started preparing a report on feasibility studies on the introduction of trams in Lusaka.

The Zambia National Energy Council was formed to look into the energy needs of the country and help formulate conservation policies amid escalating world fuel prices. — Zana

UNIP CONSTITUTION TRANSLATIONS--The principal for Political affairs at the National Guidance Ministry, Mr Webb Bweupe, said yesterday that the ministry had finished translating the UNIP constitution into some local languages. Mr Bweupe said the translated UNIP constitution manuscripts in Luvale, Lunda and Kaonde were with the Government Printers, adding that he hoped the booklets will be ready before the end of this year. At the moment, he said his office had translated Humanism Parts One and Two, Village Productivity Committees, towards complete independence, and Party organisation from English into some local languages. He attributed the delay in producing translated booklets due to lack of materials by the Government Printers in the past.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 9 Oct 81 p 5]

IMMINENT CEMENT SHORTAGE--An INDECO spokesman has warned of an eminent shortage of bagged cement unless paper sacks arrive in the country before this weekend. The spokesman said paper sacks were expected to arrive at Kapiri Mposhi by Tazara this week, "But if these do not arrive, the cement shortage will begin to be felt among the builders," the spokesman said. The sale of bagged cement was suspended last week. Both Chilanga and Ndola works of Chilanga cement had been affected by the paper sacks shortage. Firms with bulk handling equipment had not been affected by the shortage and cement supplies to them were continuing, the spokesman said. [Text] [Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 14 Oct 81 p 7]

ZESCO POWER SHUTOFF--The Zambia Electricity Supply Corporation disconnected electricity to the police, the boma, schools and other Government departments in Livingstone on Wednesday for non-payment of electricity bills. Southern Province police chief Mr Basil Chibula had to plead with Zesco officials to reconnect the supply. Deputy police chief Mr John Michelo could not say how much police owed Zesco. After representations supplies were restored. At the boma, work in the national registration and printing offices came to a standstill. Zesco sources said the boma owed the corporation K126 which was later paid. Other Government departments have been told to pay up or the supply will be disconnected. Sources at the office of member of the Central Committee said an accountant had warned Zesco not to disconnect electricity to the Livingstone General and Batoka hospitals. A Zesco spokesman was not available for comment. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Oct 81 p 5]

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS--The Immigration Department on the Copperbelt last week deported 116 West Africans who were in the country illegally, regional immigration officer Mr Felix Lisulo announced in Ndola yesterday. Mr Lisulo said "many more" were awaiting deportation orders in Kamfinsa prison. These would buy their own air tickets because the Government had no money to pay for their fares and would leave through Lusaka International Airport. Those deported last week were kicked out through Mokamto and Kasumbalesa border posts and were rounded up during joint operation cleanup campaigns mounted by the police and immigration officers in September and October last year. All the deportees were either residents in Zaire or had entered Zambia through that country. Last month Mr Lisulo announced that his department had deported 200 aliens, mostly West Africans and Zaireans in an attempt to curb the rising crime wave in the area. The aliens were found without valid documents allowing them to stay in Zambia. Last week's deportations now bring the total number of illegal immigrants kicked out to 316 since Prime Minister Mundia ordered on September 10 that illegal aliens must be deported immediately they were spotted. MAIZE STORAGE TARPAULINS' ARRIVAL--Namboard has started receiving the first of more than 2,000 tarpaulins it ordered for the storage of the bumper maize harvest. General manager Mr George Chabwera said yesterday 900 tarpaulins had been received from local manufacturers by his organisation and would be distributed to depots. More than 500 imported from abroad had also arrived. He was confident that the rest of the 2,500 tarpaulins would arrive soon. Last week Minister of Works and Supply Mr Haswell Mwale ordered the Zambia Cooperative Federation to dispatch 2,000 tarpaulins to Eastern Province to cover more than one million bags of maize threatened by rain. Speaking during a tour of the province, Mr Mwale expressed happiness at the rate at which the Eastern Cooperative Union (ECU) had bought maize from farmers but he was concerned that it had been left unprotected from the coming rains. However, Mr Chabwera said the tarpaulins were for the storage of maize and other produce stored in Namboard depots.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 12 Oct 81 p 2]

PAPER MILL FEASIBILITY STUDY--Feasibility studies for the largest project in the Third National Development Plan--the K180 million pulp and paper mill--were completed a few weeks ago, deputy Indian high commissioner Mr Krishnan Rajan said yesterday in Lusaka. The project is a joint venture with the Birlas group of India and the Zambian Government. The recommendations were now being studied by the Ministry of Commerce and Industry. Zambia has already committed K12 million towards the project in an agreement signed by Finance Minister Mr Kebby Musokotwane and head of the Indian firm Mr Ganga Birla in November last year. MINE CLEARING EXPERTS--The Government has sent in experts and equipment to Livingstone and Kalomo to resume clearing landmines, Southern Province permanent secretary Mr Ian Sikazwe sais in his report presented to a recent provincial council meeting in Livingstone. He says army engineers abandoned the clearing of landmines in the two districts because of lack of fuel and transport. Several troop carriers were needed for the army experts to clear landmines from Kalomo alone. But because the army did not have such transport available at that time, its headquarters was asked to obtain similar facilities from civilian authorities. And Mr Sikazwe said yesterday necessary measures had already been taken to equip the landmine clearning experts with transport to enable them to continue with the job. According to the authorities, the exercise could have taken about three months to complete if it was not for rains which are about to start. It will now take much longer to clear them. The campaign has already been completed in Gwembe, one of the districts most affected by landmines, planted by the rebel Rhodesian regime of Ian Smith at the height of the Zimbabwe liberation war. MANPOWER SURVEY OF RESIDENTS--The Zimbabwean government yesterday launched a manpower survey to assess the skills of its nationals living in Zambia. The survey was launched through the high commission in Lusaka by Manpower Planning and Development Minister Dr Frederick Shava who was enroute to Zimbabwe from Monrovia where he was attending a meeting. Speaking during a Press conference he held to announce the survey, Dr Shava said the assessment would be restricted to the professional, skilled and semi-skilled areas. The survey was being launched "with a realisation and appreciation that Zambia had the highest concentration of Zimbabweans in the whole world who were studying or working." The assessment of the quantity and levels of skills among Zimbabwean outside the country would serve as an impetus in the human resources development programme at home. The manpower survey was being conducted within Zimbabwe and it was an important exercise as it would assist in that country's efforts to replace the manpower that fizzled out in the past. GOKWE LAUNCHES MAJOR DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

[Text]

A MAJOR reconstruction and development programme is under way in Gokwe, one of Zimbabwe's largest administrative districts.

The chairman of Cheziya-Gokwe District Council, Mr Benson Ndemera, says plans are being finalised for a Zimcord-type conference next month.

A document — prepared by the council with the cooperation of various Government departments in the district — will be publicised early next month at the start of the conference, code-named Chegocord. It will invite investors to participate in the future development of Gokwe — one of the country's least developed districts.

Chegocord is a major attempt to direct national resources to Gokwe and to restore regional balance to national economic and social planning.

The underlying challenge to the rest of the nation is that Gokwe needs to be helped in reconstruction and in the implementation of its development plans, he said.

Mr Ndemera said that with the ending last year of 90 years of white rule, "it is now up to us, the beneficiaries of the struggle, to work hard, and consolidate our political victory by transforming the economy so that as high a rate of growth as possible is achieved . . . .

In this way every individual district and region would participate equally in producing the goods and services the nation required.

DUMPING GROUND

During the war years Gokwe was a "dumping ground" for people evicted from their home areas, and it had more than its fair share of destruction and social disruption.

It has been estimated that 95 percent of the schools clinics and dip-tanks were destroyed during the conflict.

However, the council's senior executive officer, Mr Paul Magede says, since independence several schools had been reopened and staffed, although there are still many which need rebuilding.

About 150 schools and seven clinics serve the population in a district covering an area of 24 000 km². There is one "inadequately staffed" hospital with one doctor.

Mr Magede said nine growth points had been selected for development. Gokwe has a great mining and tourist potential, and is already a major cotton and grain producing area. The total gross return for agricultural products in the 1980/81 season has been estimated at between $12 million and $18 million.

A mining group has surveyed the area and expressed interest in a massive coal reserve which has been located near Nenyuka Mine. There are also gold workings, and the council authorities hope that further exploration will reveal even more extensive mineral deposits.

However, to encourage further development, better road communication is essential. Transport is hampered by the lack of roads, and is further aggravated by insufficient bridges, or the destruction of existing ones during the rainy season.

As a result people have been stranded in one area for anything up to three days before they could reach main business centres.

Though much is reportedly being done by both central Government and local authorities to improve the roads, farmers say that much of this year's crop had still not been moved to markets because of transport problems.

District council officials have indicated that the people were willing to help in any way possible in improving communications.

The project envisages the development of banking and other commercial services. These will utilise local produce and manpower by establishing small - scale rural schemes such as maize mills and textile industries.

Investment into major irrigation schemes would make more arable land available to enhance the district's overall development efforts. — Zimbabwe Information Service.

EMERGENCY POWERS TO CURB POLITICAL MEETINGS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Francis Mdlongwa]

[Text]

EMERGENCY powers to curb the increasing number of political meetings throughout the country were announced yesterday by the Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Richard Hove.

He told a Press conference in Salisbury that the new regulations, which come into effect today, would empower him to decide whether a political meeting or procession should be allowed.

He said the Government was concerned at the frequency with which meetings were being staged. It was as though Zimbabwe was heading for another general election.

In August 52 political meetings had been held and in September the figure had risen to 67. By half-way through this month there had already been 43. He did not give details of how many meetings had been held by each party.

"An alarming feature of many of the meetings which have been held is the prevalence of inflammatory and, sometimes, even near subversive statements which have been made," Mr Hove said.

"In the absence of proper police presence and an ability to record such statements, it is not always possible to take appropriate action on the irresponsible elements in our society."

To counteract the problem, he would from today personally approve or reject applications by political parties to stage meetings or processions.

Political parties would have to lodge their applications to hold meetings with the police at least seven days before, instead of the present two days' notice.

Parties would also be required to give the date, place, time and the names of the meeting convener and the intended speakers.

The same rules would apply to processions of a political nature.

The use of buses to boost support at meetings in any area had been effectively banned, said Mr Hove. He warned parties which took people to meetings by bus or those who assisted them, that they would be prosecuted.

These measures had become necessary as some of the meetings, where party adherents had been brought in by bus, had resulted in acts of violence among opposing political groups—a situation which had threatened law and order.

Protection

The restrictions of party meetings had become necessary so that adequate police protection could be provided for those present and others carrying out their daily business.

Mr Hove, however, pledged that the Government was firmly committed to democracy and freedom of expression and might consider lifting the regulations if political parties behaved "responsibly".

The restrictions would not apply to Government ministers who addressed meetings in the normal course of their duty, nor to the Prime Minister's "meet-the-people" drive that will soon take him to Matabeleland and other areas.

He emphasised that all the measures had been taken to ensure peace and order in the country. "I don't want the Press to go away with the feeling that this Government is on the verge of falling or that there is anything which is a kind of upheaval . . .

"It is our feeling that we must take care of these emerging tendencies before they get too far."

Yesterday's moves closely followed recent warnings by Mr Hove that parties had to conduct themselves within the laws of the country or face being banned.

STATE INTRODUCES MEASURES TO CONTROL ECONOMY

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] The Government is introducing a variety of measures to control the flow of money and to achieve a lower economic growth rate, says the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala.

He also told a Press conference yesterday that Zimbabwe was negotiating for aid from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

The minister declined to give details about the negotiations which were still in progress. When negotiations had been concluded an announceement would be made, he said.

Senator Nkala, speaking on his return from the Commonwealth finance ministers' conference in the Bahamas, said Zimbabwe's gross domestic product last year was 12 percent compared with 9 percent in 1979.

The Government measures were aimed at managing the country's economy and ministries had already been advised to keep to their budgetary allocations.

He dismissed the rumour that Zimbabwe might soon devalue its currency. "Although it remains a remote possibility," he said, there was no intention of doing so at present or in the near future.

The minister criticised businessmen who were always complaining of State participation in industry. If they did not want to accept Government policy, they were free to leave the country.

"We shall not allow outrageous capitalism. We are determined to see that the people get a sizeable share of the sweat of their labour."

In all the ventures the Government had been involved in, it had been invited by the companies concerned.

He repeated that the Government had no intention to nationalise industries unless they were strategic. There were many companies which had invited the Government to participate.

He stressed that although Zimbabwe was following a socialist path, it would not be a carbon copy of any country. "We shall always be dictated to by the interests of our people and not by any country."

Some of the problems the country was facing were not of her own making but were influenced by outside forces. "For those we can control, we have taken measures," Senator Nkala said.

He blamed the present economic problems on the previous government which had neglected the transport system and black skills. Measures were in hand to counter past incompetence and lack of foresight.

He accused foreign correspondents of continuing to glorify what the leader of the RF, Mr Ian Smith, and minority black politicians said instead of checking facts.

The Government was doing all it could to bring efficiency to the transport system and mobilise it to ensure that all maize was collected and stored before the rains.

The bumper maize harvest was proof of the Government's determination to deliver goods to the people. "Our granaries are bursting and we do not import food," he said.

Since coming into power, the Government had created stability and peace which did not exist in the country before. Despite the negative reporting in the foreign Press, investors were still interested in Zimbabwe.

MUGABE STUDIES PLOT DENIAL BY BISHOP MUZOREWA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

THE Prime Minister's Office was yesterday studying a statement by the UANC leader, Bishop Abel Muzorewa, denying that his party was conniving with South Africa to overthrow the Government in Zimbabwe.

Bishop Muzorewa told newsmen yesterday that at a meeting with Mr Mugabe in January, he had been assured that investigations carried out had confirmed that the UANC had no connection with the estimated 5 000 Zimbabweans alleged to be undergoing military training in South Africa.

The former prime minister of Zimbabwe-Rhodesia said Mr Mugabe had said the UANC had not recruited, sponsored, or financed them (the dissidents), "nor were we giving them any political guidance".

The bishop was surprised at repeated allegations by the Prime Minister after this meeting that an invasion by South African-backed UANC followers was imminent.

He said the real motives behind these accusations were the intention to destroy him "politically and personally", and concern about the "massive loss of political support which ZANU (PF) is experiencing".

Bishop Muzorewa said the ruling party was losing support because of increasing prices, inflation, food and fuel shortages, lack of confidence by foreign investors, and the poor state of the economy.

'IRRESPONSIBLE'

"When the present Government collapses, it will have been self-overthrown by its own unacceptable acts of irresponsibility.

"The Government must not look outside for scapegoats to justify its own failure to run a truly democratic country. There will be no coup from outside. The coup, if there be one, will come from within ZANU (PF) itself."

Bishop Muzorewa said Matebeleland was the only part of Zimbabwe where UANC members felt free and at home.

He said that despite threats made by the Prime Minister to detain him, he would remain and die in Zimbabwe. The bishop quoted Mr Mugabe as having said at a rally: "I know he has not been to prison. I shall build a keep for him and his wife."

MUGABE INTERVIEWED ON ARMS, CHAD, FRANCE

AB171124 Paris AFP in English 1038 GMT 17 Oct 81

[Text] Salisbury, Oct 17 (AFP)--Zimbabwe has sufficient weapons at the moment but will eventually be in the market for a new air defence system as well as tanks and other heavy weaponry, according to Prime Minister Robert Mugabe.

Mr Mugabe said that new weapons, including fighters and bombers, were not a priority for his government.

One would hope that South Africa is not contemplating a large-scale invasion of our territory, and hence we feel we should restrict ourselves to the weaponry that we have at the moment, he said in an interview here with AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE.

When the time came Zimbabwe would buy its arms from any friendly country willing to sell, he said, noting that as a non-aligned country his government had friends in both major blocs. Whether it be from the West of the East, arms are arms, he added.

The election of a socialist government in France following the earlier election of President Francois Mitterrand provided a ray of hope, the prime minister said. "We are ourselves very confident that the Mitterrand government will reverse the very unprogressive process set in motion by previous governments in France, and act firmly in fighting apartheid and ensuring that democracy comes to the rest of our region."

He noted that France's African policy had been in need of reform for a long time, and that the Paris government had been guilty of parochialism, "restricting its relations purely to the Francophone countries."

Turning to African issues Mr Mugabe said that it was up to the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) to produce a peacekeeping force to replace Libyan troops still based in Chad.

If the OAU failed to maintain peace and all efforts have been tried, that will be a different matter and the organisation would have to find another solution. But in this case a United Nation's peace contingent would seem more likely than any other outside force, he said.

On the situation in the Middle East the prime minister said Israel had let down the late President Anwar al-Sadat in the search for a global settlement in that region.

Israel took advantage of al-Sadat and became more intransigent and more uncompromising, thereby making President al-Sadat an object of criticism, Mr Mugabe commented. "There is need for the Palestine Liberation Organisation to be involved in all discussions that are aimed at solving the Palestinian question."

MINISTER SEES END TO RAIL SNAG BY JUNE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Rob Linden]

[Text] The fuel supply crisis has been overcome and by June next year the transport system should be able to meet all important traffic demands, the Minister of Transport, Mr Josiah Chinamano, said yesterday.

In an interview the minister denied that there was a dispute between the National Railways of Zimbabwe and the Mozambican authorities, noting that consultation and joint action had resulted in Zimbabwe's petrol reserves more than doubling from three days' supply last week to seven days' supply by Monday.

The position was improving day by day, he said, while the diesel shortage had already been overcome.

He denied that there had been incidents of sabotage on the railways, and blamed the crisis in moving exports on a combination of antiquated, unreliable locomotives and unprecedented demand.

He confirmed that the Government was examining the possibility of setting up a national road transport corporation and nationalising bus services, and sketched in future plans for Zimbabwe to become the hub of the Southern African rail, road and air system, with a new airport capable of handling dozens of jumbo jet and regional feeder services a day.

Recent newspaper reports have quoted Mr Nigel Lea-Cox, general manager of NRZ, as putting the blame for the petrol shortage on shortcomings in Mozambique, particularly at the port of Maputo.

In reply, the Mozambican port and fuel authorities have been quoted as saying that Zimbabwe has not been making sufficient use of facilities which supply all its needs without strain.

But Mr Chinamano was impatient with any suggestions that there was a [words blurred]. What was needed was consultation, in order that both the Mozambicans and courselves could reduce the time taken to turn tanker wagons around.

Locomotives

"Teams of officials have now been doing this for several days, and the problems have been overcome.

"We have also allocated 50 extra locomotives and all available staff to the Mozambique petrol route, while the diesel problem has been dealt with by railing supplies direct to Messina on the South African border and taking it from there by road."

He underlined Zimbabwe's determination to continue moving away from dependence on South African routes to reliance on Mozambican outlets, and pledged that by next June the railways would be capable of meeting all essential demand.

He said that the arrival over the past few weeks of more than 200 Indian technicians--with more due from Pakistan and Britain soon--meant that a far higher proportion of locomotives, rolling stock and signals equipment would be kept in working order.

This, plus the deployment over the six months from the beginning of next year of 60 diesel-electric locomotives from the United States and Canada, and the capacity released when the Beira-Umtali pipeline comes on stream within three months, would vastly increase carrying capacity.

Mr Chinamano reiterated that the country was losing up to $5 million a week in foreign currency through the railways' inability to handle enough exports, and said he was "deeply worried" that all 16 million tonnes of rail traffic expected this year could not be carried. (The shortfall is expected to be about two million tonnes).

On allegations in the Assembly that certain railwaymen had been sabotaging Zimbabwe by returning full diesel tanker wagons to South Africa without unloading them, he said:

"If such a thing is proved, it is most serious--treasonable--but it has not been. Despite investigation, no case of such behaviour has been brought to light."

Mr Chinamano said that the Government was actively considering the establishment of both a state road transport corporation and a nationalised or semi-state-owned bus service, possibly under the overall authority of the Central Mechanical Equipment Department (CMED).

Asked about alleged delays in integrating Ethiopian-trained black pilots into Air Zimbabwe's passenger flight services, Mr Chinamano was emphatic:

"If there were any racial discrimination involved would be the first to crack down.

"But these young men were trained mostly on single-engined aircraft, and simply do not have the flying time or experience to pilot two-or four-engined airliners."

NEGLECT OF TRANSPORT PROBLEMS HIT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

CONTINUED neglect of Zimbabwe's transport problems will soon lead to serious economic, political and social problems which no amount of rhetoric will hide, the Deputy Minister of Finance, Dr Oliver Munyaradzi, has said.

Opening the Gutu branch of the Progress Trading Company at Fort Victoria on Saturday he said railway workers who had tried to refurbish locomotives were to be congratulated but their efforts were not a complete solution to the problem.

The loss of South African locomotives and skilled personnel suffered by the railways had worsened the country's serious balance of payments problems. About $5 million a week in exports was being lost by the transport shortage.

Zimbabwe's imports in 1979 grew by 34 percent and by 46 percent in 1980, but exports grew by 17 percent in 1979 and 26 percent in 1980. They would grow by only about 3 percent this year while imports were expected to grow by 30 percent.

"It must be perfectly obvious from this that Zimbabwe cannot continue on this basis without running into serious financial difficulties."

The Government had taken a number of measures to ease the balance of payments burden. Import allocations for the last quarter of this year were cut by 10 percent, interest rates were increased, and domestic credit was radically curtailed.

The effect of these measures was to reduce domestic demand for manufactured goods, which always required some foreign exchange, and allowed manufacturers to look away from the internal market to exports, increasing the amount of foreign exchange entering the country.

Increased interest rates encouraged people to save instead of spending on consumer goods. Manufacturing output rose 13.5 percent this year, while the amount of money spent on the goods increased 46 percent.

The increased in interest rates were "fairly stiff medicine for the man in the street" but were necessary "since high rates of inflation generated by too fast a growth in credit do serious damage to the economy", he said.

INFLATION

Inflation not only eroded "any real increase in the incomes of workers leading to demands for higher wages and yet more inflation", but rising prices had generally made the country's exports less competitive, which in turn further added to Zimbabwe's balance of payment problems.

He urged people to save their money instead of spending it on consumer goods, and to open bank accounts and deposit into them regularly.

In this way the man in the street's efforts "will reinforce those of the Government, leading to a quicker return to normal trading conditions".

Dr Munyaradzi said the depressed state of the stock market, and the lack of investor confidence, had been blamed on the inflammatory statements, ill-advised taxation policy, punitive exchange measures, refusal of the Government to allow some price increases, minimum wages, and "brain-washing" by the mass media.

Behind all these statements and problems was a lack of acceptance of the new order, he said. A significant section of the economically-active community suffered "shell shock" brought about by the failure of their ideologies.

Black businessmen were a major part of the olution to the country's problems.

"The role of the black businessmen is to get involved in the economic rebuilding of our country. He, more than his white counterpart, understands and should respond to the needs of the disadvantaged rural masses.

SHAVA CLAIMS TRAINING IS STILL RACIAL

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

ZIMBABWE lost more than 4 000 trained journeymen in four years, the Minister of Manpower Planning and Development, Dr Frederick Shava, said in Lusaka yesterday.

In 1976 the total number of journeymen stood at 13 683, by 1978 it had dropped to 11 955 and the figure slid down to 9 024 last year.

Dr Shava briefed Zambian journalists on the importance of launching Zimbabwe's National Manpower Survey in their country due to the vast numbers of Zimbabweans studying, working and living there.

He told a Press conference that apprenticeship figures for the first year of independence still "clearly reflect the racial injustices in our country".

"Eighty-nine percent of the apprentices in the aircraft industry were white, 84 percent in the electrical industry, 68 percent in mechanical and 69 percent in the motor industry were all white."

His ministry was created against the background of the colonial practice whereby vocational training facilities were restricted to a white minority.

"(It) meant that only a few blacks could acquire skills essential to a new developing country," he said.

Therefore the overall objective of the ministry was to plan and develop Zimbabwean human resources to meet the national requirements for trained manpower.

Already on the basis of information gathered during the pre-NMS period genuine shortages identified included:

- Professional engineers, higher technicians and instructors in the fields;
- Agricultural specialists such as veterinary officers;
- Medical specialists, technologists and specialised personnel like theatre nurses and nursing tutors; and
- Senior management staff such as accountants and senior stenographers.

STRIKE AT SHANGANI MINE CONTINUES

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] Bulawayo--More than 500 people yesterday staged a day-long demonstration outside the offices of the Shangani Nickel Mine as the strike there entered its eighth day.

A total of 1 100 workers began the strike on October 8 following an internal dispute.

Repeated offers from management and the presence of Government industrial relations officers have so far failed to bring an end to the strike.

A spokesman for the parent company, the Anglo American Corporation, confirmed yesterday that about 500 people demonstrated outside the mine.

He said a circular was distributed by management to striking miners on Wednesday which said: "On Thursday October 8, the workers' committee demanded the dismissal of a chargehand, but laid no specific charges against him. Subsequently, the workers stopped working on that day.

"The strike is illegal and against Government policy. Management has made the following offer to the workers committee:

"As soon as all employees return to work a full investigation will be carried out, provided specific complaints are brought forward."

The spokesman said that the circular promised that Government and workers' committee observers could attend the inquiry, and that in the meantime the chargehand would be temporarily transferred from underground to the surface. The offer was made to the workers' committee on four separate days.

A man claiming to represent the workers at Shangani Mine, but who is not a member of the workers' committee, said yesterday the men would not return to work unless the chargehand was suspended or sacked.

TRADE UNION 'BAD EGGS' CAUTIONED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kumbirai Kangai, yesterday warned "bad eggs" in the trade union movement not to try to undermine the Government.

He also deplored the attitude shown by some black workers against their white managers.

In an interview Mr Kangai said there was a tendency for some black workers to hate white managers simply because the country was under a black government.

"My ministry will not tolerate such attitudes because we want to see a labour system where everybody works in harmony despite their skin colour," he said.

Although he was generally satisfied with the attitude shown by the trade unions towards the Government, "there were still some bad eggs in it".

The minister cited a recent case where he summoned one labour leader to his office to warn him against his subversive activities against the Government.

"I made it clear to him that we were a workers' government and would not tolerate any subversive activities aimed at putting the Government to ridicule," he said.

He charged that the labour leader had once engineered a strike when he asked farm workers to demand a wage increase of $50.

The minister also warned trade unionists against inciting workers to go on strike, because this was illegal.

"Anybody found to be inciting workers to go on strike would be dealt with accordingly," he warned.

The country was going through difficult times, he said, and the situation did not call for strikes.

RUIN

"Therefore, any step towards the wrong direction will ruin us," he said.

The minister said considerable progress had been made throughout industry in the exercise to set up workers' committees.

"I am satisfied with the progress made in this area and it is my hope that all working places in the country will have these committees soon," he said.

Mr Kangai added that the exercise would now be spread into farms to ensure that every farm in the country had a workers' committee.

The workers would elect their own chairman to avoid managements imposing people of their choice, he said.

The idea, the minister stressed, was to promote democracy everywhere in the country.

ZCTU CHIEF DENIES ORGANIZATION ENCOURAGES STRIKES

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Oct 81 p 11

[Text]

THE instigation of strikes is completely outside the thinking of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, the secretary-general, Mr Albert Mugabe, has said.

He said in an interview after his trip to Rome that the ZCTU saw its task as organising and educating workers, not inciting them to strike. The Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kumbirai Kangai, said this week that some trade unionists were illegally inciting workers to strike.

Mr Mugabe said the ZCTU encouraged workers to have constructive attitudes towards the Government and their employers.

"Strikes do more harm than good. We don't need to retard economic progress by arranging strikes. In fact, we encourage economic progress, and that means discouraging strikes.

"Our primary objective is to organise and educate workers about their rights, and how to use them."

Mr Mugabe acknowledged, however, that there were some "bad eggs" in the union movement.

"The minister talks from a position of knowledge. There are some people in the movement who go out looking for difficulties, and try to be difficult. We'll watch them closely and discourage striking as much as we can.

"Workers and their representatives must develop a constructive attitude towards their employers. They must co-operate for everybody's benefit."

Mr Mugabe called on the Government to devise a plan to help the unemployed and promote job creation.

"There are unemployed people all over the country. Many of them don't have a place to sleep, and don't know when their next meal will be. They are really suffering. The Government must find a way to help them.

"It's going to be even worse next year because of the school - leavers. What are they all going to do? Starve?

"Obviously we have inherited this situation from the former regimes. But the new order really must do something to help unemployed people."

Mr Mugabe criticised Mrs Florence Chitauro for her allegations of sexual and financial corruption published last week.

"These accusations may be true. I don't know. But unless Mrs Chitauro provides proof, or persuades people to come forward with facts, we can't do anything. If people believe that this kind of thing is going on they must bring proof."

Mr Mugabe also criticised the Herald for publishing Mrs Chitauro's accusations, saying it was irresponsible to carry unsubstantiated allegations.

"She makes very general claims, with no proof These things must be published if they're true, but that is not known yet. I'm not very impressed."

Mr Mugabe said his trip to Rome had been enlightening. He was one of 60 foreign observers at the 1 300-strong congress.

"What really impressed me was how organised they are. They had 1 300 delegates from all over Italy, and they really got things done.

"I hope that we will be as organised as that one day. It takes hard and dedicated work, but it's worth it."

Mr Mugabe said the Angolan delegation to the congress spoke of how the South African invasion had disrupted the country, and the desperate need it had for relief.

To feed, house and clothe the more than 660 000 refugees and victims, and to provide basic reconstruction of facilities needed more than US$170 million.

NKALA: NO RESETTLING WITHOUT FORMS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

THE Government will be able to institute a successful resettlement programme only when all people co-operate with the Ministry of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development by completing the resettlement forms.

This was said by the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, yesterday, to people in his home area, Godhlwayo, in Chief Madhuna's land, near Filabusi.

Referring to the refusal of many Matabeleland people to complete the resettlement forms, Senator Nkala said people should realise that Government needs all facts and figures before embarking on resettling any people from an area.

It was therefore imperative that people completed the forms before they could expect to be told of resettlement plans for their areas.

Because the Government wanted to make sure all the necessary facilities for a better life were supplied before moving people into any resettlement area, the Ministry of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development had used the forms as a means of ascertaining the numbers of people likely to be resettled.

"If you do not complete these forms and instead hide them, then all you are doing is remaining behind while other people from other areas, who are co-operative, move in with the resettlement exercise."

The details required on the forms being circulated were not meant to be used to victimise people, said Senator Nkala after a man had asked why the Government wanted to know whether a person had been to Mozambique, Botswana or Zambia during the war.

"During the war a lot of our people went to these countries as refugees and we brought them back last year. But some of them have since gone back to their original home areas. Maybe they do not have any land or their homes were destroyed during the war. All this information will only be known to the Government when people furnish these details on the questionnaires."

Said another questioner: "We have been told that the Government does not have enough money to buy farms, so we need to form co-operatives to buy land."

Senator Nkala said the Government had set aside $43 million to buy land for resettlement. Anybody asked to contribute money to buy farms was being cheated.

"We still support the idea of co-operatives, but these should not be for land acquisition. These can be used to buy in bulk and cheaper or to sell products or to buy farm implements once you are resettled, never to buy land. That is a Government task."

POLICE PATROLS CUT IN VEHICLE CRISIS, SAYS HOVE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

A SERIOUS transport shortage has hit the police and some of their patrols have been affected, the Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Richard Hove, said yesterday.

In an interview, Mr Hove said police had no vehicles to use in some areas.

His ministry had approached others to see how the problem could be solved.

"Our duties are increasing all the time because we have a very important task to perform in the nation — that of fighting crime," he said.

The minister hit back at people who criticised the police. They did not know what they were talking about, he said.

Police were working under difficult conditions and were doing all they could.

Though he was happy with discipline in the force, this did not mean that the ministry would relax in enforcing it. Only a disciplined force was able to fight crime.

Mr Hove also said the Government would brook no nonsense from aliens who were in the country with bad intentions.

They would "face the wrath" of his ministry, he said, and pledged to continue "tougher measures until society is rid of bad elements".

Police were working flat out to ensure that those who were in the country to create trouble were given the treatment they deserved.

Although he could not give figures, Mr Hove said his ministry had deported "many such characters" and that police were intensifying the search for those remaining.

He praised the police for co - operating in the exercise. — Ziana.

PROBLEMS, SHORTAGES RESTRICT GROWTH

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Oct 81 pp 1, 2

[Article by Angus Macmillan]

[Text]

RISING costs, transport problems and a continued shortage of skilled labour are restricting the growth of Zimbabwe's building industry.

Building material costs rose by about 21 percent last year and by 20 percent in the first quarter of 1981, with total building costs now going up by at least 2 percent a month.

The deteriorating skilled labour position and the shortage of foreign currency are still the most critical restraints on output in the industry.

Many commercial projects, such as office blocks, have been postponed until next year when the situation will be reviewed.

Increased costs and wages have resulted in an alarming fall in productivity of 20-25 percent in the last year and have contributed to current inflationary pressures in the economy.

After emerging from the pre-independence doldrums last year all sectors of the industry have experienced increased demand for their services. But now they are finding it difficult to meet demand and satisfy customer requirements.

Staff

Most construction is for Government, quasi-government institutions, pension funds and industry with less activity in small developments under $500 000.

Big construction firms, such as Roberts, and Lewis, expect their turnovers to be up on last year. But they cite shortages of various technical and supervisory staff as major problems. This is in spite of their continuing programmes to upgrade semi-skilled labour.

Roberts is improving the skills of its staff, including carpenters and bricklayers, at a training school on its Beatrice Road site, while Lewis has wide-ranging in-house training schemes.

Due to tighter money and escalating costs, residential building in the private sector has remained at a low ebb. But small builders have been kept busy with town house developments and alterations and extensions to upper market houses.

"The lack of money in circulation and the retraction of funds by building societies and financial institutions is hampering growth in the private sector," says leading architect and past president of the Institute of Architects, Mr Harold Baeck.

He also said that the unavailability of vital materials (mainly due to transport and delivery problems), the shortage of skills and a lack of confidence on the part of the small developer were having an adverse effect on the industry.

A partner in a firm of quantity surveyors, Mr Peter Hosking, blamed "niggling" shortages and delays for holding up contracts and causing an escalation in prices. Quantity surveyors were also in short supply, he said.

Ageing

"Ours is a profession of ageing skills. Of the dozen or so practising surveyors in the country, none is between the age of school leavers and those with 10 years' experience," he said. His firm is now taking on and training school-leavers.

Builders' merchants and suppliers of raw materials have been hard-pressed to meet demand, especially with recent shortage of diesel. Many have advised their customers to collect their orders rather than wait for delivery.

The managing director of United Builders Merchants, Mr Norman Schafer, says demand for his company's products is "small in variety but large in quantity", mainly for Government and quasi-government ventures.

Cement manufacturers, SPC, say that a recent cement shortage was caused by one kiln being "down" but that production is now back to normal. Although they run their own transport fleet, they have advised customers to collect their orders to avoid delay.

Dale Face Bricks reports heavy demand for ordinary common bricks and quarry tiles but sales of face bricks are low due to the lack of residential building.

"We have also had to ask clients to pick up their orders," said a spokesman for the company, which recently raised its prices by 5 percent.

Many suppliers have had to increase their prices to offset increased input costs which have risen sharply due to recent wage awards, the 33 percent August rise in the petrol price and higher interest rates.

This has resulted in spiralling building costs which can be absorbed by the public sector and some large developers, but not the man in the street.

An additional ensuite bedroom/bathroom, for instance, would cost about $300 a square metre, almost as much as the total cost of a three-bedroomed house built 10 years ago.

Last year's approved building plans, worth $152 million, were the highest on record. But this year could still prove more lucrative as the first five months has exceeded $71 million, compared with $69 million for the corresponding period of 1980.

NUTRITIONAL NEEDS OF RURAL POPULATION STUDIED

Food, Nutrition, Related Services

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Oct 81 p 13

[Article by P.B. Madhovi, Department of Biochemistry, University of Zimbabwe]

[Text]

THE subject of food and nutrition in communal areas, farms or former townships seems to lie somewhere between common sense, agriculture and medicine.

It is often considered to be a somewhat esoteric and confusing science, the orphan of everyone, much talked about but with little real attention given to its advancement.

Yet povo like all other Zimbabweans (regardless of colour) have a right to decent nourishment three times a day.

They need adequate food and nutrition — related services — so as to improve the quality of their lives.

There is growing evidence that Zimbabwean villagers are malnourished.

A survey carried out by Oxfam last year on the state of nutrition in rural Zimbabwe on the most vulnerable group (children one-five years old) in five different areas revealed that a high percentage of them were severely undernourished.

Early this year Miss Rene Loewenson of the university's Medical School reported the poor nutritional status found in farm workers.

Other reports have talked about the general lack of food for rural schoolchildren and the quality of diets consumed in villages.

While the Oxfam report resulted in the Ministry of Health establishing the children's supplementary feeding programme helping more than 50 000 children countrywide, this can only be viewed as a short-term intervention measure.

Real solutions are required.

Describing the problem Dr David Sanders, chairman of the children's supplementary feeding programme, said lack of calorific value in food rather than an actual shortage of protein was responsible for most of the undernourishment among Zimbabwean children in rural areas.

The point Dr Sanders echoed was first made by Professor Platt of the Department of Human Nutrition at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, who blamed low meal frequency and the bulky nature of foods for the energy deficit in diets of pre-school children.

This problem of bulk is common to diets prepared for infants and young children from cereals and roots crops of many developing countries.

Typically, these diets have a crude energy density of 1k cal/g.

This means that a one-year-old would have to eat a kilogramme of food each day simply to meet his energy needs.

This is between two and three times the amount that an English child of the same age has to eat (Figure 1).

But by adding high energy foods such as oil or fat to sadza the volume of food that the young child needs to eat can be greatly reduced to an amount similar to that eaten by a European child.

The effects of oil are twofold. It increases energy content and at the same time has an important softening effect on the food.

To povo the bulky sadza and bota made from plain maize meal are generally considered adequate nourishment on their own.

Meat, fish, milk, egg, vegetable, termite, caterpillar or mushroom relishes when eaten with sadza are used more as a savoury to improve the flavour and palatability of the sadza.

The same is true with sugar or dovi (peanut butter) when they are added to bota.

The sole emphasis is on eating as much sadza or bota and not so much the recommendable eating of different foods.

Many mothers at eating times consider "good" children as those who eat a lot of sadza with as little relish as possible e.g. a small piece of meat may be used to eat a whole plateful of sadza.

Because of this traditional emphasis sadza and bota may be responsible for the undernourishment of most children in communal areas. Bota unlike sadza contains less nutrients (Table 1) and a one-year infant (usually weaned on bota) will need over a kilogramme per day to satisfy his energy requirements.

The need to remedy this situation by advising people to improve their diets is urgently required.

An ideal diet may consist of the staple sadza or bota and vegetables mixed or eaten with any one or more of the following: beans, groundnuts, meat, fish, milk, eggs, termites, caterpillars.

In addition some suitable fat or margarine should be added to the sadza and bota to augment their energy content.

Departments in the Ministries of Health, Community Development and Women's Affairs and Education, the Roman Catholic Church at Silveira House and Freedom from Hunger Campaign are among organisations already running educational programmes in order to improve the situation.

The newly formed Food and Nutrition Association of Zimbabwe (FANAZ) operating from the department of biochemistry at the university is also keen to develop projects for the improvement of the nutritional status of all Zimbabweans, whether povo or not.

All-Purpose Cattle of Communal Areas

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Oct 81 p 13

[Article by G. van Niekerk, Acting Chief Animal and Pasture Officer, Agritech]

[Text]

UNLIKE the commercial sector where cattle are kept mainly for the production of beef for sale, the farmers in the communal areas at present keep cattle to perform functions to produce their food requirements rather than for the purpose of beef production.

The functions are: Draught power: manure production; milk production: and meat.

All farmers want to produce grains and other food crops to satisfy the family's daily and annual requirements and to do this animal draught power is required as not many tractors are as yet around.

To get a reasonable yield fertilisers are required and cattle manure has over the years proved a valuable plant food and is widely used in communal areas.

It has been said that the biggest dairy herd is owned by farmers in the communal area but as no dairy cattle are kept milk yield is low.

What is produced may satisfy the requirements of those families who own cattle but not the entire rural population.

The per capita meat consumption of the rural population is difficult to establish but is higher than officially believed.

At present cattle are estimated to number 2 800 000 herd composed of the following:

Bulls	5%	140 000
Oxen	22%	616 000
Cows	32%	896 000
Heifers	16%	448 000
Steers	6%	168 000
Calves	19%	532 000

Weed Control Is Essential

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Oct 81 p 13

[Article by D. Ziso]

[Text]

ALL cropping is done with one aim in mind — to reap a good harvest. This, in turn means more food. The crop must be protected from a number of adverse environmental factors, if high yields are to be achieved. One of these factors is weed infestation.

A weed is a plant which grows where it is not wanted.

Weeds are usually associated with cropped lands, where their effect is more pronounced.

Certain weeds are associated with certain crops and will be found to be more prevalent under specific soil conditions.

Examples of weeds which infest crop lands are: —

- Shamva grass — found on heavier soils.
- Nutgrass — very resistant to cultivation.
- Pigweed — easy to control.
- Mexican cloves — on lighter soils.
- Rapoko grass — on all soils; difficult to eradicate.
- Witchweed — Paramte of a maize crop.
- Couch grass — Hardy and resistant.
- Starbur — abundant in communal sandveld areas.

A weed, like a crop, is a plant which eats, breathes, drinks and grows.

Because of this, it will compete with a planted crop for food.

The amount of fertiliser recommended for application to any field is designed to meet the requirements of the crop. Weeds only help to deplete crop food.

Water uptake of a crop is related to growth because it is in water that the dissolved nutrients can be taken up by the roots. Water is rarely adequate for our crop needs.

So it must be utilised efficiently.

Apart from using up the water, weeds encourage increased evaporation because evaporation takes place mainly through the leaves.

Light and air are also important factors required by a growing plant. Air is used for respiration and photosynthesis.

It uses light in the manufacture of carbohydrates.

Weeds tend to shade the crop, reducing the amount of light available to the crop.

Weeds have often been associated with certain diseases.

Maize stalk virus is more prevalent where a lot of green weeds are allowed to grow.

Pests which damage the crop may find refuge in weeds during the off-season.

The cutworm has been known to survive on weeds in winter.

The effect of weeds is to depress crop yields.

This is more so when the crop is infested when still young.

Up to 50 percent crop yields can be lost in cotton due to weeds.

Weeds also affect the quality of the crop.

From this, then, it is imperative that weeds must be controlled.

Methods of weed-control fall into the following categories: —

- Good land management;
- Hand weeding;
- Mechanical weeding;
- The use of chemical weed killers.

Best results are achieved by adopting a combination of 1, 2, 3 or 1 and 4 or 1, 2 and 4.

The important thing is to ensure a weed-free seedbed from germination to flowering.

This ensures the crop is away before being interfered with by weeds.

More and more farmers are using herbicides where labour is a limiting factor.

Good land management includes good and deep ploughing to bury all the weeds.

If the operations are done at the right time a lot of the weed seeds will be buried and be unable to germinate.

There is still room for improvement among farmers in their weed control measures.

Fertilisers are increasingly becoming expensive.

We cannot afford to feed weeds.

But we can surely do with a little bit more grain to feed the hungry populations of the world.

BRIEFS

HEALTH MINISTER DISMISSED--A spokesman for the prime minister's office announced this evening the removal from office of Dr Herbert Ushewokunze as minister of health. Dr Mazorodze, the deputy minister of health, will be appointed minister as from tomorrow, 13 October 1981. [Text] [CA140358 Salisbury Domestic Service in English 1600 GMT 12 Oct 81] The prime minister, Comrade Mugabe, says that it is absolutely necessary for government ministers to have some sense of responsibility in their public conduct. Comrade Mugabe was speaking at a briefing for a few selected newsmen this evening, during which he explained his decision to relieve Comrade Ushewokunze of his position as minister of health. He said that Comrade Ushewokunze's dismissal from the cabinet has nothing to do with the course he has been following, but the minister's conduct. The prime minister particularly singled out Comrade Ushewokunze's public criticism of the public service board and the minister's [word indistinct] statement to demonstrators from Parirenyatwa Hospital. Comrade Mugabe said he had been upset by the news of the demonstrations, which occurred while he was attending the commonwealth prime ministers' conference. He said that Comrade Ushewokunze's criticism of the public service commission has been tantamount to criticism of the prime minister, who is also minister of public service. The prime minister said that it has been (?thought) that the public service commission has been able to advance Africans in the various organs of the state including the ministry of health. Comrade Mugabe said he regarded the commission in the highest esteem and so did most of the ministers in the government. He said Comrade Ushewokunze's attacks on the commission were therefore regrettable because the channels in which any such criticism could have been aimed were not proper. RELATIONS WITH USSR--The prime minister, Comrade Mugabe, says Zimbabwe is ready to develop maximum relations with the Soviet Union as long as such ties do not jeopardize the country's links with other countries. Speaking in an interview with AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE, Comrade Mugabe said Zimbabwe intends to remain as nonaligned as possible. He said that relations with the Soviet Union have improved and Moscow is now providing technical and educational assistance. The prime minister said he hopes this will be followed by economic aid. Comrade Mugabe said that Zimbabwe wants to retain its freedom to choose her own friends as she determines her freedom to oppose any actions by either side which militates against peace and security. DIPLOMATIC TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS--Salisbury, Oct 17 (AFP)--The government has told foreign embassies in Zimbabwe that they should restrict the number of their staff and must inform the authorities before their personal travel more than 40 km (25 miles) outside the capital. Several embassies here have confirmed receiving notices from the government stating that their foreign staff should not exceed 20, and that personnel traveling beyond the 40 km limit must inform the authorities of their travel plans two days before the trip. The measures go into effect on November 1. The reasons for the measures were not clear, and government officials were not available for comment. But the new rules are similar to regulations in African states such as Zambia, Mozambique and Tanzania, and they are in use throughout eastern European countries. UNION CHIEF VISITS MOSCOW--The president of the Media Workers' Union of Zimbabwe, Mr Elton Mutasa, leaves for Moscow on Monday for a seven-day conference of the International Organisation of Journalists. Mr Mutasa said yesterday: "There is no doubt that this shows we are being accepted by the international community." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Oct 81 p 7]

STATE TO FLOAT LOAN--A new long-term loan for $25 million is to be floated by the Government at an annual interest rate of 12,25 percent against the issue of Local Registered Stock, the Reserve Bank announced yesterday. The purpose of the loan is to assist in financing expenditure for economic, social and administrative services in Zimbabwe. The purchase price is $98,90 percent. Payment of not less than $10 percent is required on application while any outstanding balance is payable at or before 11 am on January 29, 1982. The stock will be redeemed at par on October 29, 2001, but the Minister of Finance may decide to redeem stock at par, on a pro rata basis, on or after October 29, 1996, subject to three months' notice being given to stockholders. Subscription lists will be opened at 9 am on October 29, 1981 and will be closed when the loan has been fully subscribed or, at the latest, on November 2, 1981. Applications must be sent to the chief general manager of the Reserve Bank, on Form "A" provided with the prospectus. Only applications for amounts of $100 nominal value of stock, or a multiple thereof, will be considered. Interest will be payable half-yearly and the first payment will be made on April 29, 1982. CHINESE TEXTILES--Bulawayo--Links between Chinese and Zimbabwean testile industries could be forged by the end of the year, the Chinese ambassador to Zimbabwe, Mr Chu Qiyuan, said in Bulawayo yesterday. A small delegation from the textile import and export corporation of China is due to arrive here in November or December. Mr Chu said the visit of the delegation could lead to links being forged between the textile industries of the two nations. On his second visit to Bulawayo since arriving a year ago, the ambassador was shown around the premises of a Bulawayo textile firm. He was accompanied by his wife, Mrs Chu Chunpei, his secretary, Mr Ni Quiquan, and a member of the embassy staff, Mr Ding Meizhang. Mr Chu said after his visit that he was impressed with what he had seen. "One has to know more details of the economic life of the country to which one has been sent as ambassador. "My first visit to Bulawayo earlier this year was for the trade fair. This time I wanted to take a closer look around the city and especially the industry. "In the future, we will try to establish better links between China and Zimbabwe and we will be concentrating on the trade fair next year. "Zimbabwe is an important country at the moment--the centre of world attention--and you have, in your first year since independence, achieved great things." COL RISE--Bulawayo--The cost of living for higher income families rose dramatically between July and August, according to the latest Government statistics. Figures released by the Central Statistical Office show a rise from 265,5 in July to 273,6 in August, an increase of 4,2 percent. Contributory factors were increases in the rate of sales tax and rises in the prices of petrol, domestic workers' wages, rent, telephone charges and pork products. For lower income families, the all items index rose from 251,6 points in March to 255 points in June, an increase of 1,4 percent. Main causes were increases in the price of onions, beef, car spares, women's dresses and rent. Most vegetables showed significant price decreases. OVERVIEW OF POLITICAL, ECONOMIC SITUATION ON CONTINENT

Bangkok BANGKOK POST in English 9 Oct 81 p 6

[Part II of Article by Mort Rosenblum: "Democratic Rule, Oil Richness and Deep Troubles in Nigeria"]

[Text]

ONE in every five Africans lives in this colourful nation, the epitome of emerging Africa's extremes.

Nigeria was put together mainly from the Hausas and Fulanis of the desert north and two coastal tribes, the Yoruba in the west and the Ibos in the east.

At independence in 1960, political parties followed tribal lines, and a series of coups ended democracy in 1966. The Ibos, rejecting military rule by northerners, created Biafra, but they were forced back into Nigeria in a 2½-year war that left a million dead.

In a climate of reconciliation, enriched by oil, Nigerians built business empires, expanded services and roads, and eventually untangled their once-paralysed ports.

Today, Nigeria is back under democratic rule. Its oilfields thrive. But it is one of the most troubled nations in Africa.

During the post-war boom of the 1970s, thousands of millions of dollars were lost to bad management, profiteering and theft. Crops were neglected, and youths streamed into the cities. A nation that once fed itself now spends $2,760 million a year to import food.

The world oil glut is squeezing Nigeria, already committed to spending thousands of millions on a new capital city at Abuja and on revitalising agriculture.

Lagos, designed for fewer than a million inhabitants, has three million — or five million. Families cannot be counted, living in rusty tin lean-to shacks off stinking ditches or in thatch shanties over the water. It is perhaps the most expensive city in the world, but many cannot afford enough pounded yam to make it through the week.

Import controls mean some staples are available only to those who can pay black market prices. Corrupt officials grant permits for imports that sell for half the price of protected locally-made versions of the same thing.

While most countries are working hard to entice capital, one Western diplomat observed: "Here they think they're doing you a favour by letting you in to look at the place."

The climate offers high profits for investors with the stamina to withstand the violent crime, high costs, inefficiency and what many call an arrogant attitude.

A Nigerian journalist, who asked not to be named, explains it this way to trusted friends: "Now we talk in thousands of millions, instead of the hundreds before, but we were better off in the 60s. Everything is increasing, including crime. You don't dare go out now; everybody is home by 9 or 10 p.m. The danger is not only the robbers but also the police. What hope if the police are in with the rogues?

"It is the money, the corruption. Everyone is used to dirty money... The whole place is useless."

The news is better at the other extreme in Botswana, a nation of 850,000 inhabitants and four times as many cattle. At independence, it had almost no resources. What was not sand was swamp.

It trades with neighbouring South Africa, and admits it.

Sudden wealth from diamond and mineral discoveries was channelled into development projects, social services and schools. The country' people are poor, and there is unemployment. But it is a viable, stable nation.

Since the recent coup attempt in Gambia, the only African nations to have preserved effective multi-party democracy without internal upheaval are Botswana and Mauritius.

The example of any nation makes a point applicable to others. And the twin cases of the Ivory Coast and Guinea show dramatically how similar colonies, both French, developed in opposite directions.

The Ivory Coast chose to remain close to France, with massive aid and French advisers in the government. Today, the Ivory Coast has a $10,000 million economy with only agricultural wealth. Abidjan has skyscrapers and motorways, and social services reach deep into the interior. Per-capita income is a relatively prosperous $1,260.

Only one party is allowed, but voters now elect their representatives within the party. President Felix Houphouet- Boigny, though an authoritarian who restricts civil liberties, prefers to co-opt the opposition rather than jail it. He spots promising young politicians and brings them into the party structure early. Most decide their only future is within the system.

Guinea chose a total break at independence, and the French stalked off, taking light fixtures and instruction books with them. Despite vast bauxite deposits and rich soil, the nation is poor. The capital, Conakry, is a dilapidated version of its former self, and staples are hard to find. Per-capita income is $220.

President Ahmed Sekou Toure's record on human rights is a grim one of torture, long imprisonment on arbitrary charges and mysterious deaths.

By all measurable standards, the Ivory Coast has made it, and Guinea has not. But such judgments ignore elements that cannot be measured.

In the Ivory Coast, the presence of 75,000 Frenchmen, 100,000 Lebanese and two million non-Ivorian West Africans means native graduates often cannot find work, and they grow resentful. In a rush to export, Ivorian tropical forests were reduced from 15 million hectares to less than 1.6 million hectares, agronomists estimate.

In Guinea, Sekou Toure has organised the five million people into socialist cells that control most aspects of life, including food distribution.

He says his goal was to develop his people before his economy and, in that regard, his nation is far better off than those still tied to France.

"We have had to create a new spirit and consciousness, and do away with the old religious and tribal differences that divide us," he said in an interview. "That takes more time than building a factory."

Some African technocrats say foreign aid is all too often wasted on foreigners who come for brief periods to impose inappropriate solutions to problems they do not understand.

In a West African capital, a Malian agronomist exploded during an interview, throwing massive report after massive report onto his desk.

"All these by foreign experts, all on the same things and all useless," he said, sweeping a hand over the pile of yellowed documents. "In Mali, USAID (the US Agency for International Development) put out $2.5 million for a feedlot project, and more than $2 million of it went to administration and audits and Americans who cost $90,000 each. Then people say nothing came of it because we stole all the money and we're incompetent."

Although some projects are badly conceived, aid money has indeed been wasted or stolen by local officials.

A case is Zaire, the former Belgian Congo, where the strong-willed President Mobutu Sese Seko, with political genius and a secret police, has stabilised chaos.

Today's peace is amazing for anyone who knew the old Congo. Violent crime is rare. Kinshasa is a pleasant city where those with money can live the good life.

It is equally amazing that a country with enormous reserves of copper, cobalt, diamonds, tropical wood and fertile soil should be mortgaged for the next generation. It has $5,600 million in foreign debt.

Half the coffee crop and much of the diamonds are trucked out by smugglers. Foreign exchange pours out on the black market and comes back as luxury imports only a few can afford.

A lucky handful live on this huge "parallel economy," which contributes almost nothing to the state, and the rest struggle to survive.

Mobutu's family fortune is estimated in the hundreds of millions, and many public servants think nothing of paying $100 for a bottle of wine, three times the monthly salary of the sentinels who guard their homes 72 hours a week.

Some of the wealth filters down through extended families and largesse. Many Zaireans live day to day, speculating on a few cans of sardines or selling cigarettes, one at a time, to squeeze enough money for a single meal of manioc root.

One unemployed teacher put it: "We live by miracle."

The problem, apart from bad luck and corruption, is largely bad planning, bad advice and a reluctance to cut losses.

In 1974, Zaire began a power line from its Inga Dam to the Shaba copper mines, 1,800 kilometres away through dense rainforest. It was to open in late 1976, costing $330 million. It is now scheduled for 1982, at $1,000 million.

"And they don't need the thing," said an American working on the project. "They've got hydroelectric potential in Shaba. This is direct current so they can't use it for any cities along the way. And they spent too much, so the refinery it is meant to power is closed down. But if they want it... we'll build it."

From all evidence, basic solutions require psychological changes as much as economic ones. Africans say tribalism and corruption cannot stop until leaders set the example. Peasants must be shown that new methods are in their own interest.

Rene Dumont noted in his book, Africa Strangled, that African farmers would not work in cooperatives if others in the economy were not doing their part.

"Peasants may be conservative and backward," he wrote, "but they're not idiots."

Dumont also wrote: "Allowing the privileged classes to manage the nation in the sole interest of groups in power is the road to ruin."

Africa's future, most specialists agree, depends on careful use of every available resource. The problem is a lack of management and organisation, they say. The West can afford the wastefulness of its society, but Africa cannot. — AP

EDUCATION MINISTER AFFIRMS SOLIDARITY WITH LIBYA

Tripoli AL-TALIB in Arabic 16 Aug 81 pp 8-9

[Report on Interview with Minister of National Education, Acheikh Ibn Oumar: "Chad's Minister of Education Tells AL-TALIB That Pure Arabic Language is Language of People of Chad, Discusses Establishment of Uniform Educational Plan"]

> [Text] The cultural revolution provides a solution for eliminating the remnants of colonialism. The revolution of Chad is proposing the good news announced by the Third World Theory.

In the terrain of the Dark Continent and from the land of Chad the darkness of slavery and the fires of treacherous colonialism were driven away by the country's revolutionary citizens who are true to themselves and to their principles and who love freedom without which human life on this earth becomes futile. Human beings were born to be free, and so must live freely. It was in Chad on its journey to the liberated land, that the newspaper, AL-TALIB, the voice of the student odyssey, met one of the leaders of Chad. This leader from Chad firmly believes that colonialism was the source of misery for the people of Chad who will never renounce the freedom which they regained.

The interview was with the Brother, Acheikh Ibn Oumar, the minister of education in the government of Chad. We asked him at the outset to reveal to us the cultural remnants of colonialism which it left on this good earth and to tell us whether or not these remnants have been eliminated.

Our brother minister, Acheikh Ibn Oumar proceeded to speak to us in classical Arabic, a language he masters and speaks fluently, discrediting thereby the allegations of colonialists who consider Chad to be a part of France overseas. They think the citizens of Chad have given up everything [in their heritage] and can only communicate in the colonialist's language. However, Chad's liberals have discredited these dreams and aborted these attempts. Genuine Arab culture whose roots in Chad go back farther than colonialist imagine are still alive and throbbing in people's veins. Chadians speak and communicate with each other in the Arabic language, and they are in agreement on every large or small issue. Brother Minister Acheikh Ibn Oumar indicated to us that this interview was not the first of its kind to bring one of the leaders of Chad and Libyan Arab journalists together. He also pointed out that it would not be the last meeting between revolutionaries on both scenes. He said that this interview was one part in a long series of communications that have been taking place since the outbreak of the revolution in Chad between the revolutionary movement of Chad, the FROLINAT, and the revolutionaries of the great first of September. "At that time we were modest groups practicing the method of revolution and revolutionaries. Finally we were able to eliminate reactionaries and do away with colonialism with the participation, assistance and support of [our] revolutionary brothers in al-Jamahiriyah.

"To respond to your question, we will have to touch upon the existence of colonialism in Chad before we move to a discussion of what this colonialism left behind.

"Colonialist and reactionary sources are trying to make us believe that French colonialism came to the African continent in general to enlighten it and to put the African people in step with what is called world civilization. It were as though Africa had no civilization!

"Chad did have and still has an old, distinctive civilization, especially in the northern, eastern and central part [of the country]. That civilization is based on the Islamic religion and on Arab culture. There is no more telling evidence of this than the historical documents that can be found at present, such as the letters that were exchanged between kings when Islam was spreading, especially in the kingdom of Ouaddai, the kingdom of Kanem-Bornu the kingdom of Bagirmi and a few other kingdoms of the Middle East. There are also written historical accounts, especially a book by (ibn Furtuwa), a 13th century scholar in the kingdom of Kanem-Bornu. That scholar provides incontrovertible evidence that Islamic civilization has deep and ancient roots in Chad but that after colonialism entered Chad in the 20th century with the excuse of strengthening civilization and after it revealed its ugly face, a very serious incident occurred in the city of Abeche in 1917. That city was considered the capital of the northern section of Chad. There the colonialist army massacred intellectuals, thereby revealing from the first instant the colonialist plan to do away with the roots of Arab civilization. From that time until ours colonialism has not ceased nor has it spared any effort in fighting Arab and Islamic civilization in Chad. Thus it slaughtered and arrested Chad's intellectuals who tried to establish independent Arab schools, and it forced others to flee the country.

"Colonialism took action after that to spread its own culture which it claims is [synonymous with] civilization and development. It established schools and brought in Christian missionary missions. The country began experiencing a state of cultural hodge-podge, and a new generation was born that hardly knew anything about its history; it knew nothing but French culture. From here we can move to a discussion about the remnants which colonialism left behind in Chad.

"We can say that although the reactionary colonialist presence in Chad has finally been eliminated from a military standpoint, we still have a long way to go to liberate our land from the remnants of colonialist French culture. The French language is still the official language of the country, and the Arabic language is considered marginal or the language of the street despite the fact that it is widely used all over the country. Even in the southern section of Chad citizens speak an informal spoken Arabic dialect in their daily dealings [with each other].

"Thus among the remnants of colonialism we have among our citizens intellectuals who know nothing about the original culture of Chad whose origins and affiliations are Arab and Islamic.

"In the context of its plan to obliterate the roots of Chad's civilization, colonialism tried to encourage some backward and reactionary tendencies that assume a religious garb. It tried to spread backward religious beliefs that are very far from the proper instructions of religion and from a genuine understanding of revolution. Then, relying on the importance of the tribe in the makeup of our society, it tried to establish firmly among the masses of the people a tendency to favor one's class and one's tribe. Colonialism took this step in the political field to break up citizens' ranks and to spread rancor among citizens so that we would fight each other and create thereby a breach between the north and the south. The two parts of the country would fight with each other over power under the guise of religion. Colonialism entered the south in the name of religion through missionaries despite the fact that the ratio of Christians [to the population] in the south is small. It promoted the struggle between the north and the south as a struggle between Muslims and Christians over power."

The brother minister also indicated that from the first days of its presence in Chad and throughout the duration of its term in that country colonialism pursued repressive, terrorist methods. It began by striking at intellectuals to obliterate all the features of Arab Islamic civilization. [We asked], "Did intellectuals put up any resistance? Were those who managed to escape satisfied with merely escaping?"

"As I said colonialism first tried to do away with intellectuals in particular and then at the same time to find those who would take up the culture of the colonialist. In this regard we can divide history into three stages so we can explain clearly the intentions of colonialism and in return the revolutionary attempts that were made by some liberal progressive elements. We cannot say there was a revolutionary movement or a revolutionary resistance in the first stage. That stage can be limited to the period that preceded World War II. There were, however, individual positions assumed by a few Muslim scientists and intellectuals. At that time these positions were more like self-defense postures. However, we must not deny the exemplary courage which these positions represent.

"In the period between World War II and the late fifties progressive ideas began to reach some national groups in Chad, especially after the formation of the African Democratic Rally [RDA]. This party was formed to bring together the national independence movement inside the African colonies, especialy in the western part of the continent. It was formed because of Chad's relations with the countries of West Africa all of which were subservient to the same intellectual class in Chad. At the same time a few trade unions, parties and modest party groups were formed. Their purpose was to achieve ideological, revolutionary clarity. From a political standpoint at least they had clear revolutionary positions. This was especially the case with the students who organized themselves and went out in several demonstrations calling for independence and freedom.

"There was also the movement of Ibrahim Abatcha, the founder of the FROLINAT movement in the late fifties. The revolutionary movement grew out of all these initiatives.

"With regard to the third stage which we have been experiencing since the outbreak of the first of September Revolution in al-Jamahiriyah, [I can say that] the stage of resisting colonialism directly has begun. We are using everything we have to oppose colonialism. The date we can record for this period is the outbreak of the first of September Revolution in al-Jamahiriyah when the revolutionary movement in Chad presented for the first time a complete intellectual alternative to colonialism by presenting the good news announced by the Third World theory. This third stage is the last one [in the battle to] win the freedom and independence of the people of Chad. We are determined to eliminate once and for all the political, economic, social and cultural remnants of colonialism."

[We asked], "Colonialism and its colonialist culture will inevitably recede and be wiped out with the proclamation of the cultural revolution which is proposing a cultural alternative that promises freedom and the people's ultimate control of all their capabilities. Will the cultural revolution be proclaimed?"

"It is very difficult for me as minister of education in the government to answer this question because this matter is referred to all the members [of the government]. But as a fighter in Chad I can say that the ideas which prevail in our society can only be changed by a cultural revolution. However, the situation in Chad, and especially the role that was played by the aforementioned remnants of colonialism and the role played by a few reactionary or client elements, which infiltrated the ranks of the revolution, kept the genuine, vital questions of the revolution marginal for a long period of time in the revolution's history. At present we are celebrating, or more correctly we did celebrate in the past few weeks, the 15th anniversary of Chad's revolutionary movement. Quite frankly, however, on the cultural level we are seeing a kind of backlash on the scene in Chad, and it is due as I said to the remnants of colonialism. I am quite convinced that the outbreak of a radical cultural revolution is inevitable. Such a revolution will show neither mercy nor courtesy in eliminating the remnants of colonialism.

"I want to affirm that revolutionaries and those who espouse the revolution's real thinking on the scene in Chad are convinced that the outbreak of the cultural revolution is the only solution for doing away with all the remnants and contradictions of colonialism within the ranks of Chad."

[We asked], "Perhaps the most important step that would help expedite the elimination of colonialist culture is that of revealing its malice and its shameful intentions vis a vis the students of Chad themselves. Can you, its brother minister, give us an idea what the attitudes of Chad's students in general are about the colonialist agenda?"

"There is a kind of national feeling prevailing among students, especially among those who absorbed colonialist culture. There is a feeling that the educational policy, which has been pursued since colonialism and after the false independence, has been serving the interests of colonialism first and foremost. There is more than one piece of evidence of this.

"A long time ago a few individuals realized the danger of introducing the French language [into Chad] as an official or a national language to replace the Arabic language. They assumed clear positions against [that step] and made numerous attempts to present this problem nationally. Finally, we saw this during the staff convention that was held last May under the government's supervision. Our fellow intellectuals used this opportunity as a platform to affirm that the Arabic language in Chad's history was an inseparable part of our contemporary cultural heritage and to affirm that the French language was playing a colonialist role. We can also say that students are aware of the need to change the educational courses or policy in general because these are colonialist. But so far, as I said, we lack the clarity of vision particularly in the theoretical field. In any systematic position or attempt to effect change, unless a course, a theory or a clear idea is utilized, the successful performance of a function and actual success in doing away with the backwardness and negative ignorance in which [this country] finds itself will prove to be difficult. A system cannot be changed unless there is another to replace it. I repeat: in general we must say that this stage is a stage of transition to strengthen revolutionary thinking in general and the field of education in particular."

The brother minister does not object to the idea of establishing a uniform educational plan for al-Jamahiriyah and Chad. In the next few days he intends to meet the secretary of education in al-Jamahiriyah, and in the light of the meeting an agreement will be reached about which uniform educational plan [will be adopted].

It is thus time for the political "wheeler-dealers" to be quiet, and it is time for colonialists to know that the liberals will not tarry for one instant in getting together with those who love freedom to wipe out every reactionary colonialist attempt. It is time for them to know that Africa, which was and still is the cradle of civilization, does not accept degradation and injustice; it will not succumb to humiliation; it will continue to fight against every interfering colonialist and every decadent reactionary.

Africa will be for Africans only. It will ally itself with no one but itself. The armed struggle against imperialism and colonialism will continue.

ASIANS CONTRIBUTE TO ECONOMIC VIABILITY

Bangkok BANGKOK POST in English 8 Sep 81 p 8

[Article by Dieter Ebeling: "The Uncomfortable Truths About Kenya's Asians"]

[Text]

NAIROBI

THE streets are full of women in colourful saris. The signs outside the shops bear the strange sounding names of their owners — Ramji Lakamshi or Prakash Patel.

The man at the counter leafs through a copy of the "Times of India" and chats to a friend in his native language Gujarati. A group of turbanned Sikhs huddle together in a cafe over a meal of chapatis and curry.

The scene is not an Indian city, but Nairobi, capital of Kenya.

Around 79,000 Asians of Pakistani and Indian descent live in this East African state. They make up half of one per cent of the population, but dominate the retail trade, light industry and construction.

When an African buys something, the man he pays at the cash register is more often than not an Asian. This often irritates African politicians, and prompts periodic calls for the repatriation of the Asians and the "Africanisation" of the economy. Such demands have resurfaced lately.

FAVOURABLE

"Everything is favourable for Whites and Browns," Kenya's Assistant Minister for Livestock Development, Martin Shikuku, told Parliament recently.

"We want to share the wealth of this country equitably." Eighteen years after independence the economy still needed to be "Africanized" and not "Kenyanised," he said.

Noting that 32,600 of the Asians were Kenyan citizens, as were ten per cent of the 45,000 Europeans living in Kenya, the minister warned there could be no "stability and peace in the world when some people's stomachs are empty."

His colleague, Koigi Wa Wamwere, put it more bluntly: "Today we have a class society where the Europeans are number one, the Asians number two and the Africans number three."

Indian merchants and seafarers settled on the African coast of the Indian Ocean a long time ago. At the end of the last century 13,000 Indian labourers were used to build the railway from the Port of Mobassa to Uganda.

As Britain consolidated its colonial presence in east Africa, the influx of traders and craftsmen from the Indian subcontinent grew. More often than not they set up shop in the interior, around which small communities grew.

Many of the Indians living in Kenya have never seen India. Their parents or grandparents settled here.

Shikuku's verbal broadside against the "foreigners" resulted in a flood of letters to newspapers, giving vent to years of pent-up anger at their dominant role in the economy.

Minister for Home and Constitutional Affairs Charles Njonjo recognised the potential seriousness of the discussion and came to the defence of the Asians, telling Shikuku that the Kenyan constitution knows no skin colour, and does not differentiate between Africans, Asians or others.

"Racialism in this country is something that we abhor as we abhor racialism in South Africa," he declared, and added that the Asians, Europeans and Arabs had become whipping boys for Kenya's failures.

Njonjo cautioned: "If we are going to condemn South Africa for racialism, we should not condemn Asians and call them paper citizens."

Referring to an offer by Shikuku to speak in Njonjo's constituency to determine who had the people's support, the minister replied: "Shikuku would be beaten up by the people if he were to show his face there."

Many Africans regard the Asians' closed society with suspicion, and claim that it stops them from getting a foothold in the economy. This explains why Idi Amin's brutal expulsion of 32,000 Asians from Uganda nine years ago met with initial approval.

Only later, as the Ugandan economy was in a shambles, was it clear that the knowledge and skills the Asians took with them could not be replaced so easily.

POPULATION

Over the past two decades the Asian population of Kenya has steadily shrunk. In the 1960s and 1970s when efforts were underway to Africanise the economy, thousands left Kenya because they did not want to take out Kenyan citizenship.

Their shops and factories were bought up by Africans only to change back later into Asian hands.

Lack of money and experience, coupled with the realisation that a shopkeeper had to do more than just sit at the cash till, forced the African owners to sell.

President Daniel Arap Moi stepped in recently to put an end to the debate. "I don't need MPs who talk a lot like parrots that sing tunes they don't understand. I need MPs who are men of action."

Those members of Parliament who "jump around saying the economy of the country is not as it should be," should themselves take out a state-backed credit and open up a business of their own.

At the same time Moi appealed to the Asian community to share their skills and knowledge to enable Africans to participate more in Kenya's economic life.

The Asians are not loved, but they are needed, as one observer put it. — DPA

JUSTICE MINISTER BACKS ONE-PARTY SYSTEM

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 12 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE MINISTER FOR JUSTICE, Mr. Polycarp, who was chairman of the Constitution Committee, on Friday spoke defensively in favour of one party government.

The Minister said one party governments, were in fact more democratic than multi party systems. He said in multi party governments MPs are not free to speak what they think, but are bound by party dogma and go to parliament with instructions to toe the party line.

"A number of people in modern political philosophy cannot understand Swazi democracy because they think the only way to be democratic is when there are political parties," he said.

"Other people think there should even be an official opposition in order for a government to be are political parties," he said.

The Minister was speaking during a reception to celebrate the 70th anniversary of the Wuchang revolution which overthrew the Manchu dynasty in China and set up a Republic; in the Royal Swazi Hotel on Friday evening.

The reception was given by the Chinese ambassador to Swaziland, Mr. Chou Tung-hua.

Mr. Dlamini invited those who think there is no democracy in Swaziland to sit-in during Parliamentary debates to cast-off their prejudices.

"In a multi party situation, people go to parliament with closed minds determined to do nothing but toe the party line," he said. He argued that party dogma inhibits free debate.

"I ask you, which is more democratic, to go to a meeting with a free mind or to go with a closed mind," he asked.

The audience burst out laughing when the Minister said: "We are communal, but not communistic.

On a brighter note, Mr. Dlamini expressed appreciation for the assistance provided by the Chinese Republic to Swaziland, particularly in agriculture. He also thanked the Chinese for their contributions towards displays during the Diamond Jubilee.

Mr. Chou said although his country had many problems internationally it has made remarkable progress.

"We have been able to weather all storms and we came out stronger than ever," he said. "We are grateful to all our friends, Swaziland among them, for the support they have given us," he said.

PM DISCUSSES DUAL LEGAL SYSTEM

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 13 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE SWAZI people are neither strangers nor immune to the problems caused or arising from the dual application of laws and systems inherited from their colonial masters alongside their own indigenous laws and institutions, says the Prime Minister, Prince Mabandla.

In a speech delivered on his behalf by the Minister for Justice, Mr. Polycarp Dlamini at the official opening of the First All Africa Law Conference at the Swazi Royal Hotel and Spa yesterday, the Prime Minister stated that the dual systems thus created - whether the imported component is Dutch-Roman or English - all present a common problem - the individual is caught in the middle.

The individual, he said, was subject to two legal systems, two sets of possible consequences for one act.

"Even in matters of crime, he lives under two jurisdictions, each with the right to punish the same wrongful act - though of course the type of punishment may vary from system to system", said the Prime Minister.

The theme of the conference is: 'the individual under African law' and is being attended by members of the law fraternity from almost all over Africa. The delegates include Ministers from a number of countries.

The idea for such a conference, the first in the whole of Africa originated from Mr. Justice David Cohen, a retired judge of the High Court of Swaziland, who formed a co-ordinating committee comprising among others some staff members of the University College of Swaziland. He is attending the conference.

It is being financed by the United States Agency for International Development, and ends this Friday.

In his speech, the Prime Minister invited the delegates to try through their concerted efforts to provide the bridges that will form a harmonious link between what he called the two sometimes diametrically opposed systems.

Addressing himself to what he termed the issue of law-reform, the Prime Minister stated: "There is no doubt that in some areas the present pattern of our

PM DENIES STATEMENT ON BOYCOTT OF GAMES

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 13 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE PRIME MINISTER, Prince Mabandla has categorically denied that he had ever told a press conference in Australia that African leaders at last week's Commonwealth Conference had decided against a boycott of next year's Commonwealth Games.

Prince Mabandla told a press conference in Mbabane yesterday - a day after his return from Melbourne where he attended this year's Commonwealth meeting, that he had told the reporters that this issue had never even been discussed by the conference.

He also made in clear during yesterday's press conference that he had told the Australian reporters that the question whether or not to boycott the games was a domestic affair for individual countries, entirely depending upon how each country conducted its sport policy.

The Prime Minister described this year's Commonwealth Conference as having been a big success except for the sad news of the assassination of President Sadat which reached the head of states as they wound up their deliberations.

Three new members were admitted to the Commonwealth, including Zimbabwe, whose independence had been one of the major issues during the 1979 Commonwealth Conference in Lusaka, Zambia.

Other issues reviewed with concern by this year's conference was lack of international security in the face of presently mounting tension between the superpowers.

The 41 members expressed concern at the present state of the world economy, particularly in view of the widening gap between the poor and rich countries.

While developed countries were urged to help the poor, the summit also emphasised that the burden of assisting the underdeveloped countries should not be the entire responsibility of the rich nations.

Prince Mabandla said the summit stressed that all concerned should put their shoulders of the wheel, including the poor nations themselves.

The delegates also expressed concern at the worsening energy crisis which had resulted in escalated transport cost. Transporting food for instance, from developed to underdeveloped countries, the summit felt was too costly.

Many developing countries were said to be finding it increasingly difficult to pay for the transporting of food from rich countries.

The next conference will be held in New Delhi, India in 1983. At the end of the conference Prince Mabandla toured a number of places of interest in Australia, including sugar growing areas.

REPORTAGE ON ALL-AFRICAN LAW CONFERENCE

Protest Against South Africa

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 14 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

DELEGATES from the East African countries who pulled out of the All Africa Law Conference at the Ezulwini Valley this week in protest against the presence of South African scholars were expected to leave the country yesterday.

The delegations from Tanzania and Uganda led by their respective Ministers of Justice walked out of the conference on Monday afternoon. The Ministers are Mrs. Julia Manning of Tanzania and Mr Grace Wanya of Uganda.

The continued attendance of the Zimbabwean delegation was yesterday said by some delegates to be uncertain after the walk out by Tanzania and Uganda.

Anti-South Africa elements issued a statement on Monday afternoon stating conditions for the attendance of the South Africans following objections to their presence.

The statement pointed out among other things that "in view of the human rights implication of the conference theme, scholars from a country whose records with respect of human rights is as abhorrent and brutal as South Africa's should participate only if they had in their scholarships demonstrated a clear commitment to the abolition of the apartheid system."

The Tanzanian and Ugandan delegations were approached by the Times reporters in the lounge of the Royal Swazi Hotel and Spa where they were discussing the matter with conference leaders yesterday morning.

They declined to comment, pointing out that they were still discussing the matter with conference officials.

A spokesman for the conference organisers later confirmed to the Times that the two East African countries' delegates would be leaving the country.

Among the South African scholars attending the conference are Prof. J.D. Van de Vyver, Prof. A.L. Vilakazi and Mrs. Carmen Nathan who it is understood were invited to the conference because of their scholarships and demonstrated commitment to equal justice, the enhancement of human dignity and the abolition of apartheid in South Africa.

The issue of their presence was raised on Monday afternoon by Kenya's Lee Mutonga, Chairman of the African Bar Association whose comments caused a heated reaction from Prof. Vilakazi.

Although South African by birth, Prof. Vilakazi is now a naturalised American citizen, but presently teaching in a university in the Republic.

He said he resented that African scholars should regard Black South Africans as if they were perpetrators of a system which was oppressive to themselves.

South African Delegation Hit

AFRICAN delegates at the all law and human rights conference at Ezulwini told three controversial South African academics to forget about academic analysis of the South African situation and get to the grass roots of the problem because of its pressing nature.

The delegates were reacting to the paper by Professor L.J. van der Vyver of the University of Witwatersrand which gave an analysis of the human rights situation in South Africa with emphasis on plural legal practices and apartheid. Professor van der Vyver described the situation in his country as unjust and extremely complex.

Professor Lindi Mdluli, of the University of Botswana and Swaziland described Professor van der Vyver's paper as "middle class white intellectual rubbish, picking on minor things" when the problem was at the top. She described Professor A.L. Vilakazi, who is a member of the South African delegation, and who also discussed the subject, as a middle class anthropologist.

Kenya's Lee Muthoga, president of the African Bar Association, said a gathering of African lawyers must regard a situation where racial segration is forcefully institutionalised and regulated as a basis upon which all the problems are based and therefore not be interested in the details of how these forceful segragation policies are carried out.

"All the problems cannot be divorced from the system and the system cannot be divorced from them", he said. Professor van der Vyver said he tries to be more than academic in South Africa but that the conference leaders had restricted him to the theme of the conference. At one stage he was apologetic and reacted to accusations by saying he was a lawyer and not a politician.

"We lawyers do not make decisions but can influence them," said Profeffor Marcus Jones of the university of Sierra Leone.

Professor van der Vyver agreed with the other delegates that there was no need to even talk about human rights in his country unless blacks are granted political participation. He said South Africa had not even made a start in acceptable constitutional development.

A number of seats were conspicuously empty during Professor van der Vyvers talk. One notable absence was that of Professor Okbotho Ogendo, Dean of Law, University of Nairobi, Kenya. Professor Ogendo returned to the conference meeting afterwards but refused to answer questions when asked whether his absence meant a boycott of Professor van der Vyver's talk.

The presence of the South African academics has caused a controversy and delegates from two East African countries have walked out.

There was no reaction to an emotional appeal by Mrs. Carmen Nathan of South Africa to African delegates to recognise and support white lawyers fighting for human rights in South Africa.

FORMER POLICE CHIEF CHARGED WITH RITUAL MURDER

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 13 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

FORMER police Superintendent Mr. Jeremiah Dube, with three others, appeared briefly before the High Court yesterday facing a charge of murder.

Dube, together with George Chibi, Idah Sihlongonyane and Mampempe Simelane, have been charged in connection with the ritual murder of a woman, Rhodinah Nxumalo, whose body was found mutilated in Siteki in 1975. The case has been postponed by consent by Mr. Justice D.D. Will to the 2nd November and the accused have all not been asked to plead.

The four were originally charged jointly with two others, Mmemo Nhleko and Fifana Phakathi. Following separations of trial granted for the others, the two have been appearing together before retired judge, Mr. Justice David Cohen.

Their trial was last month postponed sine die owing to the inability of Mr. Cohen, who has been called back from retirement, to come to Swaziland. Mr. Cohen has finally arrived and yesterday presided over a continuing civil matter involving the Commonwealth Development Corporation.

It has not been as yet established when the case against Nhleko and Phakathi is due to continue before Mr. Cohen.

Meanwhile, Dube, represented by Mr. Victor Berrange, is presently on bail following his successful second application to the High Court.

Chibi and Sihlongonyane are represented by Mr. W.M. Pupuma while Simelane is represented by Mr Peter Dunseith

PRESIDENT ADDRESSES THIRTEENTH UNZA GRADUATION CEREMONY

Development Reasearch Needed

Lusaka SUNDAY TIMES in English 18 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

PRESIDENT Kaunda yesterday directed the University of Zambia to use its research programme to find solutions to the country's development problems.

He challenged the institution to achieve self-sufficiency in food production.

Dr Kaunda was speaking at the 13th Unza graduation ceremony attended by Party Secretary-General Mulemba, Secretary of State for Defence and Security Zulu and other top Party and Government officials.

He was satisfied that for the first time the number of graduates had passed a 700 mark — which was a remarkable achievement for an institution only 15 years old.

But he recalled that the university had four research institutes and bureaus which carried out research in various fields.

"It appears that results from research projects do not come out as quickly as graduates do from teaching programmes. It is incumbent upon the university to make the results from their various research activities visible."

He told a colourful ceremony held on the grounds of the Great East Road campus that he would like to see Unza using its creativity to review its programmes and activities to enhance its role as an agent of change and development.

Another special feature of the graduation was that for the first time the university was awarding degrees in accountancy and business administration from its new Ndola campus.

This was in response to Dr Kaunda's announcement at the tenth graduation ceremony in 1975 that to meet the challenge of the revolution effectively the university should be decentralised and developed on a federal basis comprising three constituent institutions — Lusaka, Ndola and rural campus at Solwezi.

Dr Kaunda noted yesterday that at the Lusaka campus a new programme in international law had started and as the first products received their diplomas the move was welcome to the country's legal services which had always been understaffed.

The mission of the university was to provide a service to the nation in the form of manpower production for national development.

The basic idea of a university was inherited from the ancient Greek and Roman institutions which were developed for philosphical research and teaching.

While accepting that a university must have universal features it could not be ignored that its concepts varied according to the societies in which it originated and the historical period it developed.

"It must therefore be understood that such concepts must be modified in order that they may properly and effectively guide the mission of a university, especially in a young and dynamic nation like ours."

Dr Kaunda, who is Unza Chancellor, said universities had become community projects over the years especially in developing countries.

Their continued growth had been dictated by the needs of society and not by the demands of academics in search of a community of scholars.

"This being the case, the biggest shareholder in this enterprise is the public. The biggest shareholder therefore has the right to demand his due dividend in the form of the university's contribution to social progress."

He warned that even under heavy social pressure universities could not perform the role of an agent or social change unless they were guided by an ideology of "service."

Once this ideology was accepted the institution became alert to the needs and demands of society of which it was a part and the teachers became creative in their efforts to design new programmes that were responsive to the changing needs of society.

If the graduation number of more than 700 was anything to go by it was evident the university had properly performed its teaching functions.

What the university needed in the face of the specific challenges of the decade was to sharpen its alertness of community needs while at the same time strengthening its commitment to national ideals such as self-sufficiency in food production.

Dr Kaunda singled out food production because of his earnest desire to see Zambia achieve meaningful political as well as economic independence.

Solwezi Campus's Establishment Urged

AS the nation prepares to celebrate its 17th Independence anniversary, 784 of its sons and daughters yesterday passed through the gates of the University of Zambia as full graduates.

This is a moment to rejoice for the entire nation because it indicates how far we have gone taking into consideration that 17 years ago we had only a handful of university graduates.

But what makes the 13th graduation ceremony more meaningful is that out of the number who received their degrees, diplomas and certificates from the Chancellor, President Kaunda, 63 of them are the product of the Unza Ndola campus, a success story of the federal system introduced at Unza a few years ago.

In the midst of this euphoria, let us stop and pause a question as what has happened to the third rural campus which was earmarked for Solwezi.

This nation attaches great importance to rural development and agriculture in particular.

The President was yesterday at pains to querry as to what the four research institutes at Unza are producing. He also talked about the university providing the essential tools in the process of social change.

This social change is not going to occur if we do not produce from our highest institution of learning the cadres to implement it. If rural development is one of our national priorities, it is time that the proposed Solwezi campus came to life. If agriculture is going to be the mainstay of our economy, it is time we started producing the people to carry out this revolution.

Zambia is almost getting to saturation point in terms of the production of white collar graduates. But we are still far behind in producing the technical personnel needed for our revolution.

One hopes that at the 14th graduation ceremony next year, the nation will get a progress report on the proposed rural campus.

KAUNDA ASSURES SOVIET PEACE COMMITTEE OF NATION'S FULL SUPPORT

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

PRESIDENT Kaunda yesterday assured the Soviet peace committee of Zambia's full support in its efforts to bring about peace in the world.

Dr Kaunda, who was speaking after a working breakfast for a three-man Soviet Union peace committee at State House, said Zambia would continue to support any efforts aimed at bringing peace because it was important in the development of mankind.

"It is because of the importance of peace in the development of mankind that we also urge the Soviet Union peace committee to continue its efforts in the search for peace."

He praised the chairman of the committee Mr Eugeny Fedorov who is delegation leader and described him as a selfless man in the search for peace.

"You have accepted to use your brain for the development of mankind because of the importance peace plays in this field," Dr Kaunda said.

"You continue to co-ordinate efforts aimed at bringing about peace, which is a very big contribution to the entire mankind."

Mr Fedorov was accompanied to State House by Member of the Central Committee and Chairman of the Legal and Political Sub-Committee Mr Reuben Kamanga, Foreign Affairs Minister Professor Lameck Goma and officials from the Soviet embassy.

In reply, Mr Fedorov said the people of the Soviet Union were grateful to Zambia's contribution in the search for peace in the region and the world as a whole.

He praised Zambians for the warm reception accorded to his delegation since it arrived in the country last Wednesday.

"This hospitality contributes to the continued friendship between our two countries," Mr Fedorov said. __ Zana.

KAUNDA INSTRUCTS MINISTRIES TO WORK OUT TOLL ROAD SYSTEM

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

PRESIDENT Kaunda has instructed the ministries of Finance, Provincial Administration and Works and Supply to work out a system for motorists to pay a small toll for using roads.

Dr Kaunda issued this instruction when he officially opened the 56 km Ndola-Kitwe dual carriageway on the Copperbelt yesterday.

Since the nation had invested so much in the project, it was essential that maintenance of the highway and all major roads be carefully programmed.

"Because of this, I wish to propose that arrangements to introduce a system for motorists to pay a small toll for using either a road or a bridge be actively considered for implementation."

Toll is tax paid for use of road or bridge.

He stressed that time had come for Zambia to institute deliberate measures to protect the heavy investment on roads.

The President directed the Ministry of Works and Supply, the National Commission for Development Planning and the Ministry of Finance to ensure that adequate funds for the maintenance of roads were provided in each Budget every year.

He urged Ndola and Kitwe district councils to urgently construct dual carriageway entries in their respective cities to link with the new highway.

"Once a decision to undertake a project is made, everybody concerned should ensure that construction work starts immediately because delays have cost the nation a fortune."

He was referring to the dual carriageway which has cost K22 million to complete but it could have cost K15 million less had construction started immediately the idea was mooted in 1968.

For motorists to benefit from the dual carriageway, he said, the existing road should be reconstructed and upgraded at a cost of K20 million to equal the standard of the new one.

"I am aware that funds are not easy to come by. All the same, something should be done to ensure the reconstruction of the old road."

He instructed the various Government institutions to institute immediate action for the reconstruction of the existing road.

On the usage of the dual carriageway, Dr Kaunda appealed to motorists to co-operate with the authorities in any measure which might be introduced aimed at reducing the road carnage.

This is the first long distance dual carriageway in the country introduced to curb road accidents.

"Some of us remember the many valuable lives lost through accidents on the Ndola-Kitwe road. The Party and its Government decided to construct a dual carriageway between Ndola and Kitwe to avoid further loss of valuable lives.

Financed

"I know that the construction of a dual carriageway alone will not eliminate accident," Dr Kaunda said.

The road, which was partly financed by the Arab Bank for Reconstruction and Development in Africa, has been built using imported fill and gravel and a 50-centimetre premix asphalt covering.

The President said he was assured by experts that the road has a greater thickness than others and a width capable of preventing damage for the next 20 years.

The President paid tribute to Cogefar, the company which constructed the road and recalled that the same organisation constructed the Mpika-Kasama and Kasama-Mbala roads.

He said discussions for the company to embark on the Chama-Matumbo road had reached an advanced stage.

He hoped the discussions would be completed soon to ensure continuous employment for the company's 600 Zambian labour force and 25 expatriate engineers and technicians.

The fact that Cogefar, an international company had continued to invest and assist in the development of the nation was a clear testimony of the faith and confidence the company's board of directors had in the future of Zambia, he said.

KAUNDA: 'FOOD PROGRAM WELL PLANNED SOCIALIST EXERCISE'

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Oct 81 p 5

[Excerpt]

PRESIDENT Kaunda has defended the K400 million operation food programme as a well planned socialist exercise aimed at defeating hunger and its offshoots of poverty and disease.

Although the country had no experience in running state farms, the schemes were carefully planned and he had no doubt about their success.

Speaking at the 13th University of Zambia graduation ceremony in Lusaka at the weekend, the President praised Zambians for their response to the Party's call to produce more food.

In a developing country like Zambia there was a burning desire to emprove the communal well-being of the people by providing more food, better health and education.

He told the ceremony attended by Party Secretary-General Mulemba, Secretary of State for Defence and Security Zulu, and other top Party and Government officials that there was a danger if these amenities were only available to the privileged few.

The President directed Unza to use its research programme to find solutions to the country's development problems and challenged the institution to achieve self-sufficiency in food production.

The President said Zambia's agrarian crusade was synonymous with the survival of the nation.

The World Food Day celebrations reminded the country the plight of two-thirds of humanity who live in poverty and its offshoots of hunger, ignorance, disease, crime, corruption and exploitation of man by man.

The celebrations should not only give people food for thought but ginger them into intensifying their contribution to the "operation food production" programme.

As part of the "operation food production" programme, the "lima" exercise catered for peasants aimed at developing the production capacity of the masses rather than mass production by the few.

The second part of the programme was the formation of cooperatives where the country faced problems because of lack of technical know-how and skills in organising them.

MUNDIA SAYS ECONOMIC BOTTLENECKS TO BE REMOVED

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 20 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt] The State is determined to restructure the country's economy to allow for more usage of local raw materials and remove the problems that tend to make Zambia a high cost area for both consumers and manufacturers.

The Party and its Government were now concentrating on generating more employment opportunities through promoting agriculture and industries based on the use of local raw materials.

Prime Minister Nalumino Mundia said this in Ndola yesterday when he officially opened an extension building at Lyons Brooke Bond Zambia Ltd.

Mr Mundia said as well as diversifying the economy, the new measures being taken will also satisfy local demand, generate exportable surpluses, create a strong rural economy through priorities given to rural development and reduce disparities in the levels of income between rural and urban population.

He said the Party and its Government were greatly concerned with the present situation in the manufacturing sector whereby almost all manufacturing enterprises depended on large scale importation of raw materials and other inputs.

"This results in low capacity performance whenever the country is short of foreign exchange to pay for these imports," Mr Mundia said.

Because of the high oil prices and the low copper prices during the past few years, Mr Mundia said, Zambia had frequently experienced shortages of foreign exchange resulting in failure by factories to produce and supply essential commodities.

It was imperative, therefore, not only to attract large scale investors but also to restructure the economy in such a way that the manufacturing sector would depend largely on local raw materials.

"This is to be achieved by developing agriculture. In the process, employment opportunities will also be created for many people in the rural areas," he said.

Mr Mundia also pointed out that another disadvantage of depending on imported raw materials and other inputs is that the cost of production is greatly inflated.

He said this was because the manufacturers have to pay the high prices of purchasing and transporting these imports in addition to the costs normally incurred in the manufacturing process.

"The effect has been to make Zambia a high cost area for both consumers and manufacturers. This situation is undesirable and the Party and its Government are determined to rectify it by using the measures I have already enumerated," Mr Mundia said.

The Party and its Government, Mr Mundia said, have also taken measures to establish small scale industries throughout the country to alleviate shortages of essential commodities.

He said these would be mainly agro-based industries of labour intensive nature.

"Thus, as well as meeting the demand for essential commodities, the small scale industries will also contribute in the generation of employment opportunities in the rural areas," he said.

NORWAY INCREASES DEVELOPMENT AID 1981-1984

[Excerpt] Norway has increased development aid to Zambia for the current four-year period, 1981-84, to K28 million from K24 million, Foreign Affairs Minister, Professor Lameck Goma said yesterda.

The minister applauded Norway for the move which has been taken at a time when that country is facing economic problems.

Paying tribute to Norway for the assistance which is revised yearly, Professor Goma said: "There is nothing nobler than to help make the lives of other human beings better."

He was speaking in Lusaka at a luncheon he hosted for outgoing Norwegian Ambassador to Zambia, Mr Neils Dahl.

Norway, he said, had distinguished herself as a reliable partner in development because of her consistent aid through her agency for international development (NORAD).

"Norway is certainly one of Zambia's major partners in development. This is evidenced by the number of development projects in which your country, Mr Ambassador, is engaged."

A large number of Norwegian nationals are scattered all over Zambia rendering "very valuable services and technical know-how" in various fields of national development.

He said: "As the majority of our people live in rural areas, Norway's involvement in rural development is thus of particular significance in the quest to improve the quality of life for the greatest section of our community."

Norway also assists Zambia to solve the problem of trained manpower through the many Norwegian experts and volunteers made available in many fields.

Scholarships are offered to many Zambians to study and acquire various skills in institutions of higher learning in Norway.

"Norway also provides Zambia with commodity assistance to enable us to bring in the much-needed essential goods. At a time of considerable shortage of foreign exchange as Zambia has had and continues to confront these past few years and now, this form of assistance is extremely vital to the well-being of our country," he added.

PRAISE OF CANADIAN AID

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

FOREIGN Minister Professor Lameck Goma has hailed Canada's immense contribution to Zambia's efforts to achieve self-sufficiency in food production and other areas of economic development.

Prof. Goma said in Lusaka yesterday that Canada was involved in various development projects such as transport, agriculture and rural development.

He said this when new Canadian high commissioner to Zambia Mr Charles Forgerty presented him with copies of his credentials.

Canada's participation in agriculture was most welcome. Canada's help in developing the rural areas was highly commendable as the majority of Zambia's citizens who lived there would benefit greatly.

He described relations between Canada and Zambia as "excellent and cordial" and noted that the Canadians were involved in many crucial projects.

Mr Forgerty said his country had a long agricultural background and was in a position to help Zambia in this area.

He said he was looking forward to his assignment in Zambia and pledged to work closely with officials.

SOLWEZI COUNCIL TO REVOKE LICENSES OF TRADERS ALONG ZAIRE BORDER

Action Follows Discovery of Racket

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Arnold Kapelembi]

[Excerpt]

SOLWEZI district council is to revoke trading licences for businessmen along the border with Zaire to end smuggling.

The action follows the discovery of a racket in which Zaireans use Zambians to buy essential commodities in bulk ferried across the border at Kipushi at night.

A Times of Zambia investigating team which visited the area found that more than 35 villagers in chiefs Musaka and Chikola had retail trading licences but there were only three established shops which operate at night.

Governor Mr Sylvester Sikufweba confirmed the racket and blamed the former rural council for issuing licences "at random".

The Zambian "traders" are given money by the Zaireans to buy goods especially sugar and mealie meal from Solwezi boma which is about 125 km from Kipushi border post. The contraband is stored in houses until it is dark when it is taken into Zaire.

Mr Sikufweba said: "Even the few shops which are there are permanently closed. They carry out business transactions at night."

He has also instructed councillors at the border to ensure that the shops remained open during the day. "The idea of granting licences is to give service to people." He wondered why the shops were not opened to the public.

"Our records show that a large number of people have trading licences but we do not know where they trade from. These are the people who are given money by the Zaireans to buy goods using their licences and are paid a commission."

The council licensing committee has been ordered to scrutinise all applications for trading licences and ensure that only genuine applicants obtained licences.

Admitted

The governor admitted that some civil servants were involved in the racket but denied the use of Government vehicles to transport the goods.

Civil servants hired their vehicles to the racketeers to transport the goods to the border and charged K100.

The smuggling racket came to light last week when Minister of State for Legal Affairs and Solicitor-General Mr Ludwig Sondashi revealed that senior Party and Government officials in Solwezi were involved in smuggling.

The department of customs and excise is carrying out its own investigations and the police have deployed a mobile unit which is manning a roadblock.

In Ndola, Copperbelt provincial political secretary Mrs Esther Banda called on Party officials to mount an education campaign to end black marketeering and smuggling of goods.

Speaking when she officially closed the Ndola Urban district annual conference at the weekend, Mrs Banda said it was only through political education that shortages of sugar and other essential goods would end.

Party leaders should monitor the arrival and distribution of essential commodities.

Mount

It was the duty of leaders at the section and branch levels to mount a campaign and close ranks in the fight against crime and shortage of goods.

Party leaders should give urgent attention to the measures the Party and its Government had taken to bring the situation under control.

Urgent Anti-Smuggling Measures Needed

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Oct 81 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

WHATEVER Solwezi governor Sylvester Sikufweba may advance as an excuse the truth remains that it is the authorities in that district who are aiding the smuggling of goods across the border into Zaire.

Mr Sikufweba has been in the area for a long time; he must know what the former township and rural councils were doing. He was the chairman of the Solwezi district development council which is the final approver of trading licences.

Now what is he telling the nation? He is trying to pass the buck on the former councils for issuing licences indiscriminately. That is a load of rubbish.

He should say "mea culpa".

If he has nothing to offer against smuggling he would do better to keep quiet and apply for a transfer so that somebody else practical comes in. That will be courageous of him.

When Zambians are grumbling day and night about shortages, what little amounts of sugar, salt, cooking oil, Kafue cloth or soap are produced from their factories should be consumed by them.

If we have to export as we are doing cement from Chilanga Cement factory let us do so legally and openly. But we should not leave the local market starving.

The same goes for Solwezi where this newspaper sent its own men to find out the truth.

What Ndola chief reporter Arnold Kapelembi and photographer Rodrick Phiri discovered shows that short of urgent measures being taken at Kipushi post and other likely border centres Zambians — those in Solwezi especially — will continue to clamour for goods which find their way into foreign hands.

Mr Sikufweba should summon his departmental chiefs and together they must work out emergency measures.

The mobile police camp should be stationed at Kipushi itself not 15 kilometres away.

A nose count must be taken of those with trading licences and if they have no buildings the licences should be withdrawn there and then.

Shops should be open during the day and shut at a stipulated hour. Any shop found open at night must be closed and the owner should lose his licence.

Wholesale traders at Solwezi should determine the demand in a given area. Surely villagers are not daily shoppers so their demand is not as big as that of civil servants at Chizera or Kabompo.

Why then should a wholesaler not become suspicious if ten licence holders from Kipushi, a centre with not more than 200 people with buying power, are ordering goods worth K2,000 each?

Party and Government officials may not be using Government vehicles to ferry contraband to Kipushi. All the same they are wrong, unpatriotic and not fit to be public servants.

Why do they sink so low and be used to deny their fellow Zambians of the products of their country?

Solwezi police chief Clement Mbangweta has an onerous task He must be ruthless to succeed; if he and his officers shirk they will be to blame.

IMF LOAN DETAILS DISCUSSED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE Government has sent its figures for September ceiling to the International Monetary Fund in Washington for approval before it can draw the K180 million for the last two quarters of this year.

This was revealed to the Sunday Times by reliable Government sources who said Press reports that Zambia had clinched the draw for the last part of this year's programme on the IMF loan facility were misleading.

The sources said Zambia failed to meet the IMF conditions for the June ceiling which would have enabled her to draw K90 million in August. By meeting the September ceiling, she would have drawn another K90 million in November.

Zambia apparently failed to remain within the IMF ceiling for the amount of money (credit) the Government could borrow from the banks to pump into the economy, thus breaching the IMF conditions.

According to the IMF, once a condition is breached, the borrower cannot use the facility and thus Zambia could not draw the K90 million in August since the IMF stopped the payment.

Zambia first drew K130 million soon after the K800 million loan facility spread over a three-year programme was approved by the IMF on May 17.

This was to help in Zambia's balance of payments. But the second drawing scheduled for August was on condition that Zambia met the June ceiling which she failed to do.

The sources said Finance Minister Mr Kebby Musokotwane and his delegation's trip to Washington was not to renegotiate the IMF programme but a coincidence that Zambia was having problems at the same time the IMF was having its annual general meeting. The Zambian delegation took the opportunity to discuss with the IMF these problems.

According to the sources, the IMF told the Zambians they would consider continuing the payment if Zambia met the September ceiling.

IFC TO PROVIDE LOAN FOR CHINGOLA TAILINGS LEACH PLANT

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 21 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt] The International Finance Corporation (IFC) is to lend Zambia K26 million (about 30 million US dollars) for the Chingola tailings leach plant.

President Kaunda disclosed this on Monday night at a dinner he hosted for visiting IFC executive vice-president, Mr Hans Wuttke, at State House.

Dr Kaunda welcomed this investment and said it would boost the economy because this process of extracting copper from tailings was cheaper than digging the mineral underground.

The plant will be the largest of its kind in the world. The tailings (copper waste) will be processed further in order to extract the remaining percentage of the mineral.

"This is very good for our economy because this method of extracting copper is cheaper than digging the mineral underground," the President said.

He described Mr Wuttke's visit as a "good step" since it would afford him the opportunity to examine all potential areas of investment.

Dr Kaunda assured the vice-president, who is accompanied by the director of investments for Africa Region II, Mr Azam Alizai, that Zambia would co-operate with the IFC to ensure the successful implementation of all the projects it would invest in.

"You will always find us ready and willing to cooperate with you," he told the financiers.

The President was glad to note that the IFC, which is an affiliate to the World Bank, supported the Birla group of companies and Tata of India which were assisting Zambia to establish paper and steel industries, respectively.

Zambia was also grateful to the IFC for the role it was playing in the Development Bank of Zambia in which it was a shareholder.

Dr Kaunda said the various IFC investments in Zambia would boost the country's economic development and help the Government to cope with the challenges of the future.

He hoped current negotiations between the two IFC officials and the Bank of Zambia, Zimco and Government ministries would be fruitful.

The IFC has already lent the Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines (NCCM) 30 million US dollars (K26 million) to help finance the cobalt leach plant.

IFC DELEGATION ARRIVES TO CONSIDER INVESTMENTS

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 19 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE INTERNATIONAL Finance Corporation (IFC), a branch of the World Bank, is considering investing in Zambia's ethanol project at Nakambala in Mazabuka.

This was disclosed in Lusaka yesterday when a two-men delegation of the organisation arrived in Lusaka to start discussions with the Bank of Zambia, Zimco and government ministries on various projects.

Bank of Zambia governor Mr Bitwell Kuwani who welcomed the international financiers at the airport, said they would also be discussing further investment into the cobalt leach plant of the Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines (NCCM) which the IFC had already helped to finance.

Mr Kuwani said the visit of the IFC officials was most timely as it was just before Zambia starts serious preparations for the next national budget.

He disclosed that in fact, another wing of the World Bank would be visiting the country in a fortnight, while an International Monetary Fund (IMF) group would follow to assess the usual requirements of the budget.

The Bank governor said this was a timely move by the government because it would be good to have international advice before setting out on another financial year.

Discussions by the various groups would also give them an opportunity to see which areas of development they would be interested in and therefore give the government a proper perspective of what to plan for and how it would be financed.

The delegation that arrived yesterday is led by Mr Hans. Wuttke who is the IFC executive vice-president and is making his first trip to Zambia and Africa.

He is accompanied by Mr Azam Alizai, the director of investments for Africa region II'

The two officials will be on the Copperbelt today to discuss the cobalt plant on the spot. They are also scheduled to hold discussions and be hosted to dinner by President Kaunda.

He explained that apart from the ethanol and cobalt projects, the IFC would also take the opportunity to hear what other projects the government would like it to go into.

The IFC, created the invest in private and privately managed enterprises, has already invested in Zambia Bata Shoe Company Kafue Textiles and Century Package.

UNZA OFFICIALS ATTACK UNIVERSITY'S FEDERAL SYSTEM

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 22 Oct 81 p 5

[Excerpt]

THE federal system of the University of Zambia yesterday came under attack for the second time since Monday by senior university officials.

Giving evidence before the commission of inquiry into the activities of the university at Mulungushi Hall yesterday acting deputy bursar at Unza, Mr Peter Kibaya said the federal system was costly to manage.

Since its introduction operational costs had risen and this was evident in the university's final accounts.

He charged there was "a lot of duplication" of functions under the system and it was not strange to find as many as three people doing the same job.

On Monday, head of the school of education Dr Syamukayumbu Syamujayi criticised the establishment of a federal university system saying Zambia did not need it at the moment.

The system should be discarded as it had caused a lot of administrative problems since its inception.

"The system has even caused problems for the people at the top who are supposed to run it".

What the country needed were three or four independent universities run on academically competitive bases.

Mr Kibaya said there was "absolutely no cohesion" between the administration and the respective schools and in a number of cases it was difficult to know whether a problem should be directed to the campus administration or to the federal administration.

The federal system was a complete "misnormer" which should be done away with.

Costly

Chairman of the commission Mr Wesley Nyirenda indicated that commissioners would approach the financial controller at the university to determine how costly the federal system was compared to the old administrative system.

ARCHBISHOP SCORES INFLUENTIAL CITIZENS WHO MILK ECONOMY

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 19 Oct 81 p 7

[Text]

ARCHBISHOP EMMANUEL Milingo yesterday made a scathing attack on influential Zambian citizens who have milked the economy and amassed millions of Kwacha to the detriment of the nation.

"If there were some legitimate means whereby we could see the personal bank accounts of some of our fellow countrymen, I think we might be surprised to see how many of them are millionaires — that is, they have a million Kwacha in the bank.

"In these days of shortages, it is incredible to know that there are among us people who do not know what it is to be in need of anything — all they desire is there; they have ways and means and money to obtain anything their heart desires."

The Roman Catholic archbishop made the attack in a sermon he delivered at the rededication service at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross in Lusaka to mark the 17th independence anniversary.

President Kaunda and his wife, Betty, Party Secretary-General, Mr Humphrey Mulemba and Secretary of State for Defence and Security, Mr Grey Zulu attended the service.

Members of the Central Committee, cabinet ministers, members of the diplomatic corps and other high-ranking Party and Government officials also attended.

Archbishop Milingo deplored the selfish tendencies of the privileged few, saying: "It is like stealing from the nation and we can see for ourselves where that leads to, deprivation and shortages."

He recalled that not long ago, Zambia was not considered to be one of the poor countries of the world and stressed that this assertion was correct.

"The truth of the matter is that the change has come about because the wealth of Zambia has too often been transferred from being the wealth of the nation to being the personal wealth of individuals.

"The country is no less rich than it was; it is simply that the wealth has shifted from the national to the individual good."

He strongly condemned the elite of Zambia who had continued to amass wealth and enrich their relatives to the detriment of the nation, which needed committed and dedicated workers to prosper.

"Certainly, we cannot go on like this, even if it is hard to find a solution to the problem," said the archbishop.

Speaking in his usual candid manner, he told the congregation that the nation had suffered as a result of the tribal tendencies of top people who were now surrounded by kinsmen and tribesmen.

"We need to be very honest with ourselves: We are entrusted with responsibility for the whole nation and we must strive to achieve the goals the nation expects from our efforts.

"It means we must stop trying to enrich our own relatives overnight, as it were, by giving them salaries which they do not deserve and do not work for."

He said many workers were bitter because they had been superseded by those who had tribal affiliations with their bosses.

Although the University of Zambia had made steady progress towards Zambianisation by employing staff on their academic merits regardless of their provincial background this was not the case in the civil service and parastatals.

"There is not a single tribe in Zambia that can lay claim to being more efficient than any other. When we give in to tribalism, we lose sight of the people's good.

Archbishop Milingo appealed to people holding responsible positions to examine their consciences and determine how fair and just they have treated their juniors.

He reminded top people now abusing their power that, "more often than not, those who watch us and see more than we think are the ordinary citizens: patient, watching, seeing, tolerant citizens, with no titles and often no jobs."

It is these people, he said, who should be enjoying on Zambia's 17th anniversary for without them, there would be no peace and Zambia would not be a nation.

"We cannot on this day forget the patience of the people of Zambia, those ordinary men and women who do not walk in the limelight of public life.

"They showed especially the greatest patience in the not too distant past when time and again, they had to bury their war dead.

"In calmness and sympathy, they bore the consequences of the neighbouring nation's struggle for identity and independence. Our soldiers need no mention, even if we mention them, we cannot thank them sufficiently."

Zambians also deserved praise for looking after thousands of refugees who had sought refuge in the country since 1964.

An anniversary is not only a time for remembering and celebrating, "it is a time for the nation to honour these individuals who have added to its lustre. It is also a time for stocktaking."

However, he added, "It should not be that we Zambians look to our country as to a cow that gives milk and goes on giving milk, where we always expect to draw from it without caring for it and seeing that there is also some input.

FIRST PAPER MILL STARTS OPERATING IN NDOLA

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

ZAMBIA's first paper manufacturing factory has started production in Ndola — and it is expected to save the country between K8 million and K10 million in foreign exchange a year.

The buttons were pressed on Wednesday night at a colourful ceremony full of pomp and excitement as technicians and guests saw the first roll of toilet paper off the production line.

The factory, financed by the Development Bank of Zambia, would produce 50 tonnes of various paper products a day, according to Zambezi Paper Mills factory director Mr Dinesh Sharma.

Full production is expected to start early next year when the second machine is commissioned and would recycle waste paper now thrown away by many companies.

Initially the mill will produce a variety of toilet tissues in different colours and quality.

Mr Sharma said his company will be able to meet a large percentage of Zambia's paper industry needs both in educational and commercial sectors.

"We will soon start producing one side glaze writing paper, printing paper and other types of paper products like packaging and paperboards. But this will be around February when the other machine will be in production," he said.

He said the company hoped to save the country about K10 million in foreign exchange a year when full production is reached.

The mill gets its raw materials from waste paper from Government offices and private industry especially the printing sector.

"We have no problem with raw materials because we have transporters bringing in waste paper from Lusaka, Kitwe and other towns from which we will be making our products," Mr Sharma said.

It was advisable for commercial paper concerns not to throw away their rejects but to save it and pass it on for reprocessing.

The firm, a brainchild of its chairman Mr Devchandra Sharma who joined the paper industry in 1935, will employ a labour force of 100 men and about 15 technicians. The managing director is Mr Chandrakant Sharma, a Ndola businessman.

Director Mr Sharma said the market for his products was not a problem because most, if not all, of Zambia's major printing industry relies on external sources for their raw materials, with the newspaper and printing companies as the largest consumers.

"Apart from producing various grades of paper, the plant will also be making writing pads and exercise books for schools. We already have orders," Mr Sharma added.

Initial commercial production at the plant is expected to start next Monday when all the trial runs will have been completed.

PLANNED DISCONNECTION OF ELECTRICITY

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Oct 81 p 2

[Text]

ZESCO is to embark on mass disconnection of electricity to consumers throughout the country to recover about K13 million it is owed, corporation's administrative manager Mr Essie Mulonda said in Lusaka.

The disconnection campaign was a last resort to recover the arrears.

Zesco found it difficult to operate because some consumers failed to settle their bills. The present arrears are a result of an accumulation of bills for the past four years.

"We need to pay workers, pay operational costs, buy spares and settle our own debts. It is a painstaking situation," Mr Mulonda said.

In Solwezi Zana reports: The council plans massive evictions of rent defaulters from its houses in an attempt to recover K20,000 it is owed.

Evicted

District executive secretary Mr Watson Nyoni said tenants in arrears for three months would be evicted on October 21.

Defaulters have already been served with eviction orders. Some of them have defaulted since last year.

Council policemen and officials from the housing department had been directed to evict defaulters jumping the October 21, deadline. They were given a three-week grace period.

Mr Nyoni appealed to defaulters to pay up to avoid getting into an embarrassing situation.

While the council does not like to evict people from its houses, it was the duty of tenants to ensure that they paid their rents promptly. — Zana.

FARMERS TO EXPAND BEEF PRODUCTION BY TEN PERCENT BY 1985

Lusaka SUNDAY TIMES in English 18 Oct 81 p 7

[Excertps]

COMMERCIAL farmers have predicted to meet 60 per cent of Zambia's urban population's beef requirements by 1985.

This is an increase of about ten per cent of the total animals that the farmers slaughter at present, says the latest issue of Farming Magazine in the official mouthpiece of the Commercial Farmers Bureau.

The cattle population has grown steadily each year since the Government banned the importation of beef nine years ago and the cattle industry was now expanding at a rate of six to seven per cent a year.

The commercial herd totals over 300,000 animals and now supplies more than 50 per cent of beef to the urban population.

In four years, the commercial sector is expected to supply 80,000 beasts for slaughter. This was to be expected because Zambia was a natural cattle breeding country with a savannah climate, natural grasslands and open dambos that, properly managed, spell success for the cattle breeder, says the magazine.

The magazine expressed concern at the high rate of cattle rustling and said the thefts posed a threat to the industry.

Farmers now count the animals every night and change herding practices often to beat off rustlers.

The magazine took a swipe at the police and courts for allegedly letting off suspected rustlers.

"Unless we can show the cattle investor that his future is secure, we are placing our whole food programme in jeopardy," warned the magazine.

SULPHURIC ACID PLANT EQUIPMENT—Equipment and material for a multi-million Kwacha project--the sulphuric acid plant for Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines at Rokana Division in Kitwe--was recently being discharged at the port of Dar es Salaam, Tanzania. A statement released by Leopold Walford Shipping Limited on the exercise said that the transportation of the material and equipment for the installation of the plant has been undertaken in conjunction with Omori Kaisoten Limited of Japan on their combined transport service with Maritime Forwarders, Tanzania. Shipments for the project, whose main contractor is Mitsubishi Heavy Industries started in February and by the final shipment, the gross tonnage carried exceeded 4,500 tonnes with a cubic volume of 11,000 cubic metres. Materials which were transported ranged from heavy lifts to out-of-gauge voluminous cargo. Special arrangements were made by Maritime Forwarders for the road and rail transport of the heavy lifts. The project is on a turnkey basis and is expected to yield immense benefit to the copper mines in their extraction through the sulphuric plant system of production. This major project is one of the many undertaken jointly by Leopold Walford Shipping and Omori Kaisoten into Zambia and other East and Central African territories from Japan. THEFT OF IMPORTED WATCHES--Nearly 300 imported wrist-watches worth about K45,000 have been stolen from Zambia Airways warehouse, reliable sources at the Lusaka International Airport disclosed yesterday. They said the watches, which a Lusaka firm imported from Britain, arrived the previous weekend by a Zambia Airways Boeing 707 freighter. "The watches were off-loaded from the plane by porters and taken into the warehouse. But a few days later, it was disclosed that 296 of the watches were missing so that only four remained in the warehouse," the sources said. According to them, each watch was going to retail at about K150. [Excerpt] [Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 19 Oct 81 p 1]

SIXFOLD OIL PRICE INCREASE--Commerce and Industry Minister of State Mr. Leonard Subulwa has said Zambia's oil import bill now stood at K400 million. The oil import bill had been static at K70 million over the last three years but now it has risen six times to reach the present figure. It was the wish of the Party and its Government to reduce the bill and Mr Subulwa urged Zambians to lessen oil consumption. Zambia's oil import bill, he said, was high and there was need to help the Party and its Government reduce the bill. His ministry supported Indeco in its bid to establish an ethanol plant at Nakambala in Mazabuka district for making fuel from sugar molasses. The establishment of the plant would cut Zambia's oil import bill because it would provide a cheaper form of energy. [Excerpt] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Oct 81 p 1]

KAUNDA ON FOOD RESERVE--President Kaunda has called for the setting up of a six-month national food reserve as a guarantee against any bad weather conditions. He stressed the need for Zambia to stock food reserves for quick mobilisation and sale to needy neighbouring countries. The President said this at a mass rally to mark the World Food Day at the Lusaka Show Grounds yesterday. The country should strive to produce, not only the annual national requirement of maize but maintain a six-month national reserve as a guarantee against bad weather conditions. He noted that food had become a powerful political and economic weapon in the world and warned that a country's independence could be compromised by lack of it and Zambia should avoid this trap. LANDMINES IMPEDING MAIZE COLLECTION--About 3,000 bags of maize cannot be transported from Chidi and Mafuta in chief Simwatachela's area in Kalomo district because of landmines. Kalomo acting district governor Miss Mata Mudenda told Prime Minister Mundia when he visited the town yesterday that in a week's time transportation of maize from rural to main depots on the line of rail would be completed. In a welcoming speech read for her by district youth chairman Mr Saul Siakachoma, Miss Mudenda said the Southern Province Cooperative Marketing Union (SPCMU) had bought 894,000 bags of maize from farmers in the area. About 300,000 of the bags could not be collected from Chidi and Mafuta areas because of landmines planted by former rebel Rhodesian soldiers, she said. Mr Mundia directed the army to clear landmines from Chidi and Mafuta maize depots so that transporters could haul the maize held up there. [Excerpt] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 19 Oct 81 p 1]

MUGABE GETS WARM WELCOME IN WANKIE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] Bulawayo. Cheering schoolchildren and many adults broke the security lines and mobbed Mr Mugabe when he finished his speech at the Wankie stadium yesterday.

The incident, which created headaches for police and security officials, began while people were giving gifts to the Prime Minister.

Police tried to hold back swarms of children who surged forward but Home Affairs Minister, Mr Richard Hove, gentle cautioned the police not to push them back.

Mr Mugabe's tent in which Government ministers and other officials were seated, was filled as more people surged in. He shook hands with a countless number as he slowly worked his way to his car. Hundreds of people formed two lines to cheer him as his motorcade moved slowly out of the stadium.

One woman said: "We wanted to show the Prime Minister that we love him. We wish we could see him more often."

The Wankie rally drew the largest crowd so far in the Prime Minister's meet-the-people tour.

Earlier, Mr Mugabe flew from Victoria Falls to Kamativi mines where he toured the mine complex.

At Wankie he toured the new $389 million power station under construction.

The Prime Minister was shown around by the chief engineer of the Electricity Supply Commission, Mr George Charlton.

Mr. Charlton told the Prime Minister that the new power station at Wankie was expected to be opened on December 1 next year.

The project was well on schedule and was expected to be fully operational by March 1983.-- Ziana.

REPORTAGE ON GOVERNMENT HANDLING OF LABOR UNREST

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Oct 81 pp 1, 6, 8, 11

[Text]

WHILE teachers ended their five-day strike in Salisbury yesterday, more than 80 teachers from schools in the Chihota communal land were sacked for failing to go to work.

Salisbury teachers yesterday gave the Government an ultimatum to resolve their grievances within a week or they would again walk out.

All school teachers on strike in Umtali also returned to work yesterday following an order to do so by the Minister of Education, Dr Dzingai Mutumbuka.

Between 80 and 100 teachers from schools in the Mahusekwa area of the Chihota communal land were dismissed yesterday morning when they failed to turn up for work, the education officer in Marandellas, Mr Jack Jones, confirmed.

DECISION

The action was taken in accordance with instructions from Dr Mutumbuka.

The decision to end the strike in Salisbury was taken by about 100 teachers, who gathered in Cecil Square yesterday afternoon.

The threat of summary dismissal for those who continued the protest seemed to have an effect, for only 100 teachers turned up at yesterday's demonstration as opposed to about 2,000 at the southern police station on Wednesday.

After about an hour of heated debate and argument, the strikers formed an eight-member delegation to negotiate with Dr Mutumbuka on four points.

These were that wage disparities among teachers be narrowed; that the minister talks to the demonstrators directly instead of using the Press; that a national congress be held to disband the Zimbabwe Teachers' Association as it was not representative of teachers; and that all charges and threats against teachers be dropped immediately.

If after a week from yesterday there was no satisfactory resolution of the problems, teachers would "down chalk" again.

However, as the strike ended, some striking teachers, complained that they had not been paid their monthly salaries, due yesterday.

A snap survey of eight Salisbury schools confirmed the reports, but by late yesterday there was no comment from the Ministry of Education.

Dr Mutumbuka, accompanied by his permanent secretary, Dr Nicholas Makura, yesterday visited several schools and reportedly threatened foreign teachers with deportation for allegedly inciting locals.

A Canadian teacher told the Herald that the minister had been "very harsh" when he addressed them.

"He really surprised us because we did not organise anything against the Government," she said. "We only sympathised with our colleagues fighting for better pay and working conditions.

"The minister individually interviewed six of us and we went back to our classes feeling very puzzled."

Before ending their strike yesterday the teachers made it clear they were not against the Government nor were they "being used" by internal or external political forces.

They were merely exercising their democratic right in an independent Zimbabwe, they said, to fight for a better deal, using non-violent means.

One speaker, amid shouts of approval, quoted from ZANU (PF)'s election manifesto, which guarantees 13 fundamental rights, including the right of procession, demonstration and strike action.

He asked whether ZANU (PF), as the governing party, had abandoned these principles.

A Herald team, which toured some of the schools in Highfield and Harare late yesterday, found teachers back at their desks and classes running smoothly.

There was no comment from the Zimbabwe Teachers' Association.

Nurses Get Ultimatum

STRIKING Salisbury municipal nursing staff have until 8 am today to report to work or they will be instantly dismissed.

A statement issued by the council said that certain deaths had occurred because of the strike.

Issuing the statement last night, the city council gave the city medical officer of health, Dr Tony Davies, power to fire those members of his staff who had no good reasons not to report and to hire provisional replacements.

Any member of staff fired for striking and applying for readmission to a council job would be started at the bottom rung of his or her salary scale, if the council agreed to re-engage them.

Sacked staff would also lose their share of the annual bonus but would not lose pension contributions if rehired, the council decided.

Dr Davies told the council that all medical orderlies and most of the state registered nurses had gone on strike. He accused hardliners of intimidating those reluctant to strike.

Senior sisters in charge of clinics had remained at their posts, as had all of the sisters in the family health service and many of the nurses in the Beatrice Road and Wilkins Memorial hospitals.

The council praised these nurses for their stand and all the extra work they had done in very difficult circumstances.

At the end of the meeting the council was told that the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Dr Eddison Zvobgo, had publicly endorsed the council stand, hoped that Bulawayo would do the same and said he did not want any sacked medical assistants hanging around outside his office.

Mazorodze to Announce New Pay Package

THE Minister of Health, Dr Simon Mazorodze, is to announce a pay package-deal for nurses soon.

Zimbabwe Information Service reported yesterday that the minister would today meet the executive committee of the Zimbabwe Nursing Association to discuss their grievances.

A spokesman for the ministry said the situation at strike-bound hospitals was being contained with the help of emergency staff and nurses who were returning to work.

The strike by more than 100 nurses and medical assistants at hospitals and clinics in Umtali and Rusape ended yesterday morning.

In Bulawayo, the strikers at Mpilo and Ingutsheni hospitals were expected to return to work today.

In Fort Victoria yesterday morning police arrested 72 striking nurses and medical assistants. All pleaded guilty to taking part in an illegal procession through the town and provincial magistrate Mr Chris Greenland postponed passing of sentence for five years.

In Salisbury the nurses' dispute enters its fourth day today with the striking nurses determined to prolong the demonstration until Dr Mazorodze addresses them.

Early yesterday nearly 600 nurses from all over Salisbury started arriving at Harare Hospital, where they sat peacefully, expecting the minister to come and address them.

The strikers said they were expecting Dr Mazorodze to speak to them at noon. But by 3.30 pm he had not arrived and they dispersed quietly, but with promises to be at the scene again early today.

The nurses said the dispute could be resolved in a matter of minutes if the minister spoke to them and made definite assurances about their grievances.

About 21 of the striking nurses from Chitungwiza, complained that they had been stopped and efforts had been made to prevent them being at the demonstration.

They alleged that some of them had been beaten in order to stop them from going to Harare Hospital.

In Bulawayo yesterday afternoon leaders of the 200-plus striking nurses, sisters and ward orderlies at Mpilo Hospital urged everyone to be back on duty by 8 am today.

The superintendent of Mpilo, Dr J. C. Diamini, offered to send representatives of the strikers to Salisbury to meet with Ministry of Health officials if everyone returned to work.

A spokesman for the strike leaders said late yesterday: "We must all return to work. We know the strike is illegal and that we will not get any recognition while we remain out of work."

A smaller group of nursing staff at Ingutsheni Hospital also continued their strike into the second day yesterday. The medical superintendent there, Dr W. Tidy, said he offered to meet the strikers at 2 pm today to discuss their grievances if they returned to work this morning.

With the possibility of a full return to work at Mpilo today, it is believed the Ingutsheni staff could also report back for duty and take up Dr Tidy's offer.

Both hospitals continued as normal yesterday, aided by large numbers of Red Cross, St John Ambulance, and Zimbabwe National Army medical personnel.

Doctors at Mpilo were again full of praise for the hard working volunteers and army medics who turned up in force to replace the striking staff.

RED CROSS

Dozens of younger Red Cross workers kept the hospital kitchens ticking over while more senior personnel from all groups gave invaluable help in the wards.

At both hospitals everyone pulled together to keep the wards running.

At Mpilo, medical superintendent Dr Diamini put on an overall and wheeled lunch trolleys around the hospital. At Ingutsheni regular staff became ambulance drivers and medical superintendent Dr Tidy and his chief nursing officer cooked meals and cleaned kitchens.

Fort Victoria police responded to calls for help from the hospital authorities and 18 policemen and women went there to assist with cooking, cleaning and minor medical duties.

Strikers entered their second day at Gwelo and Que Que hospitals and nurses and medical assistants at the Shabani, Belingwe and Selukwe hospitals went on strike for the first time yesterday.

The numbers were: Shabani 36, Belingwe 6, Selukwe 15, Mandava clinic (Shabani) 3.

Police helped out at several of these strike-affected hospitals.

● Umtali's Sakubva Infectious Diseases Hospital closed yesterday morning because of the inability of the staff there to man it, the Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation reported.

The ZBC said all patients had been moved to the Umtali General Hospital, apart from "a few" psychiatric patients who were being looked after by a nurse and a Red Cross volunteer. — Herald Reporter, Own Correspondent, Ziana.

Re-educate Strikers, Says ZBC

THE Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation last night called for striking teachers and nurses to be put in a re-education centre for "re-orientation".

The call came in a hard-hitting editorial comment at the end of the 7.45 television news broadcast, which said the strikers' action was "almost tantamount to a deliberate move to subvert the political authority, to condemn the unfortunate sick Zimbabweans to death and to betray the educational prospects of the innocent schoolchildren of this country".

The editorial condemned the "unpatriotic spirit" of the strikers and said:

"If they create that chaotic situation to the benefit of the enemies of this country let it be made clear that they will also suffer heavily.

"These people should not only be dismissed, but they should be put in a re-education centre for re-orientation," the editorial said.

Civil Servants' Right to Strike 'Must Be Curbed'

A public Service Commissioner, Mr Nathan Mawande, said yesterday that it was improper for civil servants to have the same freedom as employees in the private sector to go on strike.

He said at an informal meeting for Public Service Commissioners organised by the Zimbabwe Promotion Council that civil servants must accept restrictions because certain vital services should not be interrupted by strike action.

"They should be given their full rights with certain limitations."

Mr Mawande, a deputy secretary in the Public Service Commission, said a Public Service Employees Bill would soon be introduced in Parliament which he hoped would enshrine this principle.

His views were echoed by the commission's secretary, Mr Clive Newman, who said: "We don't believe that civil servants should strike. What we want to do is to introduce a new form of collective bargaining."

Mr Newman said the Presidential directive to advance Africans in the Public Service had been carried out smoothly despite initial suspicions and reservations.

"At the start there were serious misgivings in the minds of civil servants but these have now been allayed. There is a marked measure of co-operation between the old civil servants and those appointed under the Presidential directive."

He said civil servants in Zimbabwe had always abided by the code that they should loyally serve the government of the day.

Mr Newman said, however, that the public sector was losing manpower to private industry mainly for financial reasons. He added that it had been regulated that a civil servant could not resign to join a parastatal organisation without specific permission.

The commission's deputy secretary responsible for training, Dr Elliot Zwangobani, said training programmes were being held for both new and old staff.

"The new intakes are introduced to the system and procedure in Government while the old staff is oriented to the new direction that the Government is taking.

"Recently we have completed a training needs' analysis exercise covering middle and senior levels of the service. We hope that this will result in training programmes aimed at specific target groups and problem areas."

Dr Zwangobani said training activities were being carried out at provincial and district levels aimed primarily at public servants implementing Government programmes.

The Tortuous Tale of Teachers' Salary Scales

A BLACK teacher with O levels who started training in 1975 and had the good sense to fail his final examination in 1977 may now earn considerably more than his colleague who had the misfortune to pass.

This is just one of the anomalies in Government pay scales for teachers that members of the profession want rectified.

The basic problem in teachers' pay centres on the qualifications held and the difference between standard and non-standard qualifications.

The difference is historical and is based on the educational discrimination faced by blacks and the separate training facilities provided for different races. All qualifications obtained from former white colleges are regarded as standard.

So all graduates are on the same scales with starting salaries ranging from $440 a month for a person with a degree to $548 to an honours graduate with a teaching certificate.

All graduates with teaching certificates will eventually earn a little over $1 000 a month, graduates without certificates taking a year longer to reach this level.

Graduates without the teaching certificate have a slightly lower maximum, but it is possible to study for a certificate part-time.

There are three other pay scales for teachers with standard qualifications.

All three have a maximum of $910 a month but starting salaries differ depending on whether the qualification is the result of a five-, four- or three-year course.

The important scale, the B scale, is the one applying to most teachers in this group. It is the scale for a teacher with three years training, the standard period at Zimbabwe's colleges.

CRUNCH

To be on the scale the teacher had to have at least five O levels, including English Language, before going for training. The course, and this is the crunch, had to be designed for people with O levels.

Since 1976 all teachers' courses offered in the country have been of this type and the starting salary on the B scale is $440 a month, the same as for a pass graduate with the graduate able to go further.

The maximum salary paid to non-standard qualified teachers, $414 a month, is considerably less than the starting salary paid to any standard qualified teacher.

It is possible for a non-standard teacher, with O levels, to climb on to the standard salary scale but that takes at least eight years and the teacher has to pass an inspection.

And they have to start at the base of the B scale, eight steps behind their contemporaries who went to the "right" college.

Many of these teachers with non-standard qualifications do have O-levels, sometimes obtained after leaving college but often before.

Many of those with O levels before going to college also did a three-year course; the catch is the course was in theory designed for people with Junior Certificate, or just two years in secondary school.

So the course was non-standard. It is here that the man or woman who failed in 1977 and rewrote in 1978 benefits. For in 1977 he was writing the last examinations for the non-standard certificate and in 1978 he rewrote a standard examination.

His friends who passed are non-standard qualified despite probably having had O levels when they went to college and doing a three-year course.

COLLEGES

Not all colleges had this non-standard course. TTC in Bulawayo, for non-blacks, and Gwelo, for blacks, both offered standard courses, and had done so for some years.

Gwelo started these standard courses in 1963, to provide teachers for the black secondary school system and at that time, thanks to a decision made in 1961, all teachers with "white" qualifications, which Gwelo's were, received the same salary.

In 1971 discrimination was introduced with lower salaries for all black teachers except headmasters, deputy headmasters and education officers. In 1975 deputy headmasters also started getting less than their white counterparts.

It was not until 1978 that the decision was reversed and equal pay was given for equal qualifications and experience.

But that did not help teachers with non-standard qualifications although the authorities claimed that there was a single pay scale.

HISTORY

The history of teacher training for blacks is long and tortuous. The first teachers had just Standard 7. They started teacher training in Standard 5 and kept going for the next three years.

These teachers, holding the elementary teaching certificate, have now all retired.

The next level was the PTL, primary teaching lower. This was a two-year course for blacks with Standard 6 and was still being given up to the late 1960s so there are many teachers with this qualification.

Then, from around 1949, it was possible to study for the PTH, primary teacher higher. This was a course designed for people with JC and at first lasted two years.

But from the very beginning people with O levels entered for this course although, at first, they were a minority. These people, with PTH, have always been and are still regarded as holding a non-standard qualification.

They are bitter for when they trained it was impossible to obtain a standard qualification even if they had O level.

Later the JC style courses were extended to three years and again many O-level graduates took them, there being almost no alternative.

The white side of teacher education shows other anomalies. Until 1958 the white college took students with JC and trained them first for two years. From 1959 O level dard, and then for three years. From 1959 O-level was required.

EARNING MORE

So it is quite likely there are senior white members of the teachers' profession earning more than $900 a month with qualifications no different from the PTH.

In fact when the PTH started at St Augustine's at Penhalonga it was deliberately designed on the same lines as the course taken by whites.

The only difference was the white qualification was standard while the black one was not.

Whites with those qualifications who left the profession and now want to re-enter do, however, have to go on the lower scale of pay.

EXPERIENCE

At the beginning of last year salaries for the lowest paid teachers were increased with the base pay for a PTL, the lowest recognised qualification, being $146 a month. But account was taken of experience and so long as the teachers have continuous service of at least six years they get at least $231 a month.

A JC with two years starts on $180 a month and with three years training, $215.50 a month.

O level amnd two years' training has a base pay of $248 a month and with three years, $282. As already mentioned the top salary for all these grades is $414 a month.

The teachers' union, the Zimbabwe Teachers' Association (ZITA,) has been pushing for all teachers holding O level to be put on the B scale, whether their O level certificate was obtained before or after training.

Provision would also be made for experience under the scheme although not all years would be counted for most teachers.

GOVERNMENT TO OUTLINE NEW WAGE STRUCTURE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] The Government will next month publish a blueprint outlining new wage structures and conditions of work, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, announced yesterday.

Addressing a rally attended by more than 10 000 people at the Wankie stadium, Mr Mugabe said the new wage structures would be presented to the Government next week by a Cabinet committee that was appointed to study the recommendations of the Riddell Commission.

Mr Mugabe said the Government was eager to produce a wage structure that would take into account the cost-of-living conditions.

Appealing for patience from workers, Mr Mugabe said the Government could not be intimidated by strikes. "We have been tested in the war. Don't think we can be stampeded into making hasty decisions by strikers," he said.

The Prime Minister told companies that practised racial discrimination in housing and job promotion and arbitrarily fired their employees that the Government would nationalise them.

"The Government has the power to nationalise such companies. We don't want to do it but if a company does not obey the will of the people and serves foreign interests we will nationalise it," he said.

He singled out a company called Gullivers in Wankie saying it had earned a reputation of maltreating its employees.

He said it was the right of all the workers to earn a living. "The Government's role is to look after the interests of the workers and the peasants.

"I am warning those companies this is Zimbabwe. Lo Zimbabwe-Rhodesia ena hambile. Any company that maltreats workers risks Government intervention," he said.

At an earlier rally in Kamativi, the Prime Minister said the Government woud investigate allegations of discrimination in housing and job promotion.

Mr Mugabe briefly switched from Shona to English as he directed his remarks to Mr N. Cambitzis, the chairman of the Kamativi Group, who was at the rally.

"We have heard reports to the effect that there is discrimination in housing and jobs. I want to say Government policy is against discrimination of any kind," Mr Mugabe said.

At Wankie the Prime Minister announced that the Government would start a three-year programme aimed at creating industry in the rural areas. He said this was intended to help the rural people who had suffered during the war as well as stem the tide of migration into the urban areas.

Reiterating his call for unity at party level, Mr Mugabe urged ZAPU and ZANU (PF) supporters to invite each other for social occasions like dinners.

"Comrade Joshua Nkomo and I often meet for meals at my home without quarrelling.

"We are united at Government level. We want you to be united at the grassroots level," the Prime Minister said. He added that he would have toured Matabeleland with Mr Nkomo but the Minister without Portfolio had other business to attend to and thus was unable to come.

VISITING YUGOSLAV MINISTER STRESSES ROLE OF MEDIA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

VICTORIA FALLS.

THE mass media are the strongest weapon of the Government and the party for mobilising the masses and maintaining independence and the non-alignment of the country, the Yugoslav Minister of Information, Mr Ismail Bajra, said here yesterday.

Interviewed at Victoria Falls, where he spent the day sightseeing with the Deputy Minister of Information and Tourism, Mrs Victoria Chitepo, the Yugoslav minister said the aim of the media should be to reach into every home.

Mr Bajra was due to sign an agreement with the Government last night covering the training of media personnel through exchange programmes between the two countries.

"We evaluate that for an independent non-aligned country, it is important that it has its own trained personnel in this field. It is here that Yugoslavia can assist both now and in the future," Mr Bajra said.

The priority area for development should be radio and television.

Mr Bajra visited the ZBC on Wednesday and will visit the Zimbabwe Mass Media Trust newspapers today.

He said there was room for development particularly in educational programmes and advantage should be taken of social activities so that the country could enlarge on its own national programmes.

The media in Zimbabwe had made a good beginning, although there were still certain infrastructure problems to be solved to enable the media to reach an even larger audience.

The role of the national news agency, Ziana, should be to collect and disseminate national news for national use, because this would then be independent information.

"That is why it is important for radio and television to use the news of the national agency as much as possible," said the Yugoslav minister.

The national agency should also select international news because "not all information is in favour of the non-aligned countries and developing countries", he said.

Members of the Yugoslav news agency, Tanjug helped in the establishment of Ziana in June this year.—Ziana.

SUCCESS OF RESETTLEMENT PROJECT THREATENED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Oct 81 p 10

[Editorial: "Slap in the Face"]

[Text] RESETTLEMENT of displaced people is one of the Government's main aims, and it can already chalk up many successes.

Nearly 245 000 people have been resettled; 2 million hectares have been offered for resettlement: and something like $50 million has been set aside for this extensive operation.

But given the finance, the land, the building materials, the fertiliser and the seed, there remains the major task of placing the people to their advantage and that of the overall scheme.

Government officials must know something about each person before the correct moves can be made. There are bound to be chancers among the applicants.

It is in the interests of all concerned to help the officials. But there are many who are being obstructive. Their attitude must be most strongly deplored.

In various areas of Matabeleland there has been a distressingly negative response to a request to fill in and return resettlement forms. Overall, the response has been an almost incredible 2,7 percent.

This has all the marks of a deliberate campaign to frustrate the Government's good intentions. But that could be taking it too far.

It could be genuine ignorance or dislike of officialdom in some cases; or are there political influences behind it?

Whatever the reason for the boycott, it is an unwarranted slap in the face for those who are trying to help. Those who are being anti cannot hope in the long run to gain by their actions, or lack of them.

DETAILS ON TRAINING OF CLERICAL STAFF GIVEN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Oct 81 p 7

[Text] Bulawayo. An "army" of clerical staff is being trained in Salisbury and Bulawayo to be sent to the country districts.

The Ministry of Local Government and Housing predicted a critical shortage of administrative and clerical staff in the districts by the end of this year, and so launched two vital training programmes.

Under one of those programmes, Speciss College is training 220 women former combatants, all under 25, for district secretarial work. The Bulawayo branch of the college is training 80 and Salisbury 140. Last week the under-secretary for the ministry, Mr July Moyo, visited the college in Bulawayo to check their progress.

Mr Moyo, who is responsible for the training of all staff for the Ministry of Local Government and Housing, said in an interview:

"There are only about 30 district commissioners left in the country, and many of those will also be leaving. To replace them, we have ourselves been training 60 district administrators.

"Any remaining district commissioners will become assistant secretaries (development) for their respective areas.

"But as all the old commissioners left, so we lost almost all our clerical staff and that is why we decided to have 220 women trained to work as secretaries in the districts.

"We are planning to send four to each district. When they are eventually sent out, they will go to their home districts, which should benefit everyone," said Mr Moyo.

Lonrho has sponsored the students by paying their Speciss College fees. The women's training course, which includes bookkeeping, typing and other office duties, ends in December.

The first batch of newly trained district administrators, totalling 26, will be ready for the districts at the end of this month, said Mr Moyo.

Last week, Dr Eddison Zvobgo, Minister of Local Government and Housing, spoke to the 140 women ex-combatants under training at Speciss College in Magaba, Salisbury.

Dr Zvobgo told them that many Third World countries had major problems because their young people lacked dedication.

"Your work is very important," he said, "because the district councils need dedicated staff."

He emphasised the need for good communication between the districts and the Government.

"You are the soldiers we are sending out to the district council areas and if you work hard development will succeed," he added.

After getting some practical experience in the districts, the women will return for further training in council procedures and learn how local government runs, the minister said.

ZAMBEZI NOMADS ADD TO BURDEN OF RESETTLEMENT PLAN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 20 Oct 81 p 6

[Editorial: "The Dema Dilemma"]

[Text] The discovery of nomads in the Zambezi Valley will probably stretch things further for the nation's enormous resettlement programme.

The Government's decision to shoulder this additional task by taking freedom to the caves of the Dema people deserves both moral and material support from all Zimbabweans and humanitarian organisations.

To have ignored these unfortunate people's hand-to-mouth existence would have been no less a crime than previous governments committed in this regard.

The rehabilitation of the Dema will call for a seasoned approach. It will require tact, tolerance and perseverence. A special inter-ministerial committee of the "Dema Dilemma" will probably do the trick.

It will be no use putting up schools and clinics and hope that these people won't again flee from civilisation. Nor will continued handouts, no matter how bulky, completely eliminate the psychological fear and mistrust which they harbour.

Social intercourse with "outsiders" will strengthen the tenuous confidence the Dema have in the Government's efforts to give them a better future. Agricultural people, medics and others will have to move out and live among these people.

They must teach themselves to be self-supporting in the long run.

TAXATION PACT--A British delegation has arrived for the first round of talks on a double taxation agreement with the Zimbabwean Government. The four-man team, from the Department of Inland Revenue, arrived at the weekend. It is led by Mr Derek Taylor-Thompson. A spokesman for the British High Commission said yesterday the delegation was meeting tax officials here, "with a view to negotiating and drawing up a new taxation agreement". A previous double taxation agreement between the two countries was invalidated at the time of UDI. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Oct 81 p 1]

FURNITURE RULE UNCHANGED--Bulawayo. The restrictions on the exportation of furniture by people leaving Zimbabwe still remain unchanged, the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, said in Bulawayo last night. The minister was reacting to rumours that his ministry had relaxed the restrictions. A Treasury spokesman said last week that certain concessions would be made for people over 60 who retired due to ill-health or were transferred outside the country by their employers. "Apart from being unauthorised the statement was also untrue. We have not relaxed the restrictions at all. People spreading such rumours are just fools spreading false information around," Senator Nkala said. He also dispelled rumours that during his overseas visits pressure to change the furniture restrictions had been brought upon him from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank as well as some British Government officials. "That is all untrue as well. No one ever worried me about the furniture restrictions when I had meetings with IMF and World Bank officials. This is an internal matter and no one will tell me what to do. I have a duty to protect the economy of the country regardless of what other people might be feeling." RESETTLEMENT DETAILS--Bulawayo. Chairman of Wankie District Council, Mr A. M. Chiyasa, said yesterday that people in the area wanted to know where they would be resettled by the Government before they filled in resettlement forms. They were concerned that there were no vacant farms in the district and that most of the land outside the communal area was occupied by either national parks or mines. Mr Chiyasa met the Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Dr Sidney Sekeramayi, on Wednesday and explained the people's concern. The minister promised to study the situation, Mr Chiyasa said. There was no question of people in the area being worried that they would lose some of their stock if they were resettled, as was earlier reported, he said. WAGE-COL LINK—Minimum wages must be linked to increases in the cost of living, the secretary-general of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, Mr Albert Mugabe, said yesterday. Mr Mugabe made the call for increased minimum wages in an interview yesterday. Residents of the former townships, he said, would suffer increased hardship because of the new rent increases imposed by the Aalisbury City Council. On top of the recent increase in bus fares, this would make life very hard for people earning the minimum wage. "The cost of living is increasing all the time, but wages are static, the people are suffering more and more," he said. The city council could not be blamed for increasing its charges--it too suffered from increased costs. What was needed, Mr Mugabe said, was a sizeable increase in the minimum wage. "Obviously the city council can't just keep on subsidising houses, but the people can't be expected to make ends meet when prices rise and wages don't. We need a new minimum wage." CLOSER TIES WITH MALAGASY—Zimbabwe and Malagasy yesterday established diplomatic relations at ambassadorial level. Announcing this yesterday a spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs said the two governments were inspired by a common desire to expand and promote firm ties of friendship and co-operation between their peoples. The two governments also wanted to develop mutually beneficial co-operation between themselves. The diplomatic relations would be based on the principles of the Organisation of African Unity, a commitment to the total liberation of Africa, non-alignment and respect for sovereign equality between states and for people's rights to self-determination, the spokesman said. FINAL COMMUNIQUE OF ACAP GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Brazzaville ETUMBA in French No 611, 26 Sep 81 pp 1, 3, 8

/Excerpts/ The first general assembly of the Congolese Association for Friendship Among Peoples /ACAP/, which began 23 September, concluded Friday at 1800 hours at the Hotel de Ville.

So, for your information, we publish here the final communique ratifying the end of the assembly's work.

Convened by the board of directors, the first general assembly of ACAP took place 23-25 September 1981 in Brazzaville in the conference hall of the Hotel de Ville.

The opening and closing ceremonies took place under the patronage of Comrade Pierre Nze, member of the political bureau, head of the department of external relations, minister of foreign affairs.

The assembly's work was organized around the slogan, "Let us mobilize in support of the PCT /Congolese Labor Party/ and its president, Comrade Denis Sassou-Nguesso, in adopting and implementing the 1982-1986 5-year plan, while working for national concord and universal peace." The work was carried out in a peaceful atmosphere marked by friendly and fraternal feelings, under the chairmanship of Comrade Madzou Charles, accompanied by Comrades Raymond Serge Mviri, head of the mass organizations division of the Department of Organizations; Emmanuel Elenga, outgoing ACAP president; Medard Gampe Bouandzobo, representing the political commissariat, and Balla Vital. The mayor of Brazzaville was unable to attend.

This great congregation of Congolese pacifists--which was also honored by the participation of delegates from several associations from friendly countries, among others the USSR, Algeria, Vietnam, the GDR, China, Zaire and nongovernmental international organizations such as AAPSO /Afro-Asian Peoples' Solidarity Organization/, and the World Trade Union Federation--worked its way through the following agenda:

1--Verification of credentials;

2--Adoption of rules of procedures for the general assembly;

3--Election of the presidium and the assembly secretariat;

4--Political talk on the subject, "ACAP's place in the Congolese revolution," given by Comrade Bokamba-Yangouma;

8--Investiture of officials.

After frank and open debate, the participants in the first general assembly of ACAP amended and adopted the documents submitted for their approval, including:

3--Motion of support for struggling peoples;

4--Motion protesting against the manufacture of the neutron bomb;

5--Motion in favor of a new global economic order;

6--Resolution on construction of a headquarters building for the association;

7--Resolution on establishment of the National Marien Ngouabi Order;

8--Resolution on creation of an African Party committee.

In accordance with the by-laws, the general assembly elected the association's presidium, composed of 61 members, who themselves chose an 11-member board of directors whose members are:

President: Balla Vital;
Vice President for External Affairs: Mondjo Henri;
Vice President for Organizations: Mahoungou Germain;

SEVEN BRAZILIAN FIRMS SHOW INTEREST IN TRADE

Brazzaville ETUMBA in French No 611, 26 Sep 81 p 8

/Article: "A Promising Bilateral Cooperation"/

/Excerpts/ Several weeks ago (11 September, to be precise) a delegation of technicians from the Brazilian company, "Constructura Andrade Gutierez," returned to Rio de Janeiro after visiting for close to 2 weeks in our country. Specializing in public works (roads, dams, railroads, drilling, oil), this company did some preliminary work on upcoming road construction in our country.

However, beyond this dimension of cooperation in the infrastructure field, a number of other Brazilian enterprises have come forward, like "Constructura Andrade Gutierez," with the desire to export to the Peoples Republic of Congo. These companies, described below, are listed and profiled in Brazilian Commercial Bulletin (No 11 of 11 September 1981):

"Casa Bernadolta:" based in Santos in the state of Sao Paulo, it specializes in construction of flexible containers manufactured out of polyester canvas which are used for the transport of cement, sand and other loose-packed materials (capacity 1.5 cubic meters).

It also builds metallic storehouses (5 meters in height); pest-killers with a dodecanoic base; aluminum phosphides for the protection of stored grain.

"OIVIND Lorentzen S.A.:" based in Rio de Janeiro in the state of Rio de Janeiro, it manufactures articles of cutlery (that is, knives and other cutting utensils).

"CHEMFERTZ--Representacoes Comercials S.A.:" it sells spare parts for Volkswagen vehicles and engines. Its offices are in Sao Paulo, the capital of the state of Sao Paulo.

"From Brasil Export & Import:" supplies bicycles, leather footwear, handbags, surgical gauze and industrial paper products (offices, Rio de Janeiro).

"ALUMINIO Royal S.A.:" it manufactures, as its name indicates, aluminum products for domestic use, hotels and hospitals. Headquarters: Porto Alegre, state of Rio Grade do Sul.

"Industrial de Maquinas Agricolas Pinhal S.A.:" is interested in helping us with our highest priority, agriculture, by providing agricultural machinery. (Its offices are in Espirito Santo--Holy Spirit--a city in the state of Sao Paulo).

"Industria de Conservas Mello LTDA:" the Pelotas branch (in the state of Rio Grande do Sul) concerns itself specifically with all manner of food products.

In all, seven specialized enterprises are offering to collaborate with us in our development effort. This will constitute an important contribution to that effort when we reach the upcoming implementation phase of the 1982-1986 5-year plan.

Yesterday morning at the ministry of cooperation the FAO and the Congolese Government signed a financing agreement covering a study of food self-sufficiency in the Congo. The Congolese side was represented by the secretary of cooperation, Comrade Ntsikabaka Loupey. The FAO is contributing $45,000 for the project to study food self-sufficiency in the context of Congolese rural development. The study will focus principally on: evaluation of programs and projects presently under way from the point of view of self-sufficiency (both projects proposed for the 1982-1986 planning period and modifications of them; and calculation of the volume of domestic and foreign investment needed to carry out those projects. The new agreement is the current phase of the one that was signed 19 August in Brazzaville. ESTABLISHMENT OF COTTAGE INDUSTRIES ADVOCATED

[Article by Malek Eshun]

[Text]

THE neglect of small-scale industry in the country's post-independent industrialisation process, like the neglect of the small peasant farmer, has contributed largely to the current socio-economic problems facing the country.

While the benefits of large scale industry cannot be ruled out, it is believed that a large proportion of our problems stem from our over-dependence on large scale industry whose heavy, imported capital and raw material requirements have depleted our foreign resources and overburdened our import bills over the years.

Small scale and cottage industry offers the greatest possibility for rural development by its employment content. By the provision of such infrastructural facilities as electricity, water, education and health there is a reduction on the subsidy necessary for rural development and also reduces the drift of rural labour to the urban centres.

There is an increase in training opportunities and skills which prepare rural folks for an ordered life in a technology era. Finally it increases local self-reliance in rural communities by providing co-operative and mutual assistance between farmers, carpenters, fishermen, weavers, tailors and motor mechanics.

It is interesting to note however that whilst Third World countries like India, Brazil and North Korea have resorted to small scale and cottage industries as the basis for national development, African countries including Ghana are yet to apply this old but improved industrial strategy in their national development plans. They have only become interested in the setting up of large scale import substitution industries even though they have got no foreign exchange to support such industries.

For a meaningful small scale industrial development, there is the need for the setting up of a small scale "Industrial Development Board" which should be able, with the assistance of the government, to promote and develop small scale industries in all the regions of the country. This Board should be able to identify viable economic areas suitable for cottage industries and monitor the functions of the institutional arrangements created purposely for the development of this sector of the economy.

There should be Industrial Estates set up in the regions to help localise activities of small scale entrepreneurs for easy approach by government agencies, better harmonisation of human and raw material resources, easy collection of taxes, and the dissemination of government information.

To ensure easy flow of raw materials to the Industrial Estates, the Ghanaian Enterprises Development Commission could be charged with guaranteeing regular supply of inputs to the Estates. Also the Commission in conjunction with other financial institutions could be made to offer effective financial and technical assistance to the Estates.

Lastly products from the Industrial Estates should be guaranteed adequate and ready markets. Since the small scale entrepreneur does not have enough resources to engage the services of experts to undertake sales promotion, market survey and the actual marketing of his products, there should be a body set up to do this on his behalf.

MERGERS, WITHDRAWALS AMONG PARTIES MAY HURT NATION

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 26 Sep 81 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text]

ON the eve of the congress of the minority parties to elect the leadership of their merger, a new political party has sprung from their ranks.

Introduced in Accra by Dr Kwame Safo-Adu, Minister of Agriculture in the Second Republic and former leading member of the Popular Front Party (PFP) the new party is known as the New Ghana Party (NGP).

Heralding this split within the PFP, the biggest of the minority parties, was the withdrawal from the merger negotiations of Colonel Frank Bernasko's Action Congress Party (ACP).

Demoralising as these developments are the remaining minority parties are determined to proceed with their polls today to elect their leaders. But, barely a week ago, we, of the 'Graphic', reminded the minority parties of their duty to save this country from sliding into a one party system in the manner proscribed by the Constitution.

We also cautioned them not to blame the People's National Party (PNP) if, through their dynamism and organisational acumen, sovereign people in their supreme wisdom, thrust on the country a one-party system by voting for the PNP in all the 140 constituencies in future elections.

The merger idea was quickly and authoritatively sold to Ghanaians as the surest way of sustaining the kind of democracy that thrives on the existence of more than one party in the society. We therefore can't pretend to be too happy about the developments which tend to have depleted the merger ranks.

We are however not in a position to apportion responsibility for the "causus belli" that has led to the merger camp presenting three different parties instead of one merged party.

We are therefore compelled for the moment to contend with wishing each of the parties — Action Congress Party, All Peoples Party and New Ghana Party all the best in their aspirations.

Our only prayer is that each of them may grow to be strong enough to offer a viable alternative to the People's National Party as a national government.

We have said it already, and we are glad to say again that when the minority parties fail in their lame and unco-ordinated attempts to win power they should not turn round to accuse the PNP of having introduced a one party system in the country.

LOW INTEREST PAID TO SOCIAL SECURITY CONTRIBUTIONS QUESTIONED

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 5 Oct 81 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text]

THERE have been so many complaints by contributors to the Social Security Fund since its inception in 1965 and, in certain cases, something or other has been done about some of these complaints.

But one of these complaints that has been denied any remedy up till now but which probably ramains a very crucial matter is the interest that is paid on workers' contributions.

It is obvious that the total contribution of both employers and employees is huge enough and provides a very reliable and significant source of funding to government. Thus, in the current financial year, it is expected that these funds will lend about ₵500 million to government for financing the budget deficit. This is almost as close as all the commercial banks, together, will provide for the same purpose.

It is worthy to note that since its inception the Fund has continously provided funds for government by investing in government stocks, bonds and treasury bills at the going rates. Yet the contributors have been paid a static three per cent per annum rate of interest and this is very cheating indeed.

The difference between three per cent and the 16½ per cent that the Trust earns from investing workers' funds in governmemnt bills is a lot of profit. What happens to this profit is another matter for discussion.

But this paper shares the concern of the workers of the SSNIT that in view of the current rate of interest of 18½ per cent on government bills the retention of a three per cent interest to contributors to the said Security Fund is homicidal and must be revised immediately. And the lead must come from the government since the fund was set up by an official instrument.

If workers are compelled by law to save, it is perfectly justified that they should get the returns that are prescribed by law — i.e., the going rates of interest being paid by the commercial banks. As a matter of fact, since contributors cannot draw from their contributions, at will, it is just fair then that these funds attract the rate that is paid on 12-month demand deposits, 19 per cent, and not as on savings deposits, 18 per cent.

The workers of this country, like the cocoa farmers, have for too long now, been providing forced funds for certain institutions to enjoy and this is most unfair to them.

We think government should, as a matter of national concern have a second look at this development. And the TUC must not think that the security of its members lies on only in regular increases in wages and salaries. We call on the TUC to take this matter up, too.

BRIEFS

BAUXITE PROJECT TAKES OFF--At long last, work on the exploration and processing into alumina, of the enormous Kibi bauxite deposits has begun. Phase one involves open bauxite mining, the design and construdtion of a plant to extract about 800,000 tonnes per annum of alumina from the ore, and the designing and construction of such vital infrastructural facilities as housing, hospitals and schools. An international consortium engaged by the Government for the first phase, comprises Messrs Brown and Root Incorporated of the U.S., Bankers Trust International of U.K., Granges International Mining, A.B., of Sweden and Swiss Aluminium Limited of Switzerland. Speaking at the ceremony, President Hilla Limann noted that despite the country's critical financial situation, his administration had already committed over ¢12 million (about 4.75 million U.S. dollars) to the first phase of the project. In order to accelerate the pace of work, the Government had accepted a recommendation for the formation of the Kibi Bauxite Development Company. He said final discussions and arrangements for the formation of the company had reached an advanced stage and its shares would be floated, possibly by the end of next month. Mr Kwasi Baning, deputy director of the Geological Survey Department in charge of the Ashanti Region, has been appointed project co-ordinator to expedite preliminary preparation for the company. EEC RURAL LOANS--The European Economic Community (EEC) has granted a loan of ¢8.4 million in foreign exchange through the Bank of Ghana, to 11 rural banks which were established first in the country. The loan, in the form of machinery, equipment and farming inputs is to assist farmers to increase their out-put. A spokesman for the Bank of Ghana who disclosed this at the third annual shareholders meeting of the Atwime Rural Bank at Foase in the Ashanti Region, said the equipment, machinery and farming inputs would arrive in the country by the end of next month. These include corn mills, chain saws, felling axes, vehicles and crocodile matchets. The spokesman appealed to shareholders of the rural banks especially farmers, to use the facilities offered by the EEC judiciously by expanding their farms and ensuring maximum food production both for local consumption and export. MINISTER REPORTS ON CROP INSPECTION TOUR

/Article by Aliou Barry: "Rainfall Is Satisfactory"/

/Text/ Rural Development Minister Serigne Lamine Diop Friday afternoon completed his tour of the crops in the "peanut bowl" with a stop at Kaolack. Over a 3-day period, the minister, accompanied by several technicians from his department, including the general manager of SODEVA /Farm Development and Popularization Company/, Mr Toure, covered more than 1,000 km in the Louga, Thies and Sine-Saloum regions. The rural development minister reported the conclusions he has drawn from his marathon tour to the leadership of Kaolack. Everywhere he went, Serigne Lamine Diop found satisfactory rainfall and crops as a whole doing well. Despite some infestation, the crops are not in danger, because of the energetic work of the parasite prevention units. By the end of the tour, a number of facts were evident: first of all, in the majority of cases, the instructions on when to sow the rapid-growing ground-nut variety known as 55.437 were not followed. As soon as the first rains came (24 June) the peasants sowed as much as 50 percent of the 55.437. That obviously poses problems, because this variety reaches maturity in only 90 days.

It requires special harvesting and drying techniques. If it reaches maturity but is not uprooted, it begins to sprout again. The harvested nuts must also be aerated to avoid regermination. A full-scale educational campaign is needed to convince the peasants to harvest the plants as soon as they are mature. But as /agricultural/ organizational agents explained, even if such an educational campaign made it possible for this variety to enjoy a good harvest, the anticipated effects of a good agricultural season could not be realized at the level of the overall national economy without timely organization of the marketing process. In fact, since the harvesting of this variety (the first planting) takes place in the first third of October (in some areas within 10 days), if steps are not taken, a goodly part of the crop will be sold or hawked on the parallel market, causing substantial loss to the national economy. Right here and now we have already seen that our markets are overflowing with barely ripened nuts. Obviously, it cannot be a good season unless the rains continue into October. That is the first pre-condition. The second is to put market financing mechanisms quickly into place, especially in the border areas. Delay could hurt everyone. This is true not only for ground-nuts, but also for millet, corn and beans.

Priority for Cereals

Another conclusion resulted from the tour. For the first time in several years, the surface area devoted to cereals is now clearly greater than the area devoted to ground-nuts. For example, in Sine-Saloum 429,000 hectares have been planted in ground-nuts, compared to 470,000 hectares in cereals. In Thies, 129,000 hectares are in ground-nuts compared to 160,000 in cereals. In the latter region, the area devoted to ground-nuts has declined 14 percent in one year. The Louga region seems to be staying about the same, although there is a slight decline in the area cultivated in ground-nuts. This decline may be explained by the lack of seed. But, according to the technical experts, the increase in millet cultivation is the result of two factors: the combined effects of the drought have forced the peasants to reflect on the need to turn to food crops. Secondly, the announcement on cereal marketing made by the rural development minister during his last tour inspired the peasants to grow cereal crops. Throughout his tour, the minister congratulated the peasants on their clear thinking. The peasants, for their part, pressed for effective marketing of both ground-nuts and cereals. The rural development minister acknowledged that the best way to promote cereals was to organize their marketing. In his view, promoting cereal production is in perfect accord with our policy of food self-sufficiency. He added that the government would take all steps necessary to insure that the country will have sizable reserve stores, thanks to the food assistance commission's plans for cereal purchases.

Parasitism and Drought

Still, it must be conceded that this year's good rainfall is not distributed equally throughout the country. The Louga region, for example, which last year had the best agricultural results in the country, has fallen behind this year. While one part of the region comprising the sub-prefecture of Darou-Mousty, southern Ndande, Dahra and Barkedji may have had rain since 24 June, the rest of the region got no moisture until 24 July, or a whole month later. In addition, the first planting suffered from a 30-day drought in several pockets. While ground-nuts are doing well in general, cereals have been particularly hard hit. Growth is somewhat slow and varies from one area to another.

In the same region the drought has increased the incidence of parasites, and all the departments have been affected. The distribution of rainfall in the Thies region is better than in Louga, even if it has been noted that a few pockets have experienced interruptions of the rain during the second half of August. Also, cereals there have suffered from insufficient fertilizing, which is going to lower the yield. In Sine Saloum, except for a few pockets, all the crops are doing well. In that region, the minister was particularly interested in the corn project which has had great success. With the help of German assistance, the region is now the site of a major corn project covering the departments of Foundiougne, Kaffrine and Nioro. As a part of this project, Foundiougne was chosen as the site for intensified cultivation. This year 157 hectares of the crop have been sown. The project puts all the production inputs (fertilizer, high-powered seed, etc...) at the disposal of the peasants. The other departments are also cultivating corn, and the peasants are free to call on SODEVA for supplies. In all, 757 hectares this year are devoted to this cereal, which presents several attractive features. First of all, it facilitates diversification; it can be consumed in several different ways, and beyond that it even enriches the soil. In addition, the development of aviculture in Senegal depends a great deal on this cereal, the bran from which is the most choice feed for poultry. In other words, there is a lot of profit in corn. Growers took advantage of the opportunity to urge the minister to make substantial funds available for the purchase of the ripened corn. The peasants of Sine-Saloum were candid in their comments about SODEVA's efficiency. In their typically blunt way, they deplored last year's delays in marketing the groundnuts: financing, they declared to the minister, was doled out sparingly. If there were a repetition of those delays this year, it is a good bet that more than one-third of the harvest will go either into neighboring countries or onto the parallel market.

P. W. BOTHA LAUDS ARMAMENTS INDUSTRY

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 16 Oct 81 p 7

[Text]

WELLINGTON. — The spin-offs and benefits South Africa derived from its arms industry were much bigger than originally anticipated, the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, said yesterday.

Opening a new explosives factory at Krantzkop in the Wellington district, Mr Botha said one of the most important benefits to South Africa had been that R3 800-million in Defence spending had stayed in the country.

"The armaments industry also provided a tremendous stimulus for technological development in South Africa.

"Due to armaments contracts, the electronics industry, for example, developed at a much faster rate than ever would have been the case if progress was dependent on commercial markets alone."

This was also true for many other technologies contained in the wide spectrum for armaments.

Study

"It is a fact that South Africans now have the opportunity to study and develop in certain fields of technology that did not exist a few years ago and would not have been created, if it was not for the armaments industry."

Important

Armscor, because it had to maintain its lead in weapon research and development, would for many years remain in the forefront of technology and provide opportunities to young South Africans which no other industry could possibly provide.

"One of the most obvious and important benefits is the fact that over the past five years R3 800-million allocated in the Defence budget for armaments was spent inside the country.

"Due to the Armscor policy that the maximum use should be made of private industry, by far the biggest part of this significant sum flowed smoothly through to the private sector.

"If South Africa had not established its own armaments industry and was still dependent on overseas supplies of armaments, a very large portion of this amount would have been spent overseas.

"Perhaps the biggest achievement that took place during this phase was the development of human material."

Armscor employed more than 28 000 people, of which a very large part had been gathered in less than a decade, and had to be trained in all the hundreds of skills, trades, sciences and technologies required by the industry. — Sapa.

P. W. BOTHA COMMENTS ON SWA TALKS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 20 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

THE Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, yesterday wound up a series of meetings in South West Africa that were, he said, both "candid" and "successful".

Negotiations on SWA independence were now entering a phase of preliminary consultations to lay down guidelines for the territory's future constitution and system of government, Mr Botha said in Windhoek last night before returning to Cape Town.

"We are now entering a phase of discussions on preliminary talks as to the guidelines on which this country should be governed and political structures should be built," he said.

He was speaking shortly after winding up a series of meetings with party political leaders in SWA to convey South Africa's views on aspects of independence negotiations for the territory.

The Prime Minister was accompanied yesterday afternoon by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr Pik Botha, and the Administrator-General of SWA, Mr Danie Hough.

The Minister of Defence, General Magnus Malan, who attended earlier conferences, left earlier for Cape Town.

Mr Botha described yesterday's deliberations as "candid" and "successful".

"We informed the internal parties on our point of view and they put questions to us," he said.

"Some of them made their points of view clear to us."

All parties concerned now knew what South Africa and they themselves "have in mind with each other."

Asked about earlier reports of a three-stage plan envisaged by the Western contact group to bring SWA to independence, Mr Botha declined to elaborate.

"I do not want to go into detail because I think it would be wrong on our part to use the knowledge we have to discuss future deliberations in public," he said.

South Africa had informed responsible party leaders of the situation to date and he hoped the Press and the public would help to make the talks go off "as smoothly as possible", and not to do anything to create misconceptions.

The secretary-general of the Namibian Independence Party, Mrs Othille Abrahams, told newsmen after discussions with the South African Cabinet officials that the first phase of the Western initiative would be nearing completion at the end of the month.

GOVERNMENT PROVISIONALLY ACCEPTS EDUCATION PROPOSALS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 9 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Jaap Theron: "A New Educational Set-Up Likely"]

[Text]

ELEVEN far-reaching principles likely to lead to the establishment of a totally new and improved educational structure for all races were yesterday provisionally accepted by the Government in what it called an interim White Paper.

These principls form the basis of a large number of recommendations made to the Government by the Human Sciences Research Council (HSRC), after its extensive inquiry over 13 months into a system for the provision of education for all population groups in the Republic.

System

The core of the recommendations centres around an envisaged system of education in which a parallel development of formal and non-formal education should be striven after. This would ensure a meaningful and much larger turnout of well qualified pupils of all races, as opposed to the present so-called "closed system". In this, pupils cannot change their study field or course within a particular educational institution and often drop out, to the loss of the country's labour force, the HSRC report said.

The recommended new structure comprises a compulsory but free nine-year education course in three phases: pre-basic education (currently pre-primary) which will be free but compulsory for children of all races for a period of six years, followed by a further three years of free compulsory education either at school or elsewhere (thus formally or non-formally, e.g. in the work situation), and by post-basic education, which includes junior and secondary as well as higher education (currently secondary and tertiary education).

Management

But the recommendations also include a new central management system that will function on three levels, including a "single ministry" at the top to formulate education policy for all races (a matter which has already provoked conservative educationalists and politicians into condemning this recommendation), second level education authorities responsible for all education in defined areas, and thirdly of a local level where school, parents and teachers will have autonomy.

With a view to eliminate education backlogs, the HSRC recommended in it's main report, which is a combination of altogether 18 working committee reports, that the Central Government must contribute financially in order that equality can be reached regarding the provision of comparable education opportunities in South Africa "irrespective of race, colour, creed or sex".

The Government, however, emphatically states in it's interim White Paper that it's provisional acceptance of the 11 main principles involved, is subject to the principles of the Christian character and the broad national character of education, as formulated in the National Education Policy Act of 1967.

It is also subject to the principle of mother tongue education and to Government policy that "each population group should have it's own schools and especially it's own education authority departement."

Parents

It specifically noted that it found acceptable the principle of freedom of choice for the individual and for parents in educational matters and in the choice of a career, "but within the framework of the policy that each population group is to have it's own schools".

The Government also says that "all decisions taken in terms of the recommendations in the HSRC report will have to take due account of, and fit in with, the constitutional framework within which they are to be implemented."

The eleven principles concerned are:

- equal opportunities for education, including equal standards in education, for every inhabitant, irrespective of race, colour, creed or sect, shall be the purposefull endeavour of the State;
- education shall afford positive recognition of what is common as well as what is diverse in the religious and cultural way of life and the languages of the inhabitants;
- education shall give positive recognition to the freedom of choice of the individual, parents and organisations in society;
- the provision of education shall be directed in an educationally repsonsible manner to meet the needs of the individual, as well as those of society and economic development, and shall, inter alia, take into consideration the manpower needs of the country;
- education shall endeavour to achieve a positive relationship between the formal, non-formal and informal aspects of education in the school, society and family.

Shared

- The provision of formal education shall be a responsibility of the State, provided that the individual, parents and organised society shall have a shared responsibility, choice and voice in this matter;
- the private sector and the State shall have a shared responsibility for the provision of non-formal education;
- provision shall be made for the establishment and State subsidation of private education within the system of providing education;
- in the provision of education, the processes of centralisation and decentralisation shall be reconciled organisationally and functionally;
- the professional status of the teacher and lecturer shall be recognised;
- effective provision of education shall be based on continuing research.

The Government said it would not take any final decisions on these recommendations until all interested parties had had the opportunity to comment. All official and recognised education bodies now have time until March 31, 1982, to submit their comments, whereafter the Government will table a final White Paper in Parliament on South Africa's future education structure.

THE HSRC's investigation into a new education system was led by Prof J P de Lange, Rector of the Rand Afrikaans University.

Supportive

In addition to the main recommendations, a large number of recommendations were made with regard to supportive education services (curriculum services, educational technological services, guidance services, health and social services, evaluative and diagnostic services for impaired and handicapped pupils, co-operative services), the recruitment and training of teachers, physical facilities and innovational strategies.

It also recommended that an interim council for education be established, so that the restructuring of the system of educational provision can be carried out with the greatest degree of consultation.

The Government said in its interim White Paper that the council will consist of the Minister of National Education, as convenor, (in control of White pupils), the Minister of Internal Affairs (in control of Coloured and Asian education), and the Minister of Education and Training, (in control of all Black education).

The Government requested the HSRC in 1980 to conduct an in-depth investigation into all facets of education in South Africa.

Experts

Subsequently, more than a hundred experts were called upon by the HSRC to assist with its investigation.

In its acceptance of the report, by way of an interim White Paper that was tabled in Parliament yesterday, the Government expressed the hope that this inquiry will make a real contribution towards the improved provision of education in the Republic, at all levels of education, in order to ensure that the potential of its inhabitants is realised, the economic growth of the country is promoted, its manpower needs met, and that education of equal quality is achieved for all population groups.

The Government emphasised that the eleven principles, provisionally accepted by it yesterday, are to be understood in context with one another and that no one principle is to be interpreted in its own isolation.

COUNTRY PROVIDES GOODS TO REST OF AFRICA

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 11 Oct 81 p 6

[Text]

FORTY-six of the 49 members of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) now buy supplies from South Africa and about a third of the Republic's food exports this year will go to black Africa, informed sources said last week.

Most of the customer countries are, in public at least, vociferous critics of South Africa, and protagonists of a trade embargo against the Republic.

The reality in private is different, something that is shown by the fact that for the second year running the value of South Africa's food exports is expected to top R1 000-million.

Exports to these countries have reached R400,5-million for the first five months of this year, the sources disclosed.

The centre of the largely one-way export trade to what are some of the most bitter critics of South Africa's internal politics — is Jan Smuts Airport from where large consignments of fresh produce and groceries are airlifted.

The chief executive of the South African Foreign Trade Organisation, Mr Wim Holtes, said that while food was exported to Africa, he considered the export of raw materials to these countrie to be more important.

Important

"Steel, plastics, pharmaceuticals and spare parts to keep their economies going are in some respects more important than food," he said.

Mr Gert Kachelhoffer, general manager of Indo Atlantic Air Cargo, one of the largest air cargo forwarding agents in South Africa, said his company was sending regular consignments of food, both perishable and tinned, to countries such as Zaire, the Central African Republic, Gabon, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Malawi and the Ivory Coast.

"We airfreight a full range of food products ranging from dog biscuits to toilet paper to Zaire and the Central African Republic.

"Virtually everything that is on sale at many of their supermarkets comes from South Africa.

"Although the airfreight on foodstuffs to countries in Africa ranges from 90c to R1,20 a kilogram, so pushing up the price of the product substantially, there is never a shortage of customers.

"If we could get export permits from the meat board to export red meat, we would be filling 747s with carcasses of meat alone."

Openly

According to Mr Kachelhoffer, a number of foreign embassies in black African countries are among those buying from South Africa. "The British and American embassies do it openly while the Eastern bloc probably does it through so-called 'grocery club' orders that we get," he said.

Last week there were reports that the Soviet embassy in Salisbury has been buying supplies from South Africa through a local buying agent in the Zimbabwean capital.

Mr Kachelhoffer said a sure sign of new orders from countries like the Central African Republic and Zaire was the arrival of foreign aid money.

"It is usually only a matter of days after the arrival of the latest batch of American dollars before we get a new batch of orders," he said.

"As their foreign aid dries up, so we notice a decrease in the order pattern."

Although his company had supplied Arab countries and planned to do so again in the near future, Mr Kachelhoffer was reluctant to disclose any information on these deals.

"The majority of Arab countries are perfectly happy to trade with South Africa as long as nobody says anything about it," he said.

"They would immediately cease all trading links if it became known that they have trade links with South Africa."

Virtually every scrap of food, as well as most of the drink that was consumed during the Commonwealth Conference in Lusaka two years ago came from South Africa and was flown to the Zambian capital from Jan Smuts. The red carpet used to welcome Queen Elizabeth also came from South Africa.

Requirement

"We don't like talking about these things because we want to continue doing business with these people," Mr Kachelhoffer said.

The Indian Ocean islands of the Seychelles, Mauritius and Reunion were becoming increasingly important to South African exporters and regular consignments of food were being sent to them.

A host of airlines, including TAP, Sabena, Swissair, Pan American and the South African charter carrier, Safair, regularly ply the route from the SAA cargo terminal at Jan Smuts to destinations such as Bangui, Kinshasa, Brazzaville and Abidjan.

The only hard and fast requirement from which few South African agents are prepared to deviate is a confirmed letter of credit from their African clients.

"Very little leaves this airport without it," Mr Kachelhoffer said.

GOLD MINES' PERFORMANCE RATED EXCELLENT

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 22 Oct 81 p 19

[Text]

THE eleven gold producers in the General Mining Union Corporation (Gencor) stable did a remarkable job in the quarter ended September 1981 to maintain their after-tax profits, despite the substantial decline in the gold price.

Profits after taxation and the State's share of profits only dropped by 0,9 percent from R104,4-million to R103,4-million despite the fact that capex during the quarter was 10,3 percent lower at R22,0-million (R24,5-million).

Result

The good performance of the mines in the group was basically the result of three factors: an increase in tonnage milled, a better average grade and the fact that the unit costs were pretty well controlled.

Tonnage milled during the quarter rose by 8,2 percent from 3 937 000 tons to 4 259 000 tons.

With the exception of a few mines, the grades during the quarter were also better.

This, with the higher tonnage milled, helped the mines to increase their gold production which, in turn, off-set the lower price received during the quarter.

At Buffelsfontein, the biggest mine in the group, tonnage milled was slightly down to 840 000 (850 000) tons, but the grade improved from 8,4 g/t to 8,6 g/t.

Improved

The higher grade helped the mine to improve on its gold production, but this was not enough to off-set the lower price received of $55 an ounce, with the result that the profit after taxation and the State's share of profits dropped to R26,4-million (R30,1-million).

There was a substantial drop in capex (R9,1-million against R13,2-million). This led to higher taxation, but slightly improved the amount available for distribution after capex.

Stilfontein tonnage milled rose by 23 000 tons to 485 000 tons and the grade also improved slightly from 7,7 g/t to 7,8 g/t.

This enabled it to lift its gold production to 3 794 (3 558) kg.

Costs were only slightly higher, which enabled the mine to increase its working profit from gold to R,24,1-million (22-million).

Capex during the quarter was slightly higher at R3-million (R1,5-million), with the result that the provision for taxation was more or less unchanged.

The net profit after taxation was also little unchanged at R,11,2-million (R11,6-million).

Unchanged

Grootvlei's tonnage milled and grade were unchanged.

Gold production was also unchanged, but higher costs and the lower gold price eroded the working profit from gold to R9,9-million (R10,5-million).

Capex for the quarter was virtually the same as it was during the previous quarter, with the result that the provision for taxation was at a higher rate.

Profit after taxation dropped from R5-million to R4,8-million.

Kinross was one of the other mines in the group that improved on tonnage milled and also lifted the grade.

This led to a higher gold production of 2 521 (2 378) kg.

Cape

Income before taxation was also higher at R20,1-million (R18,7-million) and as a result of higher capex of R,2,4-million R1,2-million) the mine scored to some extent on tax.

The result was that after-tax profits increased from R,8,1-million to R,10,1-million.

Winkelhaak had a very steady quarter. Tonnage milled was slightly up, but the grade was unchanged. The result was that gold production was virtually unchanged.

Capex for the quarter at R2,1-million (R1,0-million) helped a little to save tax, with the result that the mine's after-tax profit was nearly the same at R13,9-million.

Bracken was one of the few mines in the group that showed a slight drop in the grade.

Tonnage milled increased, however, to 15 000 tons, which enabled the mine to increase its gold production slightly.

This was, however, not enough to off-set the lower gold price and there was a slight decrease in the working income from gold.

The mine scored quite a lot on tax with the result that after-tax profits increased from R2,4-million to R3-million.

Leslie dropped its tonnage milled slightly, but the increase in the grade was enough to enable it to produce 1 039 (1 008) kg of gold.

The lower tonnage also had an adverse influence on unit costs, but the mine still managed to show a pretax profit of R5-million (4,7-million).

Taxation was virtually unchanged and the after-tax profit amounted to R3,1-million (R2,9-million).

Marievale's results were very similar to those of Leslie.

There was a drop in the tonnage milled, but an improvement in the grade.

The improvement in the grade was, however, not enough to prevent a decline in gold production. The profit after taxation amounted to R500 000 (R537 000).

St Helena was one of the mines in the group that was able to improve its after-tax profits in the September quarter.

This was mainly the result of a higher tonnage milled, better grade and consequently higher gold production.

Net profit after taxation increased to R15,7-million (R16,2-million), while there was also a substantial drop in capex from R4,4-million to R2,6-million.

Unisel also had a good quarter. Tonnage milled was higher at 270 000 (255 000) nd the grade increased to 6,9 (6,7) g/t.

Capex was much the same as in the previous quarter and the net profit after taxation and the state share increased from R13,5-million to R14,6-million.

West Rand Consolidated Mines profit after taxation for the quarter dropped to R51 000 (R938 000) despite the fact that it received more State aid.

This is mainly due to a drop of about R1-million in uranium income, because the loss from gold was virtually the same as in the previous quarter.

DISTRICT SIX AREAS MAY BE DECLARED COLORED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 24 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

CAPE TOWN. — The Group Areas Board is to examine parts of District Six with the view to declaring these areas Coloured.

This was made clear in a Press statement yesterday by the Minister of Community Development, Mr Pen Kotze.

But, while the creation of an Indian residential area in the Johannesburg city centre is to be considered, Pageview will be excluded.

The statement said the Government accepted the recommendation of the President's Council that a technical committee be formed under the chairmanship of a judge to investigate the Group Areas Act with the view of looking into recommendations and amendments.

The names of the members of the committee would be announced soon.

"The Government accepts the recommendation of the President's Council that the largest possible area of Zonnebloem (District Six) adjoining the already existing declared Coloured areas, be investigated by the Group Areas Board with the view to including it in such areas.

Advance

"In view of the advanced stage of the area the whole of Zonnebloem cannot be advertised for reproclamation.

"The placing of the technicon outside the area can, for various factors, also not be considered.

"The Government also accepts the recommendation of the President's Council that steps be taken for consideration of the creation of an area for residence for Indians in the central city area of Johannesburg."

The area being considered included Fordsburg, Burghersdorp and a section of Newtown, west of the north-south freeway.

"Thousands of Indians are already in this area, where there are sufficient businesses, schools, cultural and religious facilities for Indians.

"After thorough consideration it was considered that Pageview, because of planning considerations and in the best interests of all parties, not be included in the aforementioned area.

"The White communities of Mayfair and Vrededorp will therefore not be affected." — Sapa.

UK CITIZEN DETAINED FOR POSSESSION OF PRESS ITEMS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 22 Oct 81 p 13

[Article by Tim Clarke: "'Detention' at Airport Not Verified"]

[Text]

DURBAN. — The Officer Commanding Railway Police, Natal System, Brigadier J Robbertze, said yesterday he was unable to verify a complaint made by a British doctor, Dr Nigel Clay, who said he had been detained at Durban's Louis Botha Airport by an official who found a scrapbook with Press cuttings in his luggage.

Brig Robbertze said he had questioned all the members of his Railway Police staff at the airport and the airport manager had also questioned his staff but nobody knew anything about the complaint. All his men stationed at the airport were in uniform, although his detective staff, dressed in civilian clothes, sometimes visited the airport.

Brig Robbertze said that he had gone into the incident fully but could find nobody who knew anything about it.

According to a Press report Dr Clay said he had been questioned in an airport office by a man who wanted to know why he was taking the Press cuttings out of South Africa. Dr Clay also alleged in the Press report that at one stage the man told him that he would not be allowed to leave the country.

Dr Clay, who has lived for a year in Durban, claimed in the Press report that he was about to fly to Johannesburg where he was catching a connecting flight to England when he was approached by the man.

He had been taken to an office and questioned about his scrapbook.

The Press cuttings covered general news events over the past 12 months, including reports on forced removals under the Group Areas Act.

According to the Press report Dr Clay was eventually allowed to catch the connecting flight to Johannesburg but the scrapbook was taken away from him. According to the report Dr Clay lives in Birmingham, England.

ZULULAND CAMPUS QUIET AFTER 'RAMPAGE'

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 24 Oct 81 p 8

[Article by Tim Clarke]

[Text]

DURBAN. — All was quiet yesterday on the campus of the University of Zululand near Empangeni after about 400 students went on the rampage on Thursday night.

The Divisional Criminal Investigation Officer for Northern Natal, Brigadier C Mogge, said yesterday that police were called to the campus shortly after 8 pm on Thursday and stayed there until 4 am yesterday.

He said a number of cars had been stoned and during the unrest a nightwatchman had his legs broken. At this stage the police were still not certain what was the cause for the unrest.

Accordingly to the rector of the university, Professor A C Nkabinde, the trouble started apparently among about 40 to 50 law students who maintained that the examination results should be marked up.

He said the trouble then spread to other sections of the university and several cars had been stoned. A few windows in the main administration block were also smashed.

He has just returned to the university after a visit to Cape Town and was only aware of the trouble shortly after he arrived back.

He said the nightwatchman had apparently been injured when attempting to stop students from throwing stones.

It has been quiet on the campus this year after a fairly violent period in the middle of last year. So far the students have refused to elect a students' representative council because they claimed intimidation by Inkatha supporters during the graduation ceremony last year. Inkatha is a Zulu politico-cultural organisation.

COMMISSIONS VOICE DOUBTS ON EDUCATION PROPOSALS

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 11 Oct 81 p 39

[Text]

WHILE it is true the Government has indicated that the White Paper is an interim response to the report of the HSRC's committee of investigation into education, it is nevertheless an inadequate and disappointing response.

It has failed to take into account the very situations in education that caused the investigation to be brought into being in mid-1980.

As members of the committee responsible for the report, we believe it offers effective and practical solutions to our problems, and also sets positive directions for the future.

We are pleased that the Government has decided to publish the full report, which will, we hope, enrich educational debate in the country.

Concerned

We also welcome the fact that the Government has accepted responsibility in principle for bringing about equality of provision and standards in education for all the people of South Africa.

And has, in addition, accepted the 11 principles for the provision of education put forward by the HSRC committee.

However, we are concerned that it has then subjected these principles to a number of provisos of a restrictive and apparently non-negotiable nature.

Among these provisos are those that re-iterate existing government policy, as far as Christian national education and separate schools and separate education departments are concerned.

While some recognition is given to freedom of parental choice, this is subject to the above constraints, certainly in the case of state schools.

Perhaps most disturbing of all is the Government's failure to respond positively to the HSRC's basic and unanimous priority recommendation that an interim SA Council for Education, broadly representative, be appointed to advise government in its consideration and implementation of the recommendations of the report.

Instead of this, a working party with a strong official flavour has been appointed to advise the Ministers concerned.

Some of the members of this group are responsible to the Ministers they are to advise, while others are inextricably bound up in the present system of education provision.

A positive response to far-reaching reform and innovation, so urgently needed if peace and progress are to be achieved in education in South Africa, is unlikely to emerge from a body of this composition.

It fails to involve all those interests (for example, the private sector, community leaders and teacher associations) whose involvement is imperative if any new dispensation is to have the broad acceptance which is so necessary to its success and legitimacy in the eyes of those groups, particularly those whose education had failed to meet their needs and aspirations.

The proposed working party will prove to be an ineffective substitute for the carefully considered machinery recommended in the report.

The general tone of the Government's response is anything but encouraging, inclines to the past rather than to the future, makes not even a passing reference to such fundamental issues as non-formal education, technical education, curriculum reform or teacher education, and is in grave danger of destroying many positive attitudes built up during the course of the work of the HSRC group.

The hopes that were raised by the Government's terms of reference, and by the objective and sensitive manner in which the HSRC committee went about its task, are in grave danger of being dashed.

The criticism and protest that basically has been suspended to allow the report to be prepared is likely to return in full force as various community groups realise that there is little intention to bring about real reform.

The White Paper is an unfortunate and ineffectual document: it fails completely to capture the spirit of the HSRC report which, whether accepted or not, will remain a landmark in the development of education in South Africa.

Slap

The Government's response is a slap in the face for a group of South Africans of all colours and persuasions who, in good faith, and in some cases at the cost of their own credibility, gave intensively of their professional expertise, judgement and goodwill for over a year because they believed it was important to seek joint solutions to the educational malaise of their country.

More important, the White Paper shows a tragic lack of understanding of the real issues to which the Government needs to address itself.

Even at this late stage, we, as a group, would appeal most earnestly to Government to reconsider its response to the report, to react positively and quickly to what are listed as priority recommendations.

And not to postpone action any longer by further collection of comment which in any case is available in the supporting records of the HSRC investigation.

If we are not to experience a complete rejection of the existing education systems by the majority of the people of South Africa, then bold and urgent steps are necessary in order to convince them that the Government has not used the HSRC investigation as a "holding action", but as an honest and sincere intention to bring about the reforms recommended in the report.

If the report is not implemented now, it will certainly have to be implemented in the years ahead, but in the meantime we shall have lost the goodwill and support of the majority of our people and made the recommended reforms even more difficult to achieve than they are now.

In the process, the progress of South Africa and its people will have suffered an almost irreparable setback.

A lack of appreciation, at this point in our history, of the critical importance of education for the good of South Africa, may well prove to be disastrous.

Personal

We wish finally to state that we were members of the HSRC committee in our personal capacities, and it is in those capacities that we support this statement.

SIGNED:

Dr Ken Hartshorne, of the University of the Witwatersrand and chairman of the HSRC's sub-committee on Education Management.

Mr Franklin Sonn, president of the Union of Teachers' Associations of South Africa and chairman of the HSRC's sub-committee on Education Facilities.

Prof A N Boyce, Rector of the Johannesburg College of Education and a member of the HSRC's Head Committee.

Mr Alan Pittendrigh, Director of the Natal Technikon and chairman of the HSRC's sub-committee on Education Technology.

Mr Michael O'Dowd, a director of the Anglo American Corporation and chairman of the HSRC's sub-committee on Legal Affairs.

Mr L M Taunyane, President of the Transvaal Union of African Teachers and a member of the HSRC's head committee.

Miss Claudia Regnant, a teacher at Westerford High School and chairman of the HSRC's sub-committee on Guidance.

Dr Jack Niven, Professor of Education at Natal University and a member of the HSRC secretariat.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM PROPOSALS ARE ANALYZED

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 11 Oct 81 p 39

[Article by Ivor Wilkins: "Staring Future Shock in the Face"]

[Text]

From Verwoerd to De Lange is a long journey in educational philosophy.

But, judging from the first government responses to the massive education report released this week, a long road still lies ahead before official policy catches up with scientific thinking.

The Human Science Research Council investigation, headed by Prof Pieter de Lange, rector of the Rand Afrikaans University, lays down a detailed route map to show the way from Verwoerdian concepts of education to a new dispensation in which all South Africans will enjoy education of equal quality, untrammelled by the purely racial considerations that have applied since South African society began.

The Government's initial response, however, puts the racial emphasis back in the forefront.

Whereas the report was content to provide equal education, the Government has been quick to put back the separation into its familiar and universal "separate-but-equal" formula.

In 1954, Dr Verwoerd, architect of apartheid, outlined his belief that education for blacks should gear them for their appointed and distinctly inferior place in white society.

"There is no place for (the Bantu) in the European community above the level of certain forms of labour," he stressed.

And education for blacks was accordingly structured, leading to the situation today where the HSRC report devastatingly confirms the enormous inferiority of black education in virtually every aspect.

Dr Verwoerd's approach depended on his belief that separate, racially determined economies could be created in South Africa.

That cornerstone of Verwoerdian apartheid has finally been abandoned and the Government now faces the reality that the South African economy is indivisible.

Hard facts have also brought an acceptance that, far from being held to the level of hewers of wood and drawers of water, skilled blacks will be increasingly required to maintain the economy.

Hence the Cabinet's instruction a year ago to the HSRC to find an education system that would "make available education of the same quality for all population groups".

The result is a revolutionary report that recommends a total restructuring of the system in South Africa.

In the search for equality, the HSRC specifically does not base its recommendations on an assumption that all people are the same.

It accepts there is a great diversity in South Africa.

But the vital statement in the report that brings it into conflict with the Government is that differentiation can only be justly applied on educationally relevant grounds.

In the present dispensation, it finds, "differentiation also rests purely on the basis of race or colour, which cannot be regarded as relevant for inequality of treatment.

"Examples of this are the treatment of different racial groups in a way that is strikingly unequal, for example, in the distribution of education in terms of per capita expenditure, proportion of qualified teachers, quality and quantity of facilities such as buildings, equipment and sports facilities.

"A further example is where admission to educational institutions is regulated mainly on a racial basis. The result is that an individual, owing to his being a member of a particular racial group, does not or cannot receive his rightful share in the provision of education."

To overcome some of these inequalities, the report recommends that:

- the Group Areas Act be disregarded as far as education facilities are concerned;
- in sharing common interests and strengthening co-operative activities, the wishes of parents, teachers and communities should be considered and the "greatest possible weight given to the principle and practice of 'free association' rather than to predetermined 'cultural identities' established from above";

- subsidised private schools should have a large measure of freedom of choice and association within the bounds of broad national education policy;
- higher education institutions, for example universities and technikons, should be autonomous and have the right to admit students of their choice;
- there should be one minister and one department to control the policy and finance matters of education.

All of which, directly or implicitly, adds up to a clear demand for a massive relaxation or removal of the racial elements of South African education.

But, while the Government has accepted all the principles for the provision of education laid down in the preamble of the HSRC report, it calls a halt far short of its race implications.

Briefing journalists on the Government's attitude, the Minister of National Education, Dr Gerrit Viljoen, said the education dispensation could not contradict the constitutional dispensation — now or in the future.

On the question of a single ministry, he said the Government had not accepted or rejected the principle.

The Government's view was that the education structure should have four pillars, one for each race, but no final decision had been taken on the design of the roof — the umbrella over the segregated structure.

"Education departments of their own are ... essential to do justice to the right of self-determination which is recognised by Government policy for each population group," the interim response says.

It also quickly shuts the door opened by the "free association" recommendations in the HSRC report.

It accepts the principle of freedom of choice for the individual and for parents in education matters and in the choice of a career, "but within the framework of the policy that each population group is to have its own schools".

In other words, whites will be free to associate with whites and blacks with blacks — but so far and no further.

The final white paper will be drawn up next year after the Government has considered the HSRC report in full and the reactions of interested parties, but already the spirit and letter of the Government's reaction has caused widespread disappointment.

But, beneath the sound and the fury of the debate which will rage over the political implications of the HSRC report, is a solid core of recommendations — 90 percent, according to Prof de Lange and Dr Viljoen — that lays the foundations for a major restructuring of education in South Africa.

Its central philosophy is that education must provide all South Africans with equal opportunities, that the needs and potential of the individual must be balanced against the needs of the economy and that the users of education should have a say in how their learning is framed and applied.

Achieving this will require a radical overhaul of existing practices, structures, financing procedures, physical designing of institutions and a complete change of educational emphasis.

For example, the report has found that South African schooling places 80 percent of its emphasis on producing university candidates and only 20 percent on preparing pupils for practical vocations.

The requirements of the economy demand a direct reversal of that emphasis.

To attain this, the report recommends a far greater emphasis on non-formal education — learning in a work situation.

Basically it separates education into formal and non-formal sectors. All pupils will undergo a six-year compulsory formal schooling at the expense of the State.

This would be followed by a further three years compulsory and free education.

But at this point (the beginning of the seventh year) the aptitudes and needs of the children — tested by a high level of sophisticated in-school guidance — will determine whether they continue with formal schooling, or transfer to non-formal education, where they would receive in-work training in vocationally oriented courses.

This would complete nine years of compulsory education.

Hereafter, pupils in the non-formal sector would advance in their specific careers, with a strong emphasis on continued training, either in-service or at higher education institutions or both.

Those following the formal education route could complete a further three years at school, taking them up to the equivalent of the present matric, and thereafter on to higher education levels.

Crucial to the plan is a high degree of flexibility and mobility to enable pupils to swap from formal to non-formal education and vice versa if they choose.

Also identified by the report as of vital importance is a sophisticated support system incorporating a highly developed programme of curriculum planning and the use of modern technology like computers and electronic equipment, requiring the enlistment of the Post Office and the SABC.

Within these broad outlines, the HSRC report, backed by 18 research volumes, presents a mass of findings and recommendations adding up to a comprehensive picture of the current education situation, its myriad shortcomings particularly in regard to racial disparities, and ways to overcome them.

It traces the steady migration of people mainly to the Transvaal; it looks at population projections which show a decline in whites and Indians, and a massive growth of coloureds and particularly blacks.

Something of the proportions of this phenomenon is portrayed in the need for teacher training.

To achieve a uniform pupil-teacher ratio of 30:1 for all races by 2020 will require the training of 24 981 white teachers, 22 708 coloured teachers, 6 964 Asians and a staggering 245 405 blacks.

The existing teachers themselves need to be taught and, again, it is in black education, where the bulk of the pupils are, that the problem is most acute.

On a scale where a matric pass plus a teaching certificate constitutes a well-qualified teacher, 85 percent of the black corps is at present underqualified, compared with 3,36 percent of the whites.

Of the children who began school in 1963, 58 percent of the whites completed the full 12 years of education compared with 22 percent of the Indians, four percent of the coloureds and less than two percent of the Africans.

On and on the figures go, building up a daunting picture of future needs.

Part of the uncomfortable truth is that in the search for parity, standards are going to have to meet in the middle.

Black standards will have to rise. And white standards will drop.

Not in terms of the quality of the education itself, but in terms of the comfort and style in which it is received.

Also, the physical nature of future schools will have to change. To achieve parity of standards, they will have to be smaller and no longer will they be able to afford the full gamut of playgrounds, sports fields, recreation halls and elaborate science laboratories.

Obviously, financing the quest for parity in education will place huge additional burdens on the State coffers.

For instance, to arrive at the 30:1 pupil-teacher ratio by 1990 will mean nearly doubling the current running expenditure from R2,1-billion a year to R4-billion.

In short, the HSRC report, a mammoth exercise in staring future shock in the face, outlines a wearying and expensive trudge ahead.

It also provides stark scientifically-led evidence that it is a journey South Africa cannot afford not to take.

LIBERALS, CONSERVATIVES BATTLE ON CAMPUS

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 11 Oct 81 p 10

[Article by Mike Hewitt: "The Right on the March"]

[Text]

BATTLELINES are being drawn at Stellenbosch University, where rightwing student groups are preparing for a conflict that could rock the cradle of Afrikanerdom.

The normally liberal campus is in turmoil, with verligte student groups this week blocking a bid by an extremist leader to address students.

The two groups spearheading the arch-verkrampte cause are the Afrikaner Weerstandsbeweging (AWB) — and a sinister underground group called Gons which refuses to come into the open, and uses false names for its office bearers.

The AWB contact man on Stellenbosch, Morkel Stofberg, says the rightwing surge on campus began when HNP leader Jaap Marais addressed students at a packed meeting in September.

"Now that we've started to fight, students want to hear the AWB's side as well," he says.

That, however, has not been possible yet.

AWB leader Eugene Terre'blanche has twice found his path into Stellenbosch blocked.

But Cape organiser of the AWB Deetlefs du Toit, after hearing this week that Mr Terre'blanche's Wednesday night meeting had been called off because a sports club refused to close its bar during the address, vowed that students would still get to hear the robust AWB leader talk at Stellenbosch.

Mr Du Toit also denied that the AWB was behind Gons, even though both groups held secret meetings in Stellenbosch at the same time in August.

Soon after that, Gons posters and pamphlets appeared on campus.

Their main attacks have been on the liberal student union, Polstu and the controversial referendum — which was to have been held this week — on opening the university to all races

One poster warned women students about living alongside black men, even though the opening of hostels was never an issue of the referendum.

Another Gons poster asked: "Is Stellenbosch now 'communistic'?"

It said the new Student Parliament system was similar to the Russian government composition.

On other occasion, Gons declared that "illegal" blacks were "stealing" job opportunities from other races in the Western Cape.

A campus source also said that Gons did not stand for Groep van Ontevrede Nasionale Studente. Translated, Gons means "buzz".

The pamphlets are signed by Gons chairman, W H Stoffberg, or the secretary, B B Benade, but there are no such students on the university's registers.

Under the cloak of darkness, Gons have also dropped their pamphlets in the postbox of the university's rector, Professor Mike de Vries.

Investigation

And the university's SRC have banned Gons because of its refusal to register as a student organisation. The Student Parliament is also investigating the group.

But whoever is behind Gons has no intention of coming into the open.

"They will lose their function, then. It is better for them to remain an anonymous, small group," conservative student Rassie Erasmus told me.

He denies being a member of Gons, but gives qualified support for their cause.

"There is a need for the Afrikaner to come out and say what he stands for," he says. "We cannot let a minority do harm to the 'varsity's image".

Morkel Stofberg — who has been mistaken as the mysterious W H Stoffberg — says he too may also soon support Gons. At present, though, they're "like a ghost on campus" and "a cat which has come out the bushes".

It is all part of the overdue uprising of verkramptes on campus, says Mr Stofberg.

For too long, Stellenbosch has carried a liberal banner, but this is changing with the emergence of rightwing groups at the university.

Verkrampte strength numbers 30 percent of the student body. In the hostels, rightwing support runs as high as 80 percent.

Mr Stofberg believes as well that university authorities have exerted pressure to keep the AWB leader away from the campus.

"There are many students who will support the AWB once it is able to get off the ground.

"Now that the rightwingers have started to fight, the leftists are putting on the pressure," he says.

And Mr du Toit, who is a former Matie, states that many Stellenbosch students are ready to be plucked for the AWB "like ripe fruit".

He plans to open an AWB branch on campus once Mr Terreblanche has been able to speak there.

SOWETO TO HAVE ELECTRICITY BY 1983

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 23 Oct 81 p 2

[Text]

IF everything went according to plan all homes and streets in Soweto would be electrified by the end of 1983, Mr Louis Rive, chairman of the Greater Soweto Planning Council said in Johannesburg last night.

Addressing the annual dinner of the Society of Chartered Accountants, Mr Rive said electrification was the most important single physical factor which would change the quality of life for Sowetans.

"If everything goes according to plan every house and every street will be lit up by the end of 1983," he said. "In terms of current projections, the total cost will be R200-million."

Soweto without electricity was depressing — made even bleaker by the high degree of air pollution. Murder cases exceeded 100 a month.

Mr Rive said it was essential and in everybody's interest that Blacks shared in the economy.

"The way in which it is done may yet prove to be the acid test of the White man's sincerity and integrity."

"The pursuit of practices which are tantamount to enforcing a form of economic bondage on a people — albeit in disguised fashion — is both immoral and dangerous," Mr Rive said.

"It is bound to destroy those who practise it in the long run."

Soweto should be a model — what was done and achieved there, ought to be done and should be achieved elsewhere, Mr Rive said. — Sapa.

AIR FORCE MAY TRAIN FIRST COLORED PILOTS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 23 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Keith Abendroth: "Three Pilot Applicants Could Make History"]

[Text]

THREE Coloured matriculants could make history by shattering race barriers and becoming pilots in the South African Air Force if they pass a special selection process early next year.

The SAAF has disclosed that six Coloured matriculants were among the 100 pupils who responded to a recent recruitment campaign for flying careers.

Three of the six will be called to Pretoria later this year for the special selection process.

The Chief of Staff (Personnel) of the SAAF in Pretoria, General AP Roux, told The Citizen about four months ago there was nothing to stop non-White South Africans from becoming pilots as long as they met the strict requirements.

A spokesman for the public relations office of the SAAF also confirmed at the time that applications from all South African Citizens, between the ages of 18 and 23, regardless of race, would be considered by the SAAF selection panel.

The spokesman said a start had already been made last year with the screening of non-Whites for training as pilots. Few had applied and not all of those who did had the right qualifications.

The spokesman said requirements were strict and the final screening was rigid.

"The aptitutde tests are the same and opportunities are equal," he said.

"Merit is all we are interested in."

In the first intake last year 518 applications had been received. Only 62 had been chosen by the selection panel for the two-year course.

"This is an indication of how cautious the SAAF is in selecting the right people for training," the spokesman said.

Basic requirements are a matriculation pass with mathematics, over 17 years of age but under 23, unmarried and with a willingness to sign an undertaking to serve the air force for at least 10 years.

Successful candidates receive a basic regimental orientation course at the flying school at Dunnottar near Springs.

Top-ranking officers started the 1982 recruitment campaign in Cape Town this week.

Potential recruits were being considered as pilots and navigators. They will be called to Pretoria to undergo medical, aptitude, physchological and other tests and appear before a selection board.

STRATEGIST SAYS SECOND FRONT WARNING NOT THREAT

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 23 Oct 81 p 7

[Article by Keith Abendroth]

[Text]

A LEADING South African geo-political strategist, Dr Mike Hough, said yesterday South Africa's warning of a "second front" against terrorism should not be seen as a specific threat against Mozambique or any other neighbouring country.

Commenting on speculation after a statement made by the Minister of Defence, General Magnus Malan, Dr Hough said the warnings should "merely be seen as referring to the fact that support for terrorism against South Africa cannot be tolerated".

Dr Hough, director of Pretoria University's prestigious Institute for Strategic Studies, said it should also be noted that the Soviet Union and its allies were not acting in the interests of any country or group in southern Africa but merely furthering their own aims and interests.

References to the possibility for the necessity of a second "Operation Protea" obviously referred in a broader sense to the fact that Soviet strategy in southern Africa was not only directed towards South West Africa but also to South Africa.

"It is South Africa that is ultimately the aim of Soviet expansion on the African continent."

South Africa had repeatedly said that she wished to live in peace with her neighbours and that she had no aggressive intentions.

"In fact we are willing to co-operate economically with states in southern Africa and offers of a non-aggression treaty have also repeatedly been made."

But it was also clear that all this was dependent on the condition that in turn Black states in the region did not support terrorists acting against the Republic.

"After all, a country's security considerations are of primary importance.

"And just as we do not give facilities to dissident movements in neighbouring countries, the same policy is expected of other states in the region as far as support for insurgents acting against South Africa is concerned," said Dr Hough.

SOWETO HAS LARGEST COST OF LIVING INCREASE

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 20 Oct 81 p 8

[Text]

BLACKS living in the Johannesburg area have been hit harder than any other section of the community by the rising cost of living over the past year, according to a household subsistence level survey prepared by the Institute for Planning Research.

Soweto's rental increase of R13,50 (introduced in three stages) contributed nearly four percent to the 21,2 percent increase in the Black household subsistence level (HSL).

Four other areas had increases above the 16,1 percent Consumer Price Index — Port Elizabeth (19,2 percent), Uitenhage (18,8 percent), Durban (18,3 percent) and Umtata (17,3 percent).

The survey found price increases in almost all food items over the period. Particularly high increases were recorded for dairy products, eggs, vegetables, bread, sugar and, especially, maize products.

Current trends are exactly in line with predictions that the average HSL for a Black household of six will reach R388 per month by 1985.

At present, Windhoek is the most expensive city for Blacks at R250,46 a month, followed by Johannesburg (R242,49) and Cape Town (R231,64). At the other end of the scale are Kimberley (R217,43, Pretoria (R218,23) and East London (R219,45).

In Port Elizabeth's Black townships, household income is only a few rand ahead of the subsistence level. Preliminary results of a socio-economic survey carried out by the institute show that the average household income is R226 per month, while the HSL is R219,45.

Most Coloured areas were not affected by rent or transport increases. The HSL for these households was affected mainly by food price increases, with average increase of 12,9 percent over the past year.

The HSL for a five-member Coloured household in Windhoek was calculated at R294,03 a months, followed by Johannesburg (R237,81) and lowering to R216,74 in East London.

For the first time, Durban's Indian community was included in the survey and the calculated HSL for a six-member household was R259,98 per month.

WHITE DEVELOPERS IN SOWETO PUT ON HOLD

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 15 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Poen de Villiers]

[Text]

WHITE developers will not be able to move into Soweto for a considerable time yet — in spite of an announcement to this effect on Tuesday night by the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof.

This was indicated yesterday by Mr John Knoetze, chairman of the West Rand Administration Board (Wrab).

Dr Koornhof's announcement was welcomed, he said, but full details of the Viljoen Committee's recommendation in this regard and the Government's decision were not yet known.

Furthermore, he said, there was not the "huge undeveloped land" available in Soweto at present to allow private enterprise in.

"It would be wishful thinking to say the problem will be solved overnight," he added.

Before private developers could be allowed into Soweto, Mr Knoetze said, details had to be worked out, — this could only be done after the full report and the Government's decision had been released.

"According to information I have," he said, "no final decision has been taken, but I expect this before the end of the year."

Mr Louis Rive, chairman of the Greater Soweto Planning Council, also welcomed the announcement. He said it was a definite step towards a better dispensation.

"The heartening aspect is that apparently the private sector, financial institutions and employers will be in a much better position to make a much greater contribution."

He added that the provision of housing was an important factor to the upgrading and improvement of living standards in Soweto.

Mr Rive, however, warned that it would be "unwise to be over optimistic". He added that an atmosphere had now been created to bring about meaningful change in the matter.

He called for a joint action between the State, private sector and the communities through the various community councils to get the new scheme off the ground.

Mr Rive added: "There is in the private sector a keen desire to make a meaningful contribution."

Individuals, he added, were keen to make their contribution. This he had learnt through discussions with various Black leaders.

"They are keen to make a more meaningful contribution, particularly in the case of labour. If they do the work themselves, it will be much cheaper and it becomes viable."

He emphasised: "Black people are prepared to make a more meaningful contribution if it is made easier for them. This was the purpose of the Viljoen committee."

Applicants for housing loans would not have to "go through a too sophisticated process" to get money, he said.

According to Dr Koornhof's announcement, private concerns could build houses for rent or sale under the 99-year lease system, or financial institutions could provide loans at sub-economic interest rates for individuals to build their own homes.

The State will provide a bridging subsidy between the sub-economic interest rate the individual could afford and the interest rate at which the financial institutions are prepared to lend the money.

● Mr Louis Rive has decided to stay on as chairman of the Greater Soweto Planning Council as a result of the announcement on new procedures for Black housing.

He disclosed this at a special Press conference in Johannesburg yesterday.

Earlier this year he had stated that he would resign as chairman should developments not allow for a faster improvement in living standards in Soweto.

Yesterday he said he would have withdrawn because it would have been dishonest for him to remain if the council could not proceed more positively with the provision of housing.

"The recent developments have put my mind at ease on that score and I have decided to remain on," he said.

Mr T J Makhaya, a community council member, welcomed Mr Rive's decision, saying: "We are glad that Mr Rive will remain with us because of these winds of change."

● Black estate agents would be allowed in Soweto, Mr John Knoetze, chairman of the West Rand Administration Board, said in Johannesburg yesterday.

He said the Wrab would, in fact like to see Black estate agencies being established in Soweto.

"The Wrab goes out of its way to encourage people to buy houses," Mr Knoetze added.

Established houses in Soweto were, however, far too small, he said. Occupiers of these houses should be encouraged to improve their homes. Extensions could later be a source of extra income by sub-letting rooms.

Mr Knoetze appealed to occupiers of houses who wished to make any extensions to come forward and contact the Wrab so that they could be told what procedure to follow.

POLICE CHIEF BLAMES ANC FOR BOMB BLAST

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 17 Oct 81 p 8

[Text]

DURBAN. — Lieutenant-General Johnn Coetzee, head of the Security Police said yesterday he was certain the African National Congress had been responsible for the bomb explosion on Saturday night at the Department of Co-operation and Development offices in Durban.

"You can take it as a fact that they did it. But the ANC are not keen to claim responsibility, because the only people injured were Blacks and they don't want to alienate the sympathies of Blacks in South Africa," he said.

Gen Coetzee was commenting on a telephone interview with the ANC information department in London in which the spokesman was asked if the ANC claimed responsibility for the bombing.

"We don't claim anything. We just state what we have done and what we know," the spokesman said. He also said that although the London headquarters had not received any confirmation, it was likely that it had been the work of the ANC in South Africa.

Asked why Durban had had nine bombings this year — more than any other city in the Republic — he said it had been selected as the main centre for ANC acts of sabotage and terrorism because of its long "tradition of resistance."

Responsibility for the blast was claimed by two different organisations in anonymous telephone calls to two Durban newspapers. — Sapa.

WHITE DEVELOPERS CAN MOVE INTO SOWETO

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 14 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

WHITE developers can now move into Soweto — and that is official. Dr Piet Koornhof, Minister of Co-operation and Development, said yesterday that Whites could now help to build houses in the township for Blacks.

Mr Boet Viljoen departed from his scheduled presidential address at yesterday's AGM of the Association of Building Societies in Johannesburg to make this announcement.

Mr Viljoen said he received the news from Dr Koornhof yesterday that Whites could help with Soweto development under the 99-year leasehold scheme.

Until now, Whites have been allowed to build for Blacks only if they had no greater share than 49 percent.

In Cape Town yesterday, Dr Koornhof told the Cape National Party congress that unless the private sector and the individual were drawn into building homes for Blacks, South Africa would not be able to meet their needs for the next 50 to 100 years.

Referring to a draft resolution from the Newton Park delegation expressing concern over the lengthy procedures in building houses for urban Blacks, the Minister said:

"Our aim is that Government funds should be employed only to develop the required infra-structures.

"The goal is then to draw the private sector and the individual into providing the actual housing needs.

"If we should fail in this objective, then we will not succeed in meeting the housing needs for Blacks over the next 50 to 100 years."

There were three parties concerned with Black urban housing, he said: the State the private sector, and the individual home-builder who should be assisted "with every means available to make his own contribution." — Sapa.

UNIVERSITY RECTOR OPTIMISTIC ABOUT EDUCATION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 13 Oct 81 p 4

[Text]

CAPE TOWN. — The rector of the University of the Western Cape and a member of the De Lange Commission, Professor Richard van der Ross, said yesterday he did not share the "pessimism" expressed by nine members of the commission who released a statement at the weekend decrying the Government's response to the HSRC report.

The statement by the nine said the Government's response to the report was "inadequate and disappointing", and it "failed to take into account the very situations which caused the investigation into education".

It was signed by Dr Ken Hartshorne, Mr Franklin Sonn, Prof A N Boyce, Mr Alan Pittendrigh, Mr Michael O'Dowd, Mr L M Taunyane, Miss Claudia Regnart and Dr Jack Niven.

Yesterday Prof Van der Ross said: "The restructuring of the education system is to be done on the basis of the report, whose basic principles have been accepted by the Government, although with reservations.

"Fully-integrated education is not wanted now — it is an ideal. The concern of the report was that equal education should be provided for all races in the shortest possible time, which the Government has accepted. The question of full integration was left because I refuse to be side-tracked by those aspects of the Government's response which are obviously politically inspired. I cannot share the more pessimistic inferences of Dr Hartshorne's memorandum."

In the statement, the nine said the most disturbing factor of the Government's response was its decision to appoint a working party, consisting mainly of officials, to help implement the recommendations of the report, instead of the widely-representative council which was "an unanimous recommendation" by the members of the commission.

Prof Van der Ross said: "I agree with Dr Hartshorne that the working party should include more people who are not officials, but three of the members of the De Lange Commission will be on it."

The three are Prof J P de Lange, Prof Van der Ross and Dr R R M Cingo. — Sapa.

TUTU BROUGHT INTO CHURCH FUNDS PROBE

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 13 Oct 81 p 10

[Article by Sandra Lieberum: "Tutu Laid Charge Because He Needed a Scapegoat"]

[Text]

A FORMER South African Council of Churches' accountant was yesterday acquitted on 23 counts of fraud and theft of capital from SACC funds while the magistrate, Mr A H Barlow, commented that the evidence and conduct of Bishop Desmond Tutu, general-secretary of the SACC, lent strong support to the defence contention that he had laid the charges against the accused because he needed a scapegoat to detract from the SACC financial chaos.

"It is my view that once one has considered all the evidence, both oral and the contents of the documents the inevitable and irresistible conclusion is that one gropes in a shadow world of lies and half truths. It is impossible to make a conclusion beyond all doubt," Mr Barlow said.

He found that the accused, Mr Elphas Mbatha (43), had not been a satisfactory witness. However, the onus had not been on the accused to prove his innocence, but on the state to prove his guilt.

One instance that was reported to be an example of a genuine transaction by a company with the accused on behalf of the SACC was unsubstantiated in court by a cross-reference from the SACC books.

"Are the books of the SACC so unreliable that it is impossible to draw any evidence from them?" asked the magistrate.

Unsupported

Evidence has been that about half of all monetary transactions done by the SACC were unsupported by documents and book entries. Numerous donations were made to people whose names were kept secret.

The state allegations against Mr Mbatha were that he ordered carbon paper from Mr J D Pitcher, Camelot Stationery, up until 1978. The state alleged that after Mr Pitcher had left for Cape Town, Mr Mbatha continued to make out fictitious orders for carbon paper and stationery and obtained payment for them.

It further alleged that when payment was not obtained, the cheques were forged. A further count related to pretending that stationery had been supplied to the Voice newspaper. The four theft counts related to three salary cheques the accused was reported to have written out and cashed in the name of an employee who had left the SACC. The last count related to money from the SACC, deposited into another company account, which ended up in the accused's account.

The defence case was that the stationery company owner had said others would continue his business while he was away. This had been done and stationery company employees, together with the accused, had opened up a taxi service into which the profits of the stationery sales were ploughed back into the other two.

Claimed

The court accepted the defence submission with regard to the first three theft counts that someone from the SACC had gone down to the South African Council of Churches' accounts services office where the accused was in charge and claimed the salary cheques. It was further accepted that it was possible that the R2 500 mentioned in the last theft count had been a concealed gift.

Irregularities were discovered about two years ago by the then ombudsman, Mr Eugene Roelofse and he wrote to Bishop Tutu suggesting a top-level investigation. Bishop Tutu in turn consulted the finance committee of the council which appointed Mr Matt Stevenson as assistant general-secretary (admin) to sort out the problem.

In court, Mr Stevenson testified that the "stationery and carbon had definitely not been delivered, and the amount of carbon would have satisfied the requirements of the RSA, not only the SACC."

The court, however, found that in the light of an auditor's report handed in by the defence, the state of the books was such that Mr Stevenson could not possibly have given the evidence he did with such assurance. "He is a sincere man, but is, however, in my view mistaken as to several matters," said the magistrate.

Unusual

The defence had contended throughout that the stationery was delivered. It further claimed it was also duplicating and printing papers. In this regard the court found it unusual that if the stationery had not been delivered, one of the signatories on the payment cheques should have been SACC appointed.

The main state witness was found by the court to have given evidence which was a mixture of lies and half-truths. The date he left Johannesburg was uncertain and the nature of his business with the SACC was unsupported. In one instance he said an order had been faked, but admitted the following order was in his own handwriting.

Relating to the defence case that the accused was being made a scapegoat, the court called Bishop Tutu and yesterday commented that the way in which the accused had been treated was to say the least, strange. This in the light of the fact that the SACC praesidium had decided not to lay a complaint against a former general-secretary who allegedly channelled in excess of R250 000 from a discretionary fund into 51 private accounts and the decision to sack but not charge a dishonest franking machine operator seemed out of step with the decision to lay a charge against the accused.

"This has the stamp of false piety," said Mr Barlow, commenting on the fact that Bishop Tutu explained that they had not laid a complaint against the franking machine operator because he worked for the SACC and therefore was seen as an erring child of God and not as a criminal. Why then was the accused viewed in a different light?

Bishop Tutu's offer in court for anyone to inspect the books as the SACC conducted its business transparently, seemed of little substance as "on the evidence before me the books and documents have no value at all."

The court therefore found that there was possibly and, more probably, a great deal of substance in the suspicions of ombudsman Mr Eugene Roelofse when he wrote to Bishop Tutu pointing out "there have for some time been persistent rumours that all is not well with the SACC."

He also commented to the Bishop in a letter: "I might be barking up the wrong tree, but it does look as if a large amount of money is unaccounted for.

"For all I know, substantial amounts of money might have been misappropriated and used for private enrichment."

After the trial, Mr Mbatha told The Citizen, "I bear no grudge against the SACC. I'm too much of a Christian for that.

"I know I've been used. After the evidence uncovered by Mr Roelofse, something had to be done, something as drastic as this, to draw a red herring across the track to cover up for the SACC irregularities."

NEW EXPORT COAL MINE IS UNDER DEVELOPMENT

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES-BUSINESS TIMES in English 11 Oct 81 pp 1, 3

[Article by Andrew McNulty]

[Text]

A NEW export coal mine that will ultimately produce at the rate of 4,25-million tons a year is to be developed at Middelburg, Eastern Transvaal, at a capital cost of R244-million.

When full production levels are reached by 1985, the mine will earn foreign exchange totalling well over R130-million a year based on today's price of about R30 a ton.

Called the Middelburg Mine, the project is among major new mining capacity being developed as the South African coal industry lifts its output to 44-million tons of export coal a year by 1985/6, and as Richards Bay phase 3 comes on stream.

Rick Chadwick, a director of Rand Mines and managing director of Middelburg Mine Services, tells Business Times that, although the export coal market has softened in the short term, prospects for the medium to long term are viewed as "extremely bullish".

Middelburg Mine is a joint venture between BP (88,503%), Kanhym Investments, the farming/coal-mining group in the Gencor stable, (6%), and Douglas Colliery, a company held about 70% by Transvaal Consolidated Lands (5%).

Rand Mines will operate the mine. BP will market the coal under its phase 3 export allocation.

Site work has already started on the project, which will be an opencast mine eventually making use of three huge draglines each costing upwards of R20-million.

The first of the draglines has been ordered from Bucyrus Eyrie.

Jobs will be created for about 900 people, who will be accommodated in housing to be built to high standards set in the area by other new coal mines developed recently.

The coal deposits at the planned production rate have a life of 30 years.

A beneficiation plant is to be constructed by Simon Carves (Africa) to produce high-quality export steam coal.

Confirmation of Kanhym's participation is exciting news for the share's long-term prospects.

Kanhym's southern coal reserves form part of the new mine, and the group has for some time held the option to participate, but the announcement of final agreement has been long awaited by the market.

Kanhym will contribute R15,85-million to the capital cost of the mine — which totals about R244-million in today's money and will ultimately be far higher — equivalent to its 6,497% participation.

It will have a 5,867% share in proceeds and expenses.

Douglas Colliery as a 5% shareholder will incur capital expenditure of about R12,2-million.

Harold Kramer, chief executive and joint managing director of Kanhym, says that the group will have no difficulty financing its share of the capital expenditure over the next three years from internal resources and existing borrowing capacity.

He estimates that the group's total capital spending in the next three years will average R15-million to R20-million annually.

Earnings flow from the mine should start making a material impact on Kanhym's earnings per share by 1984.

Projected return is attractive as the payback period is relatively short at about five years, which means that Kanhym's share of the mine's earnings should be about R7-million to R8-million (pretax) by 1985.

By that stage, the mine should be contributing somewhere above 75c a share to Kanhym's pretax earnings.

The contribution from coal to Kanhym's earnings is expected to rise from the current 6% to between 25% and 30% by 1985.

Mr Kramer adds that participation in the Middelburg Mine does not affect Kanhym's 50-50 participation with BP in the Eikeboom Colliery, where current production and sales are 95 000 tons a month and which has proven saleable reserves estimated at more than 30-million tons.

BRIEFS

LEADERS' 'SINISTER PLOT'--The South African defense minister, General Magnus Malan, says a typical example of the Soviet Union and its satellites trying to destabilize the world regions was the assassination of President al-Sadat. Speaking at Kruger Day celebration at Brits near Pretoria, the general said the attack, which was received with jubilation by Soviet satellite countries, might have serious consequences for the Middle East and Africa. He said these efforts at destabilization by the Soviet Union and its proxies were also apparent in southern Africa. General Malan pointed out that some southern African leaders for the past year or so had been involved in a sinister plot to try and tell the world that South Africa was trying to destabilize the subcontinent. The Zimbabwean prime minister, Mr Robert Mugabe, was the lead singer in the chorus of allegations that South Africa was training terrorists or guerrillas to oust the Zimbabwean Government. General Malan said that recently President Kenneth Kuanda of Zambia alleged that South Africa was training no less than 20,000 Zambians, Zimbabweans and Mozambicans to act against their respective countries. The general described these allegations as absurd, adding that these leaders were making South Africa a scapegoat to cover up their own actions. [Text] [LD101432 Johannesburg International Service in English 1100 GMT 10 Oct 81]

MILITARY SELF-SUFFICIENCY--The South African prime minister, Mr. P.W. Botha says the recent operation Protea during which security forces invaded the south of Angola to wipe out SWAPO bases illustrated that South Africa could protect and arm itself adequately. Opening the 63.5 million rand--that is, about $67 million--(?transkop) armaments factory at Wellington, near Cape Town, Mr Botha said that although the country's problems could not be solved through the barrel of a gun, it had been able to defend itself against any form of military aggression. South Africa was forced to become militarily self-sufficient after the United Nations arms boycott was introduced a decade ago. Mr Botha pointed out that with the establishment of the South African armaments corporation the country had become virtually militarily self-sufficient and the arms boycott no longer affected the country's ability to defend itself. [Text] [LD151154 Johannesburg International Service in English 1100 GMT 15 Oct 81]

NATIONAL PARTY CONGRESS--The South African foreign minister, Mr Roelof Botha, says his government hopes to discuss South-West Africa/Namibia with representatives of the western five contact group in Capetown on 28 October. Addressing the congress of the ruling National Party in Cape Town Mr Botha said various matters would be discussed, including United Nations partiality towards SWAPO, the world body's negative attitude toward the territory's internal political parties, assurances of a fair election, composition of a United Nations force and certain constitutional rights. Mr Botha said South Africa, as had been the case in the past, would adopt a strong position on these issues. He added that South Africa was hoping that the latest initiative would lead to an international acceptable solution to the South-West African/Namibian problem, or that it would at least create a situation which the West, and America in particular, considered to be a fair South African attitude. [Text] [LD142356 Johannesburg International Service in English 2100 GMT 14 Oct 81]

ARMED FORCES BUILDUP--Johannesburg, 19 Oct (AFP)--South Africa will continue to build-up its armed forces as long as the country is threatened by the Soviets and their surrogates, Prime Minister Pieter Botha said yesterday. In an interview on state television, Mr Botha also said that while terrorists continue to sow discord and commit acts of sabotage, South Africa will continue expanding and strengthening its defence force. While good sense fails to prevail, the defence force has to provide barrier to protect the people of the country as they strive to find equitable solutions to complex problems, he said. The forces are one of the most important symbols of the South African nationhood, he said. Defence Minister General Magnus Malan said in the same broadcast that he had tremendous confidence in the ability of the defence force to ward off any threat ranging from insurgency to conventional warfare. [Text] [AB190936 Paris AFP in English 0925 GMT 19 Oct 81]

MILITARY SUCCESSES AGAINST SWAPO--The South-West African territory force has announced in Windhoek that 38 armed SWAPO terrorists have been shot dead by security forces in Ovambo since the beginning of the month and that the activities of SWAPO have decreased considerably since Operation Protea and Operation Carnation, but SWAPO has begun an intensified campaign of intimidation among civilians in Ovambo and security forces are now taking action against this campaign. Military action against SWAPO over the past few months has had a positive effect on the security situation. The ability of the terrorists to conduct operations from southern Angola has been limited and the local population is now much more positive towards the security forces. Since April this year, the intensity of SWAPO operations has declined: there have been fewer contacts, fewer land mine explosions and fewer cases of sabotage. WINDHOEK TALKS--The South African prime minister, Mr P. W. Botha, the foreign minister, Mr Roelof Botha, and the defense minister, Gen Magnus Malan, have held a 2 and 1/2 hour meeting with the South-West African Namibian Ministers Council in Windhoek. The talks, to discuss the constitutional future of the territory, were attended by leaders of the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance. Later today the South African delegation will also meet the leaders of the other internal political parties. [Text] [LD191134 Johannesburg International Service in English 1100 GMT 19 Oct 81]

LESOTHO CHARGES--The South African minister of foreign affairs, Mr Roelof Botha has asked the UN secretary general to send a fact-finding mission to southern Africa to find out exactly what is happening on the border between South Africa and Lesotho. Mr Botha's letter to Dr Waldheim is in response to an allegation made by the Lesotho Government yesterday that an attack on the barracks of a para-military unit was the work of South Africans. Lesotho threatened to take the matter to the security council. Mr Botha said he rejected the unfounded allegation, he said the prime minister of Lesotho, Dr Leabua Jonathan had elicited a lot of smouldering opposition since he established a government by decree 11 years ago. During this time the opposition had grown in intensity and had become more sophisticated and better organised. This had let to several acts of violence against the Lesotho Government. Mr Botha said the South African Government had on several occasions apprehended armed Lesotho citizens who were plotting against Lesotho and had handed them over to the Lesotho Government. Mr Botha said it was ironical that the preposterous allegations had come at a time when there was a cooperation program underway to increase food production in Lesotho. Mr Botha said it was probably the first time since independence that Lesotho was expected to enjoy sufficient food for its people this year. POSSIBLE RELEASE OF PESTRESTOV--The South African minister of foreign affairs, Mr Roelof Botha, says it would not be in the interests of Sapper Van Der Mecht, who is being held prisoner in Angola, to comment on negotiations on a possible prisoner exchange. Mr Botha was reacting to an announcement by the international committee of the Red Cross in Geneva, Switzerland, that negotiations were in progress between South Africa and the Soviet Union to exchange warrant officer Nikolay Pestrestov, a Russian soldier taken prisoner in Angola, for Sapper Van Der Mecht. He said it was not clear to him why the announcement had been made. [Text] [LD110820 Johannesburg International Service in English 0300 GMT 11 Oct 81]

NAMIBIA PROBLEM--The prime minister of South Africa, Mr P. W. Botha, says it is too early to say at this stage how the problems in the way of a settlement for South-West Africa/Namibia could be approached in a more realistic way by other parties involved. The problems have been identified by the South African Government and parties of South-West Africa/Namibia. Speaking in Cape Town, Mr Botha referred to reports that the five Western countries who have involved themselves with South-West Africa/Namibia will soon be sending a delegation to southern Africa. He said several matters had to be clarified, among them the role of the internal parties of South-West Africa/Namibia, and partiality of the UN towards SWAPO. Mr Botha said that the Australian prime minister, Mr Fraser, and the British Foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, should not involve themselves with South Africa's domestic policies: they should rather seek solutions to the problems of their own countries. The prime minister also said that the time had come for the nations of the world who believed in maintaining civilized standards to act against international terrorism. He said international terrorism was a criminal attempt to frustrate the civilized world. It was criminal to call terrorists freedom fighters while they murdered innocent people. Mr Botha said it was astounding that the media showed such poor judgment by aiding terrorism through extensive coverage of terrorist activity. FRENCH ENVOY RECALLED--The French ambassador to South Africa, Bernard Dorin, has been recalled by the Mitterrand government. The recall coincides with a large-scale rearrangement of the French diplomatic service which will affect about 50 ambassadors and diplomats throughout the world. On his return to Paris, Dorin will become head of the French directorate of American affairs. His successor has not yet been named. CAPE TOWN TALKS--The chief minister of the Ciskei, Dr Sebe, says the discussions between the governments of the Ciskei and of South Africa today were a new milestone in relations between the people of the two countries. At the meeting in Cape Town, where the prime minister, Mr P. W. Botha, acted as chairman, a second series of agreements were finalized. Dr Sebe said the meeting was characterized by complete and utter frankness and this led to very good decisions being taken. CISKEI STATEHOOD--Ciskei will become a sovereign democratic republic in a confederation of southern African states when the national state becomes independent on 4 December. Announcing this in the legislative assembly during the second reading of the Republic of Ciskei constitution act, the chief minister, Dr. Lennox Sebe said the constitution proposed that Ciskei head of state will be a president who would be the head of government and chief of the Ciskeian armed forces. PROBLEMS MOUNT BUT MITTERRAND IS COOL

Can Mobutu Be Saved?

Paris L'EXPANSION in French No 177, 18 Sep-1 Oct 81 pp 93-97, 99, 101, 103

[Article by Bernard Lalanne--passages enclosed in slantlines printed in italics]

[Text] Even though Mitterrand holds it at arms length, Zaire is too wealthy and too deeply in debt for its creditors to forget it.

We are in the office of an executive for a Belgian Company, in Kinshasa, not far from the port. The air is hot and humid, the furnishings are ill-matched, the armchairs are worn-looking.

"My dividends...You want to see my dividends?" Without waiting for an answer, the man reaches into his desk and pulls out two wads of paper which he opens up slowly.

"I will sell them in Anvers, on my next trip to Europe. They represent about Fr 200,000." Twelve uncut diamonds sparkle in the palm of his hand while the Guide of the Revolution, his features set in the prescribed official portrait, looks elsewhere. "We got a good laugh, here, about that business of Giscard's diamonds! Imagine making such a fuss about a thing like that..." Our businessman, who stuffs his luggage full of little stones every time he goes to Brussels, still finds it amusing. Are there never any hitches? No, the CND (National Documentation Center) has much better things to do than to bother traffickers: buttoned up in their chestnut-colored/abacost/--the Zairian Mao suit--Mobutu's secret policy prefer to track down subversion in the climate-controlled lounge of the Hotel Intercontinental, the cosmopolitan crossroads of "Kin," as Kinshasa is known.

Without excessive caution, our interlocutor then explains to us that he has his channels, reliable people to whom he turns over deliveries of palm oil, nails, preserves or fish-meal: with the hard currency generated by his normal export business, he can import products lacking on the local market which are in great demand by the speculators. "In my opinion, one-third of the Whites here depend on this kind of operation just to get by. For me it is different: since it is prohibited, how could I repatriate my dividends without my little tricks?

So it goes in Zaire, a strong-box riddled with holes which are responsible both for its ruin and its survival. You are caught up in a crazy universe once the airplane lands and you fall unprepared into the hands of customs officers expert in /matabiche,/ the Zairian version of bakshish: our photographer almost had to abandon half his film with them. This is well known, and every company appoints an officer to be responsible for the "protocol"--a beautiful euphemism--of handling the airport "formalities."

Then there is the "racket" of the telephone operators, who only understand one language: "What is your name, citizen? If I get through, come to see me tomorrow, here is my address..." One business manager swears he keeps a list of the switchboard operators at the central office and gives them a monthly bonus, while another openly keeps records: /x/ days when the telex is functioning = /x/ cases of beer. Your telephone is dead? Your line has been accidentally disconnected. Get in your car and slip a few bills to the superintendent at the head office. Kinshasa telephone employees are trying to delay the installation of an inter-urban automatic dialing system. One can understand why....

The bureaucrats do not have a monopoly on "fiddles." Innocent young girls take the Brazzaville ferry with stones hidden in their tresses, and cripples conceal them in their wheelchairs! In 1980, Congo-Brazzaville exported $200 million in diamonds, though it did not produce a single carat. At the bottom of the social ladder, people scrounge for pennies; at the top, they concoct big deals. A worker makes less than 500 zaires per month, while a box of powdered milk costs 50; but Kinshasa is tops in number of Mercedes, and some Zairians own a different colored model for each day of the week. Citizen Bemba, who comes from Equator (the home province of the Guide), is probably the only person alive who paid cash, in dollars, for a C-130 airplane, with which he exports coffee.

Another "big/bwana/" clears Fr 1 million per month in the meat business on the parallel market, while one high official in the Bank of Zaire lets it be known that he "deals" in the transport of sardines. Why sardines? Because these little herrings packed in tomato sauce are price-controlled and thus of no interest to speculators. It is an unhinged economy, where following the rules leads to insolvency and fraud becomes a necessity: it is impossible to escape this maelstrom if one wants to work in Zaire. On the continent, it is second to Nigeria in population and second to South Agrica in wealth, while it is third largest in area: nearly five times as large as France. The world's biggest producer of cobalt and industrial diamonds, and seventh largest producer of copper, it also has zinc, tin, manganese, cadmium, silver and gold: the sector provides 80 percent of its export earnings.

Jealous of its possession and convinced it was fully justified, Belgium arranged things so as to tap that vein indefinitely. When it beat a retreat before the precipitous independence [of Zaire] in 1960, it left a great deal of infrastructure but no really well-formed framework. Left at loose ends, the country came undone: Tshombe pushed Katanga to secession, the West and Kasai rose up in revolt. There were executions and assassinations (Lumumba in 1961), by Kalachnikov, machet and poisoned arrow, and General Mobutu ended by coming to power in 1965.

The Citizen-President-Founder (of the sole party, the Popular Movement of the Revolution [MPR]) imposed order and "authenticity."

Christian names were banned, people were addressed as "Citizen" of "Citizenness," the/abacost/(revolutionary garb) replaced Western clothes, and the Guide henceforth sported the emblems of leadership, a leopard cap and carved staff. The Mining Union of Upper Katanga, a vestige of Belgian colonialism, passed into the hands of the state without apparent damage, and, with domestic tranquility restored, the country's Gross Domestic Product [GDP] grew by an average 7 percent per year from 1968, to 1974. But the economy could not long escape the new doctrine. In November 1973 "Zairianization" brought the transfer of shops, plantations and stock farms previously belonging to foreigners over to nationals; a year later, despite the evident fiasco, Mobutu went further by deciding on "radicalization," that is, pure and simple nationalization. Bled white, exploited by incompetent and venal managers, businesses collapsed, in a worsening global economic environment which President Mobutu today defines as: the oil crisis, and the decline in the copper market. When, in a sudden reversal, the government finally announced the policy of "retrocession" to the former proprietors, its credibility was destroyed. To that debacle was added the first invasion of Shaba (formerly Katanga) in March 1977, followed by another in May 1978, involving the memorable dropping of French and Belgian paratroopers over Kolwezi.

Poor Zaire! Its inherent problems were enough: it is a caged up giant (37 km of coast out of 9,165 km of borders, beleagured (nine of the most ideologically obsessed neighbors), and totally dependent on the outside, because of its growing [economic] extraversion. Repeated problems and plunderings, the decline of productivity and the collapse of the transport system in fact led its population--three-fourths rural—from food self-sufficiency to an alarming deficit. Products rotted in place, the youth abandoned the bush, Kinshasa swelled. Unemployment, poverty, malnutrition...A man who employs 500 wage-earners showed us the death certificates of infants in employee families: 23 in only 2 weeks.

In 1979, when President Mobutu threw himself on the mercy of the international institutions, inflation was approaching 150 percent. The currency was devalued five times in 9 months. The GDP in real terms had declined by 18 percent in 4 years, and Zaire's external debt was more than $4.5 billion, or one-third of its exports and nearly three-fourths of its GDP.

The Short Leash of the IMF

/"Azalite! Bongo azalite!"/ ("There is none, there is no money") say the little people of Kinshasa's "inner city" in Lingala. People spend their days trying to recover or steal /"vidanges"/--a Belgian term for returnable bottles. "Do you want me to by your spy?" is the offer made young Zairian women ready to rent out their charms in excange for /superwax/ (smuggled goods) or /fufu/ (manioc flour). Mothers are hard pressed to find milk--/chance te!/ (no luck)--but the wealthy have no problem buying their salmon at Hediard's, Avenue 30 Juin. In the interior, people do not even try to get money any more, since products do not get there. So, one barters with hard currency: sardines, corned-beef, second-hand clothes....

All the same, the most serious shortage is monetary, for this is what is strangling the economy. Kept on a "short leash" for 2 years by the intransigent IMF, Zaire doles out hard currency to the productive sector drop by drop. Thus, GECAMINES [General Quarries and Mines Company], the former Mining Union, which produces four-fifths of the country's export earnings, recoups only a portion of it, though its activities are what keep Shaba as a whole going (schoold, roads, transport, hospitals, etc.) and though it provides the lion's share of the country's tax revenues. Because of a lack of sufficient means to renovate equipment and import spare parts, the plant remains under-utilized and production stagnates. Another state-owned company, the Office of Kilo-Moto Gold Mines, lost in northeastern Zaire, was producing about 10 tons per year in the 1960's. By 1980, production had fallen to 700 kg, but its president, Citizen Issiaka, endeavors to hold on to hope: "Our big problem is hard currency. Let us hope that Kilo-Moto will not be forgotten, for it is in the government's interest for export enterprises to be working full-steam."

Everywhere one finds the same complaints. Industries on average are only running at 40 percent of capacity, and that figure would fall to 10 percent without the pursuit of hard currency that has been in full swing for several months. If your business is exporting, you are the king out of the total proceeds from the sale of your shipment of coffee, the Bank of Zaire keeps 30 percent and puts 70 percent in the banking system. The fun begins when you do not need that hard currency right away. X, a public works contractor who just happens to be looking for hard currency to import shovels, is only too happy to buy your drawing rights to it. Naturally, you are going to turn it over to him at a profit which is determined by a percentage fixed each day by the biggest clandestine traffic, the diamond trade. And you are going to pocket the commission with no formalities.

This little dance has infinite variations. You might turn over your currency to a partner who will pay you in goods instead of cash. You will often make an excellent profit on the re-sale. Without waiting for a buyer, you might yourself import products rare on the market; turn you currency into TV sets, dyes or second-hand clothes, and your profits will be tidy (look at our Belgian and his diamonds). But why work so hard? Simply act as the middleman who from his office tracks down offers and needs. You will have property in Binza, a swimming pool, Mercedes automobiles and 18 house-boys!

As the parallel market in Zaire is twice as profitable as the official (it was three times as profitable before the 40 percent devaluation in June), only simpletons obey the law. The simple traveler never pays his hotel bill by credit card: he pulls out a briefcase full of bills obtained on the black market. An a palm-oil exporter told us unabashedly how he under-invoices his shipments, asks his clients to pay the difference into a Belgian, Swiss or Liberian account and--with no one the wiser--makes a fortune repartiating it on the parallel market. "Afterward," he smiled, "it is a real tightrope walk with all the transfers between my various accounts!" Officially condemned, exchange fraud goes on de facto, not only because the elite steep themselves in it with alacrity, but also because it keeps the economy from grinding to a halt.

An official permit form called "SAD" (without hard currency purchase) has recently been introduced to legalize certain oblique operations.

In a general way, under this regimen of scarcity, every business is forced to shift for itself. One of the biggest French industrial companies buys and exports Zairian coffee without knowing it, at the initiative of its local agent hurting for hard currency. To supply his employees with manioc and beans at a decent price, the same fellow operates a 300-hectare field where 500 people live. But go explain that to the headquarters in Paris!

"With an Iron Hand...And No Glove"

Citizen Kabongo's white [Peugeot] 504 plunges deep into the limewashed galleries. Kabongo is the manager of the subterranean mine of Kamoto. At 350 [meters?] below ground level, a gyratory crushing machine pulverizes 10,000 tons of high-copper content ore every day: 4 percent [copper] on average (compared to 2.3 percent in Zambia, 0.4 percent in the United States). We are in Kolwezi, in Shaba, a peaceful and flower-adorned city, source of three-fourths of Zaire's copper and nine-tenths of Zaire's cobalt. Around the Kamoto mine, the treasure lies right out in the open sky, in gigantic stepped amphitheaters into which machinery cuts day and night. But the impressive dance of 150-tone ore buckets fails to hide the serious problems GECAMINES is having merely to keep up its declining production (420,000 tons of copper and 14,000 tons of cobalt), despite proven reserves of 30 years and potential reserves of 60 years. The lack of foreign exchange, the successive invasions of Shaba, the flight of a portion of the expatriate technicians and lastly the morass of the transport sector explain this sluggishness. Trapped in the middle of Africa, Zairian ore must go at least 2,000 km to reach the sea, and removing it takes heroic efforts. Since the rail links to Lobito (Angola) and Beira (Mozambique) were shut down, a few tons have continued to be shipped out via Dar es Salaam (Tanzania) over the last 4 months; but half the production is sent out via East London and Durban (South Africa), while the rest moves out via the "national route" (rail and river) which terminates at the port of Matadi after a journey with four breaks: 2 and 1/2 months in transit...It must be admitted that the pathetic state of communications reaches unheard of proportions.

One no longer even sees Kinshasa's /fula-fulas/, those collective light vans which sink under the weight of the mass of humanity they carry; the Office of Roads has been nicknamed the "Office of Holes;" and it is a titanic labor which has been undertaken by the Office of Transport (ONATRA), headed by a Belgian, Honore Paelinck. This moustachioed and energetic Fleming puts the problem bluntly: "The equipment was not renovated between 1960 and 1976, and ONATRA was being eaten away from inside. Action with an iron hand had to be taken...and without gloves. This is what I have done, with approval of the head of state."

It would be unfair, in fact, not to mention the recent measures taken by President Mobutu who, whatever the cost to the populace, is swallowing the IMF's bitter medicine. Since 1974, the Zaire has been devalued by close to 1,000 percent, but the stabilization plan brought inflation definitely below 50 percent last year. The international bodies have placed experts in key positions (the central bank, the ministry of finance); Belgian customs authorities have sent 48 incorruptibles to Kinshasa; Belgium, France and China are training the FAZ (Zairian Armed Forces); and donor countries agreed, in July, to rescheduling the external debt. This explains the optimism of the state commissar (minister) for economic affairs: "The decisions made starting in 1980," said Citizen Pay-Pay, "have restored the confidence of foreign interests. We are moving toward better days, if we remain firm." A Belgian banker in Kinshasa is skeptical: "The country will get out of this if it accepts draconian conditions if not outright tutelage imposed by foreigners, until such time as its leaders open their eyes to realities. And I am not yet convinced of their will to change."

Boisterous Nationalism and Discreet Allegiance

By a strange dialectics, the boisterous manifestations of national sovereignty coexist here with more discreet signs of allegiance to an omnipresent foreign capitalism. The political rhetoric ignores the possibly humiliating aspects of the IMF's dictatorship or the purchased advice of the Western banks, and the supremacy of the state is reinforced periodically be spectacular decisions. The most recent episode of that subtle game came in early June, when the state-owned company, SOZACOM [Zairian Company for the Marketing of Ores] (which since 1974 has marketed the bulk of mineral production) ended the diamond trade monopoly held by De Beers for 14 years.

This intransigence, extolled by the young Zairian jurists who surround President Mobutu, has also been shown in dealing with the oil companies (Gulf, along with Belgian and Japanese partners) which produce 1 million tons per year and up until then had enjoyed extremely profitable terms. The target, in a word, is the entire mining and hydrocarbons sector, as provided in the April decree that had a chilling effect on investors and stopped most projects. "Is one to believe the liberal promises of the Guide or fear the new measures taken by the state?" wonders one development expert. "Just at the time when there is a need to restore confidence, suddenly there is talk of hitting expatriates with a $50,000 surety." One longtime resident of Zaire, noting these contradictions, finds only one interpretation: the fallow field cycle. "A business enterprise in the hands of a Zairian collapses within 6 to 24 months: retroceded to foreign interests, it starts off again; then it is taken back by the Zairians, and it all begins again."

Here confusion always brings profits to the most resourceful, so risk and riches are found in pleasant coexistence. The master craftsmen in such things are those who got their knowledge of Zaire in the field--the Belgians--even if, like a tragedy by Racine, a network of passions, storms and hatreds binds Brussels and Kinshasa to each other.

Fleeing his country in April, it was to Belgium that Prime Minister Nguza Karl-i-Bond went to rejoin Mobutu's opponents and call for revolt, which infuriated the head of state. But in Zaire, the General Ores Company (SGM, a subsidiary of Genreal Company of Belgium), the spearhead of colonialism, continues to make substantial profits, thanks to subcontracting arrangements still in force. It is this company which is responsible for contracts to sell GECAMINES products outside the country; which has broad supervision over copper distribution; and which, finally, processes and refines part of the copper on behalf of SOZACOM: Zairian copper accounts for one-third of the operations of the Hoboken refinery near Anvers. Evil tongues in fact accuse SGM of recovering the residual gold contained in the products in processes and pocketing a clandestine profit. "What?" explodes Mr Van Look, the GSM representative in Kinshasa. "That is another tale spread by the French! They are ready to do anything to get a place in Zaire, including hitting below the belt. I am shocked."

Such polemics are certainly indicative of the rivalries and hopes of the Western nations, the current chaos notwithstanding. Belgium, it is true, gets some $2 billion per year out of Zaire, has 20,000 citizens living there, and its Zairian holdings provide employment to 50,000 people in the country. France is Zaire's third largest supplier (behind Belgium and Germany), its second biggest customer (behind Belgium), and in general it looks as though Belgium, by maintaining its presence, were taking out an option of the future.

Of course, COFACE [French Insurance Company for Foreign Trade] is no longer examining any case-files, and only the CCCE [Central Fund for Economic Cooperation] is still "getting soaked." Never mind: every country watches over its pawns. A Japanese-European consortium (led by Alusuisse) has just been created for the construction of an aluminum foundry, the Japanese are also involved in the mining company SODIMIZA [expansion unknown] and the gigantic Matadi bridge, the Chinese have military advisers at Kisangani and the Americans are building the high-voltage line to link the Inga dam with the Shaba mines, one of the biggest of the regime's projects. But all the investors avoid making permanent commitments.

Who is going to leave Zaire in the lurch? Not the great powers, all too aware of its strategic and exonomic importance. Mobutu knows this perfectly well, and has integrated it into his tactics. Who will save it? Not the interests allied to the Zairian oligarchy, which doles out just enough to the patient to keep him alive and gets rich off the status quo. Who then? "It is shameless exploitation, organized pillage for the benefit of foreigners and their agents, while the bulk of the people wallow in poverty, sometimes artificially induced," said the Zairian bishops' committee this summer. These were subversive words and immediately diluted in the passivity of the masses, but they were noticed in a country where counter-balancing powers and appeals no longer exist.

The sole organ of thinking and decision is the political bureau of the MPR, and Mobutu governs with the help of reliable men from his own province (Equator). The "office of the president" has more weight than the council of ministers, which are intentionally kept in a precarious position. About 20 people, at the apex of the regime, exercise real influence over the Guide, who concentrates all power in his own hands. It is a strong regime, feared, but one whose authority safeguards something which is always threatened: the unity of the country. In Kinshasa they say that the day Mobutu goes everything will blow up: "People' will have to jump on the first airplane, for it will be bloody. May he last a long time!"

For the moment, the Citizen-President-Founder seems capable of coping with the nasty talk of the exiled opposition, even if his star is fading in the West. Mitterrnad's France keeps him at a distance, and the Franco-African summit in November will not be held in Kinshasa. But America's Reagan remains a solid ally in Mobutu's eyes. The truth is that neither Paris, nor Brussels, nor Washington would know who to put in his place without taking serious risks.

How long will the social fabric bear up under the shortages and the accelerated weakening of purchasing power? In late June, acknowledging its efforts at austerity, the IMF provided Zaire the biggest loan ever given an African country: $1.2 billion over 3 years. The IMF hopes, of course, that the unfortunate debtor will not be stabbed in the back by a decline in the market for its raw materials...

"It is certain that Zaire will get out of this," maintains a businessman who is fond of the country. "To fail to help the country pay off its $4.5 billion now is to risk having to spend $20 billion when it veers toward the East. What it wants, at bottom, is simple monetary protection, which would be something like a return to the fold." The fact is that no institution, no state has up to now shown itself either generous enough or intrepid enough to grapple with the chaos of Zaire. As they say in Kinshasa, it is such a /poto-poto!/

Interview With Mobutu

Paris L'EXPANSION in French No 177, 18 Sep-1 Oct 81 pp 96-97

[Interview with President Mobutu by Bernard Lalanne, Kolwezi, Zaire, date not specified]

[Text] Two thousand kilometers in a tind cockpit, sitting next to the Guide, who pilots the 4-engine C-130 belonging to the Zairian Air Force. A young black hostess in a paratrooper gear serves drinks, while, on the lower level, the entourage of the head of state watch a war film on video screens. President Mobutu is going to Kolwezi for large maneuvers. It was there, in his straw hut surrounded by men at arms, that he answered our questions, with the principal dignitaries of the regime looking on.

[Question] The Franco-African summit was supposed to be held in Zaire this year. President Mitterrand prefers to meet in France: are you disappointed?

[Answer] Disappointed, no. I would be if I learned that another African country had been chosen for next year's summit, for Kinshasa was the unanimous choice of the participants.

[Question] You do not take it as an unfriendly gesture on the part of France?

[Answer] No. I would find it hard to believe that President Mitterrand could begin his term by having a rift with Zaire.

[Question] You had a special relationship with Valery Giscard d'Estaing. Not with Francois Mitterrand....

[Answer] I have never met Francois Mitterrand. But Zaire will always be Zaire, with its strategic importance, and it must not be thought that Zaire will always have need of France. Look at what we are, and you will see that France also has need of us. Believe me, Zaire is not just another African country.

[Question] In May 1978 the paratroopers came right here, to Kolwezi. If a new threat were to arise in Shaba, could you still count on French support?

[Answer] Now there are accords with Angola and Zambia to prevent such attacks from recurring. I do my duty as Zaire's head of state, and if we were attackeed, we would defend ourselves; since Kolwezi, we have gotten organized, with the help of the French, the Belgians and the Chinese. I was not elected so I could be eternally asking for support from abroad.

[Question] To what extent are the problems the Zairian economy is experiencing attributable to domestic causes, as compared with external causes?

[Answer] We have a market economy, and it is the outside world--you people--who establish the prices for our export products. As for manufactured products, they keep going higher; the number of bags of coffee it takes to buy a truck has tripled or quintupled since the oil crisis: that is our tragedy.

[Question] But is it not true that mistakes in administration are also responsible for these problems?

[Answer] No. Because of jealousies, my country has never been left in peace. This is the heart of the problem: we are envied on all sides. There were rebellions in Kasai, Upper Zaire, the Bandundu. Then they took aim at the economic heart of the country, Kolwezi, where we are today. If Zaire were left alone, I guarantee you that peace, order and tranquility would reign. Since I pacified the country, you show me where order has been disturbed because people were dissatisfied with President Mobutu or his regime. It has always come from neighboring countries.

[Question] Is the recovery effort not hampered by the corruption which is endemic here, sometimes at very high levels?

[Answer] Listen, people are trying to blacken our image for a purpose. I am not defending high-ranking officials in the country who let themselves be corrupted. But who taught corruption to the Africans in general, or to Zairians in particular? It was you people! When a contract for 180 million was awarded, who taught my officials to write it out for 200 million and keep 20 for themselves? It was foreigners!

[Question] What concrete measures are you taking?

[Answer] Every month, agency by agency, we are moving ahead with on-the-scene monitoring in the army, in education: there are fictitious schools, deceased teachers who continue to be paid...But we are getting things back in hand. We are literally recovering millions every month!

[Question] The scarcity of foreign exchange obliges importers to resort to expedients, which feed immense fortunes. What do you think about that?

[Answer] I cannot accept it. But to stop it would require better organization. This is why we put $50 million at the disposal of businesses after the June devaluation. And, too, the increased facilities provided by the IMF are going to provide considerable relief to Zaire.

[Question] A rumor has been circulating that a $50,000 surety may be required of every foreigner who wants to work in Zaire. Some have feared that a new disguised form of "Zairianization" is coming.

[Answer] That rumor is false. Officially and absolutely. But remember that, before independence, it was necessary to deposit a surety of 50,000 Belgian francs to do business here. And now it is the Belgians who are the first to get all excited! All the same, we do have the right to prevent people from coming here to get rich off us as if this were the jungle.

[Question] Is that the case?

[Answer] It is the technical advisers who actually contribute something to Zaire. As for the businesses, apart from those who cling to us to amass foreign exchange, which ones are making effective investments? I am being blunt in my words, but that is the reality!

[Question] One of Zaire's biggest development projects involves the Inga 2 dam and the 1,800-km power line that is to supply the mining installations. Will the central government have the means to control Shaba province?

[Question] When there is an attack against Shaba, it is depicted as a reaction against Mobutu and the central government, which is false. People seem to ignore the fact that the MPR--which I founded--has done to bring together the sons and daughters of this country. Pacification and unification are the brightest jewels in the crown of the Second Republic. As for the Inga-Shava line, I decided it on the basis of the amount it would cost to bring electricity from an outside country. But without any hidden designs or political calculations. No, thrice no.

[Question] Could you predict when the economy will achieve recovery?

[Answer] Zaire is emerging proudly from the tunnel: there are unmistakable signs, such as the aid we are being provided by international institutions. I cannot give you a specific date, but I think that within 3 years we will have reached the take-off point again.

LARA SPEAKS AT PARTY ORGANIZATION MEETING

Luanda JOURNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 15 Sep 81 p 2

[Text] The fifth national meeting of coordinators of the organization departments of the party's provincial committees was held on 11 and 12 September in Kuito, capital of Bie Province, under the leadership of Norberto dos Santos, director of the Organization Department of the MPLA-Labor Party's Central Committee.

During the meeting, delegates from all the provinces in the country and representatives of the political and party propaganda department in the defense, security and veterans agencies analyzed the results of the provincial assemblies of cell coordinators, and studied the procedures for assemblies and conferences of the party's grassroots organizations and leadership organs to be held in all sectors of the economy and in the military and security agencies, with party structures.

At the end of their meeting, the participants decided to set up working groups in each cell to prepare a balance sheet on the results of the preparatory activities for the assemblies and conferences in the grassroots organizations.

For cells composed of members coming from different work centers, the report should be based on the place of work where the cell operates. It may, however, contain information on work centers where other members operate.

The participants decided that the evaluation of party members should complement the other evaluation activities which will take place in the cells where conditions are conducive, taking into account the degree of organization and functioning of the party's grassroots organizations. Cells with members of a low cultural level should be assisted by political activists and active groups.

Moreover, the proposals of the party cells on releasing [desvinculacao] members should be considered valid as of 21 September, the date when the basic assemblies are to begin. While these are being held, members should avoid leaving their respective places of work, so that a maximum number of persons may participate in the process.

Candidates for membership in the party's provincial committees should participate in the municipal conferences as delegates, provided they have been appointed as such by the grassroots organizations, and candidates who are not delegates may participate as observers.

As regards defense and security agencies, especially in the armed forces, participants appreciated the instructions on procedures and the party directive on assemblies and conferences.

Lucio Lara Presided Over Closing Ceremony

The closing session of the fifth national meeting of provincial DORGAN [departments of organization] coordinators was chaired by Lucio Lara, a member of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the MPLA-Labor Party and secretary for organization.

The party leader used that opportunity to speak of the importance of the meeting, as it marks the beginning of a new phase in the party's organization, aimed at consolidating its structures within the patterns determined by the First Extraordinary Congress of the MPLA-Labor Party.

After stating that the assemblies and conferences of the grassroots organizations and the party's leadership organs will enable the party to rid itself of bad elements and thereby strengthen itself, Lucio Lara spoke of the need to give greater impetus to the generalized offensive against liberalism and disorganization, which has already spread to other provinces in the country.

Speaking of the difficult situation the country is facing because of the war being waged against us by the South African racists, the party's secretary for organization said that we should not harbor the illusion that it is up to our friends to defend our country. We should be the ones to guarantee our territorial integrity, and to breathe new life into the cells as our beloved comrade President Antonio Agostinho Neto used to say and as is now reflected in the support we should be giving our self-sacrificing youth fighting back the aggression by South Africa, which is becoming desperate as Namibia's independence draws nearer.

This member of the party's Central Committee secretariat, in referring to the frequent lack of support given to the provinces by the central agencies, pointed to the need for the central agencies to rid themselves of their attitude of superiority, which considerably hampers the economic, social and military development of the country. To this end, as he said, we need to eliminate the spirit of bureaucracy in political and ideological work and give greater freedom of initiative to the grassroots organizations so that they can assist the party and the government.

WHO MISSION ASSESSES CONDITIONS IN SOUTH

AB271531 Luanda Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 27 Oct 81

[Text] The special mission of the WHO Regional Committee for Africa which visited Angola from 12 to 25 October issued a statement in Luanda yesterday on the purpose of the visit and the social and health conditions in the disaster areas in the south of the country.

After assessing the situation on the spot, the ministerial mission of the WHO African region strongly condemns the racist South African regime for its unwarranted, inhuman and barbaric destruction of lives and the social and health structures in the region. The WHO special mission is convinced that this destruction has created problems for the Angolan Government in its efforts to ensure the social and health conditions for the populations in the affected areas. It expressed its satisfaction for the efforts of the people and government of Angola to meet the challenge. The WHO special mission calls on the international community to put pressure on racist South Africa to withdraw from the Angolan territory and end its barbaric attacks, thus enabling the Angolan Government to implement its social and health, to fulfill the who's aspirations and to (?receive) paramedical personnel, medicine, hospital equipment [words indistinct].

Apart from the urgent and immediate strengthening of health structures, it called for short and long-term solutions to the social and health situation which might arise as a result of the perpetrated aggression. During its visit to Angola, the special mission of the WHO Regional Committee visited the headquarters of the Huila Province, and the cities of Humpata and Tchibemba, where it interviewed victims of the aggression and held talks with the local military and civil authorities. They also held talks with the Angolan ministers for health and finance with a view to setting up special programs for coordinating relief aid. They also visited Mocamedes, where they saw the efforts of the people and government of Angola to reactivate, recuperate and reconstruct economic and industrial projects destroyed or sabotaged during the national liberation struggle. The WHO special mission was led by the president of the 31st session of the regional committee, Dr Kwamena Ocran, the Ghanaian minister of health. Other members were the vice president of the 31st session of the regional committee, Mr (Talaou Abebe), director of health services in Ethiopia; Dr Carlos (Pirch) Tiny, from Sao-Tome and Principe, who represented the Portuguese-speaking countries of the region and is his country's minister for health and sport; the Zairian delegate, Dr (Nkondi Nicholas), who represented the French-speaking countries; and Ben Kakoma, the Zambia delegate who represented the English-speaking countries in the region and is also his country's minister for health. UNSATISFACTORY CONDITIONS IN ZAIRE PROVINCE REVIEWED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 10 Sep 81 p 3

[Article by David Eduardo: "Wake Up, To Stand Up and Change"]

[Excerpts] The 180,000 people inhabiting Zaire Province are scattered among 6 municipalities--MBanza, Congo, Nzeto, Kuimba, Soyo, Tomboco and Noqui--and 18 communities. The most densely populated municipality is Soyo with about 70,000 inhabitants. This is mainly due to the current oil exploration and to ocean and river resources since in this area the waters of the Zaire come together with the Atlantic. Even though it enjoys abundant national resources, the municipality of Soyo was very late in developing, and unevenly at that. Thus it is still today facing the same problems prevalent throughout Zaire Province.

The main projects flourishing in Zaire Province today are being carried out with foreign cooperation and include opening new arteries in cities and boroughs, paving roads, oil exploration and phosphate mining (Tomboco), the construction of an area in Soyo to take better advantage of the fish resources of the Zaire River, building a soccer stadium (Soyo), and building a new airport in the city of MBanza Congo.

Water and Electricity

Water and electricity together continue to hold back economic development in Zaire Province and to complicate the life of its inhabitants. The cities and boroughs lack green areas where people can rest after a day's work.

The lack of water contributes tremendously to the desolate look of the municipalities and communities, particularly in the dry season. As we observed in our travels along the infamous roads of Zaire, water does in fact exist; what is missing are areas to impound it. The machinery for impounding water is run by electricity and this in turn is provided by fuel-fed generators.

This chain of dependence is the main reason for the critical water-supply situation, this essential element in the life of the people. A solution to this problem has already been found. Three alternatives were suggested as a way to solve the water problem in Zaire Province: the first involve use of electricity from the Republic of Zaire (as is the case with the municipality of Noqui); the second involves use of the gas connected with oil production in Soyo; and the third involves construction of a dam in the Mbridge River.

Of these three projects, the last and most difficult one was chosen. A study of the volume of water in that river which starts in the Canda mountains and discharges into the Nzeto, and construction of the dam and the electric power plant could take from 5 to 10 years.

Until the dam is built, Zaire Province will continue to use fuel-fed generators. But if adequate steps are not taken, given the expansion of the cities--mainly because of the individual construction of housing going on--the water situation could become a tragedy within 10 years.

Other Aspects of Life in Zaire

The partial neglect of Zaire Province, in addition to its economic backwardness, had a considerable behavioral impact on its people. Since it shares a border with the Republic of Zaire, many aspects of life in that country are reflected in the province.

This factor, together with a weak educational system concentrated primarily in Soyo and MBanza Congo where there were second and third level schools, mean that illiteracy and all its harmful consequences are deeply rooted here. The people, restricted within their traditional communities, continue to believe in witchcraft--although the party is trying to combat these practices. There is an exaggerated cult of the dead in which relatives to the fifth degree, neighborhoods and even settlements participate for days at a time, to the detriment of productive work.

Without implying that crime is widespread, we can however say that it is a problem in Zaire Province, precisely because it is a place where different, and sometimes antagonistic, customs are found. Since the province is a center for receiving Angolans located in the neighboring country, with border posts in Noqui, Kuimba, Soyo and MBanza Congo, it is frequently impossible to provide for their political education. Besides, the regional radio station which could play an important role in this regard, not only in spreading counterpropaganda, but also in explaining the true objectives of our revolution, has been shut down since 1978. The available electricity is not sufficient to activate its antennas. In the same way, there are hospitals in MBanza Congo where operations have to be completed using electric batteries!

Many people in fact still like to do "easy work." When we say easy work, we are obviously referring to the illegal traffic in goods, an evil inherited from colonialism. Because it is so easy to converse in Kicongo, Lingala or French, it is quite hard to distinguish an Angolan from a Zairian. There is also the fact that families are separated: the parents are in the Republic of Zaire, but the children are in Angola, or vice-versa.

The traffic, which occurs primarily along the Zaire River, consists of trade in tins of milk, sugar, soap, engines, tires with fittings, sacks of leather, watches, beer (Primus), Congo cloth and shoes, since neither of the currencies is convertible. This situation has in fact been seriously fought, but it still exists. We would like to point out, however, that some networks have already been dismantled. They were found to involve officials who, in total disrespect for the people, were sending sugar to the neighboring country!

Although this illegal traffic cannot in any way be justified, it can be said that it has resulted partly from the poor transportation means serving Zaire Province.

This province cannot take pride in its road network, one of its main handicaps. Its roads provide a serious challenge to the endurance of the vehicles that use them. Moreover, its bridges are not well maintained. In the municipality of Kuimba where roads have become rough trails because of the lack of maintenance, one of its bridges caused an IFA vehicle to plunge into the waters of the Mbridge River. Other aspects of this province will be reported on in a coming issue, as we said earlier.

PRAIA TO HOST DONOR CONFERENCE IN MAY 1982

Praia VOZ DI POVO in Portuguese 23 Sep 81 pp 1, 12

[Excerpts] Cape Verde and the donor countries (industrialized nations and petroleum exporters) will gather for a conference in Praia in May 1982 to study the most viable forms of bilateral and multilateral cooperation.

According to Jose Brito, president of the Commission and State Secretary for Cooperation and Planning, this conference, organized by the UNPD (United Nations Development Program), is the result of decisions taken in Paris and "is different from the usual UN meetings and conferences because here an attempt will be made to establish a control system to watch over the application of Paris decisions." This body is presided over by UNCTAD, which organized the Paris Conference. One of its important decisions is the holding of small conferences among the LDC's [Lesser Developed Countries] and the donor nations. These meetings will allow LDC's, after a study of conditions offered by the donors, to select the financing for their development programs, the systems of payments of foreign debts and food aid.

The less developed countries need substantial aid to achieve development--this was the general consensus of all the UN members represented at the Paris Conference. This shows a predisposition to help change the present situation.

New International Economic Order

"If the spirit of Paris is to prevail until the North-South Conference in Cancun, Mexico, in November, it should be possible to begin a dialog with a view to establishing an international economic order which, in the end, is nothing but a continuation of the conference on LDC's but on a higher level," said the president of the main commission of the Paris Conference. He said that at this moment, "caused by the change in French policy concerning Africa, there is a favorable climate for talks of this kind."

If the results are good, this will be due, without favors of any kind, to the role of Cape Verde at the conference either because of the speech by President Pereira, representative of the 21 poorest nations of Africa, or because of the work developed by our team in guiding the debates which found the necessary means to apply the decisions taken at the plenary sessions.

CIVIL SERVICE, MILITARY PERSONNEL, STUDENTS ABROAD TO BE REDUCED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 20 Sep 81 p 13

[Text] More than 500 employees will be dismissed from the Central African civil service between now and January 1982 as a result of the decree signed by the president of the military committee for national recovery, General of the Army Andre Kolingba, and broadcast by Radio Bangui.

Two criteria were used to select the employees to be terminated: those who have 27 years of active service and who are at least 55 years old.

The Central African minister for civil service, labor and state insurance, Brigadier General Xavier Sylvestre Yangongo, explained Saturday that this measure is intended to make the bureaucracy "more effective and dynamic." "On the one hand," said General Yangongo, "there is a plethora of ineffective officials, and on the other there there are new people to be integrated." "It is essential," he said, "to move ahead with a 'purge' and early retirements."

The minister also said that the civil service will be purged of "questionable, incompetent, dishonest, drunken and undesirable" elements.

A need for austerity was one of the reasons that led General Kolingba to make this decision. In reality, salaries account for two-thirds of the present national budget. To stay within budgetary projections thus required a major effort to reduce the number of salaried government employees.

Military personnel (the army, the constabulary, the presidential guard) have already been affected by this effort. Such personnel number 6,092 in November 1979, but that figure went down to 5,000 by the end of February 1980. Military officials hope to bring it down to 4,000 by the end of 1981.

Also to be reduced are the nubmer of individuals studying abroad, the number of personnel slots in diplomatic missions and those posted to international organizations.

One final ill plaguing the Central African civil service: the diversion of public funds. General Kolingba also intends to attack this problem, in order to insure that the country has the means to bring about real economic and social recovery in the country.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY SEMINAR GROUPING ELEVEN GROUPS

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 29 Sep 81 p 12

[Article: "Evacuation of Ndjamena's Air Base"]

[Excerpts] Ndjamena--Chadian military leaders from the country's 11 "politico-religious" factions have asked the GUNT [Transitional National Union Government] to secure Tripoli's withdrawal from the air base and the "Camp of 27" with the aim of "creating Chadian general staffs and integrated units."

The air base was occupied up until March 1981 by French troops, before serving as the headquarters for the command post of the Libyan forces stationed in Chad since the end of 1980.

During the conference the participants also adopted various resolutions which will be submitted to the Chadian Government, requesting the centralization of Libyan military provisioning assistance "for more rational and effective distribution."

They also asked that plans for the defense of the country's sensitive points be drawn up and that general staff headquarters be established in zones where the allied (Libyan) troops are stationed.

During their conference, in which the commander of the Libyan troops participated, the Chadian military men recommended that the general staff of each previously existing faction send a team of 300 men to create a unit for the defense of the border with Sudan.

For the moment, the troops loyal to Mr Acyl Ahmat, the minister of foreign affairs, who is known for his pro-Libyan views, are the only troops on that border.

Finally, the military officials called for the creation of a national constabulary.

In the concluding session of the conference, Mr Adoum Togoi, the Chadian defense minister, asked all Chadian forces "henceforth to submit only to the authority of the state."

"All our troubles have resulted from the multitude of factions each making decisions on its own," he said.

DELEGATION TO FRANCE NOTES DESIRE FOR FOREIGN PARTNERS

Niamey LE SAHEL in French 26-27 Sep 81 p 5

/Article by AFP/

/Text/ A delegation from the Peoples Republic of Congo led by the minister of planning, Mr Pierre Moussa, presented a copy Thursday of the 1982-1986 Congolese development plan to the National Council of French Employers (CNPF).

A CNPF communique published yesterday says that the plan is based on exploiting the country's agricultural resources, especially through the creation of agricultural villages and forest complexes in the northern part of the Congo. Because of the major public works involved, it adds, the industrial sector will be tied to agricultural development.

According to the communique, Mr Moussa estimated that the driving force for growth will be the construction materials sector. The Congolese minister noted his country's willingness to see foreign partners, particularly France, participate in the economic development effort and in this connection underlined the possibilities for private sector involvement.

France primarily exports iron, cast iron, steel, mechanical and electronic devices, vehicles and pharmaceutical products to the Congo. The leading imports are wood and coffee. On the other hand, while Congolese oil production, which has already reached the 4 million ton level, will be 10 million tons within a few years, France at this time imports almost none of it.

BRIEFS

BONGO'S VISIT--The official visit of the head of state to Luxembourg is practically over, because a few hours ago, that is at 1700 precisely, the president of the government of Luxembourg, Mr Werner, officially said farewell to President Bongo. Earlier this afternoon, the head of state gave a press conference at the (Olivetti) hotel. During the press conference, he expressed very great satisfaction with his stay in Luxembourg and said he received the necessary understanding from officials and businessmen in Luxembourg. The head of state began the day with a visit to the European Investment Bank, which is a banking institution of the EEC. It should be noted that the European Investment Bank has participated in financing several development projects in Gabon. The head of state held useful discussions with Yves (Lecotte) who is the chairman of this bank as well as with members of the management committee and the bank's officials in charge of operations in the African, Caribbean and pacific countries which are signatories of the Lome convention. This working session also enabled them to review the financial aid which the bank has provided for investments in Gabon since 1968 and which amounts to more than 10 billion CFA francs. The talks then discussed continuing this financial cooperation within the framework of the second Lome convention, under which the bank last July loaned 4 billion CFA francs for the expansion of the [word indistinct] and 2.1 billion CFA francs for (Koubara). The head of state then went to the chamber of commerce where he was welcomed by the president of the chamber. After this visit, cooperation between the two countries will, of course, be strengthened because, first, President Bongo announced during the press conference that a delegation of Luxembourg businessmen will go to Gabon in the next few days to see things for themselves; and second, Luxembourg's participation is expected in the trans-Gabon railroad project. The agreement for this project was signed in 1976 and will now be reactivated. [Text] [AB281438 Libreville Domestic Service in French 1830 GMT 28 Oct 81]

PAIGC WILL REMAIN DESPITE FAILURE OF UNITY PROJECT

Bissau NO PINTCHA in Portuguese 19 Sep 81 p 8

[Text] The discussion of the theses for the PAIGC First Extraordinary Congress with the grassroots members, cadres and our people began on 12 September. The party places at everyone's disposal five theses covering a certain number of questions concerning the country's political situation. In them, the party is defined as a living dynamic organism reduced to the territorial borders of the Republic of Guinea-Bissau. "The party seeks again its path basing the analysis on its previous political practice...," says the introduction. It is in the context of this search for a path that we shall make our modest contribution. In the first thesis--the one that we can consider, taking into account the latest events, the most interesting one, the most controversial and the most positive--is the key question which will use up much ink and many commentaries. "We are and shall continue to be the PAIGC." This presents to the members the question of whether their party, reduced to national characteristics, will or will not keep the same name. The authors of these theses advance certain considerations in which they base proposals for the continuation of the name which for 25 years represented the party that led the people of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde to national independence and created the respective states.

In truth, the fact that the PAIGC was founded in Guinea-Bissau and was the sole organization to truly struggle for the political independence of the peoples of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde, allied to the massive support of the masses, indispensable for the execution of such a feat, in itself would be sufficient basis for continuity of the party. However, if we also take into account the facts that the armed struggle took place on Guinea-Bissau territory, with its heroes, martyrs and crippled in fulfillment of the PAIGC ideals, and that the larger portion of the party program is valid and has undeniable prestige on an international level, there will hardly be an alternative for the masses of members. In spite of all this, the question continues to be asked: Why retain the "C"?

We would like to ask another question: Why remove the "C"?

Why amputate from the party one of the factors that has characterized it in the history of the African liberation movements? National liberation of Guinea and Cape Verde was achieved by the respective peoples under PAIGC guidance. No other organization can claim this.

We believe that it is too soon to forget the national liberation struggle. Regardless of how much we try to understand the "new nationalists," the presence of our war cripples and the commitments assumed with the anonymous masses of the motherland freedom fighters do not allow us to do so. Therefore, for us, the continuity of the party is not just a simple attachment to history. It is a current problem, a political problem. The keeping of the name just as it is does not imply in any way an attachment to the principle of unity of Guinea-Cape Verde. This was one of the objectives in which the party failed, by not achieving its practical implementation. Therefore, the principle of unity of Guinea-Cape Verde is now history, regardless of how well intentioned its conception by Cabral.

The party, as was proposed in the theses, simply and only expresses the national situation of Guinea-Bissau and does not have any linkage with the people of Cape Verde.

Here also the party will no longer claim any rights over the state of Cape Verde. We have struggled side by side with the nationalists of Cape Verde and founded the two states which from now on will decide their destiny without any interference from each other. For us, the authors of the draft of the theses, the PAIGC must be maintained, renewed and adapted to new circumstances. The project of the motherland freedom fighters is valid and we believe that it can only be applied by using the same political instrument used during the harsh years of national liberation armed struggle.

As we said at the beginning of this piece, this is our contribution. Now it is the turn of the members and the people in general.

ABUSES OF POWER BY DEFENSE, SECURITY FORCES DENOUNCED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 19 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] Mariano Matsinha, minister of interior residing in Sofala, said that "the infiltrators who commit acts of indiscipline, threaten honest workers, attack women and frighten children have no right to use a uniform." He was addressing the Beira and provincial officials participating in the meeting that ended yesterday, whose objective was to analyze the principal socio-economic problems affecting this city.

From the various issues that were discussed during this meeting, it appears that abuses of power by members of the defense and security forces in their dealings with the people are quite serious and only serve to discredit the government and FRELIMO orientations.

The supply system was also the subject of numerous speeches. Some solutions were proposed to solve this problem that so heavily burdens the city.

The fact that Beira does not offer any kind of entertainment was also discussed, as was the issue of police elements conducting "undercover" operations at the exit of dance halls and other entertainment centers, something that has been creating fear and concern among the people.

The poor condition of the green areas has also been one of the problems affecting the availability of basic foodstuffs in the city, which is living off the production of other provinces or from imported products, among which is fish.

This fact is indeed inconceivable and incongruous, given Beira's privileged location right on the ocean.

In a speech at the closing session, Minister Mariano Matsinha affirmed that the political, social and organizational conditions conducive to success in the implementation of the tasks needed at this time of development must be created in accordance with the goals of this decade.

On the study carried out on the main problems affecting the city of Beira, the minister resident noted that the central question is the exercise of power, the connection between the top structures and the base and the relationship with the people.

"We have not been able to discuss, to conduct a dialogue by taking advantage of the people's creative spirit. We have removed ourselves from the people and we always have justifications for what we have done poorly and for what we have not done," Mariano Matsinha stated.

Referring to the abuses of power, arbitrary acts and aggressions committed against the people, the highest official in Sofala stressed:

"Infiltrators who commit acts of indiscipline, who threaten honest workers, attack women and frighten children have no right to use a uniform, they cannot belong to the defense and security forces."

Meanwhile, a number of measures were adopted to solve the principal problems affecting Beira, among them the revitalization of the political and organizational offensive, the establishment of the city's green areas cabinet, the improved functioning of the people's provincial tribunal and the organization of permanent produce markets. Other important measures will be disclosed in the course of the popular meeting that will soon take place.

MEETING ANALYZES PROBLEMS AFFECTING CITY OF BEIRA

Beira DIARIO DE MOZAMBIQUE in Portuguese 16 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] Officials from party and government structures and from the mass democratic organizations at the provincial and the city of Beira levels began yesterday morning a joint meeting aimed exclusively at discussing the principal political, social and economic problems of the city of Beira. The meeting will deal with issues related to the operation of the executive council, to supply, transportation, communal districts, security, urbanization, leisure time, green areas and protection of beaches, among other things.

The meeting is being presided over by Mariano Matsinhe, member of the permanent political committee of the FRELIMO Central Committee and minister-resident of the province of Sofala. A speech made by this official at the opening session pointed out all the problems affecting the political and socio-economic development of Beira, the second-largest urban center in the country. "We have difficulties of which everyone is aware. We lack technical and financial resources. We also need a lot more experience in certain issues. We need cadres who will be able to face many situations," Mariano Matsinhe stated.

A total of 152 participants are present at this meeting that will last two days. Addressing them, Minister Mariano Matsinhe stressed:

"One way or another, we all feel the difficulties of various types, like the residents of the city do:

"Supplies reaching the city are insufficient. Transportation is not functioning satisfactorily. Entertainment is lacking. Green areas are not producing. People are worried about crime. The city is still ugly. Abuses of power are frequent. The sea is destroying the beaches and threatening residential areas. Public health is in bad shape. Speculation is uncontrollable.

"We could enumerate other situations, all different and some more serious than others, but all affecting the life of the people, all interfering with production and creating problems."

Mariano Matsinhe then stressed the need for a more in-depth study and analysis of all these problems. Following the opening session, the minister-resident of Sofala asked the president of the executive council of Beira to present a report on the activities of this organism reviewing exhaustively the principal problems of this city and proposing a number of solutions for them.

DIFFICULTIES ESTABLISHING AGRICULTURAL COOPERATIVES

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 8 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Antonio Souto]

[Text] Paternalism and demagogy were identified yesterday as the principal enemies of the progress of the cooperative movement. The criticism was made by several deputies and guests at the 8th session of the People's Assembly, who took part yesterday in the discussions conducted by the first working group. In yesterday's session, this group and a second group analyzed the experiences in rural collectivization in these first years of independence and also discussed the cooperative program for the decade.

"In the beginning, many people joined cooperatives. They were promised tractors and other things. But they did not recieve them. There were failures, and so some people went back to their family farms, where they felt they got back better results. We urged them to stay. We managed to get some of them to come back, but not all of them. We stayed simply because we are the directors, but we ourselves are having problems."

The speaker was Deputy Megonda, a veteran of the first days of the war of liberation and a resident of the liberated area of M'Sawize, in Niassa. His words reflect the spirit which dominated the discussions in the working group, the spirit of criticism, frankness and desire to being about change in this decade.

Agriculture and Planning Minister Mario Machungo made the opening address at the proceedings, which were chaired by Marcelino dos Santos, secretary of the Permanent ommission of the People's Assembly. Machungo stressed the complexity and strategic nature of rural collectivization.

The agriculture minister defined the relationship between the three major social sectors involved in the collectivization process.

At this time, the state units take up about 4 percent of all the farmed area and contribute about 15 percent of total production. The cooperatives represent about 1 percent of this area and are responsible for 0.3 percent of agricultural production overall. Finally, the family sector represents about 94 percent of the total area under cultivation and accounts for about 80 percent of the gross agricultural product.

"Agricultural production in the country is still very primitive and limited. The cooperative sector is very new, and still quite disorganized," said the minister of planning.

The party and government leader added that the cooperative sector showed poor results in these first years largely because the "officials in charge of mobilization for the cooperatives made countless mistakes."

Marcelino dos Santos explained the need to insure the process of rural collectivization. "We cannot continue to rely on the family sector, because it does not produce enough to insure our progress and it does not contribute to the revolutionary process. We must follow a particular path, therefore, not just any path. We must consolidate and expand the formation of cooperatives and state farms.

"We must look at another aspect," the secretary of the Permanent Commission added. "The demands of the revolution are great. The people want a better life, more food, more clothing, better housing. With independence, they feel these things are attainable. Thus, inevitably, we set out on the path of economic growth, but the revolution cannot succeed without rural collectivization. [Otherwise] some peasnats will prosper and become the bosses and others will continue to be exploited."

Regarding the cooperative movement, the various speakers focused mainly on the question of means of production, organization, state support, planning and the relationship of the cooperative to the state production units.

It was said that the introduction of new technology in the cooperatives should always answer a real need in improving production and should not simply come as a paternalistic handout.

Pointing out the demagogy that has characterized some meaningless support to the cooperatives, one of the deputies said: "Machinery is not being seen as a means to widen and expand production, but as a tool for mobilization."

The development of communal villages in conjunction with the creation of cooperatives was also critically examined by many of the speakers. The criticism centered on the lack of a socialist economic base in many of these settlements.

"I don't understand how it is that people libing in a communal village are not linked to its economic base, when there is such a base. It is even less acceptable when the directors of the communal village themselves have nothing to do with forms of socialist production and do not belong to the cooperative," said another deputy.

Summarizing the analysis of the rural collectivization experience, the minister of planning noted that this "critical evaluation has made it possible to reinforce the political principle that the future of rural Mozambique is in cooperatives, state agricultural enterprises and communal villages.

"We have always failed when we have acted for the people, when we have been paternalistic, when we have not maintained a dialogue. Working with the people means more than talking to the people...sometimes, when the people ask questions, we are unwilling to listen," Mario Machungo added.

RURAL SOCIALIZATION SEEN ALLEVIATING EXODUS PROBLEM

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 8 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Mariano Adamo]

[Text] Rural socialization is an important task to be accomplished in this decade to insure our economic and social development. It is the best way to prevent the continuation of the rural exodus and will make it possible to create a labor force to insure implementation of priority development programs such as the cooperative movement.

This was the key note of the speeches in one of the working groups of the eighth sessionof the People's Assembly. In this group, the deputies concentrated on one of the three pivotal aspects of the Long-Range Plan for Cadre Training and the Labor Force.

Throughout yesterday this working group made an intensive study of urban and rural growth, notably the current phenomenon of the exodus of significant numbers of people from the country to the city.

The deputies referred to some of the reasons for this situation, and also pointed to solutions to the problem.

"Creastion of conditions so that people will remain in the country through socialization will not only resolve the problem of the rural areas but will also solve most of the urban problems created when these individuals come in from the country and cannot find a living in the city," said one of the deputies.

Most of the people who are now abandoning the country for the city are young people. In the case of older people, it is because their closest relatives send for them because they think life is easier in the city than in the country.

The deputies noted that the main reason for the rural exodus is the idea that rural labor does not have the status of a job in a factory or an office.

There is also the idea that the only work in the countryside is farm work. Thus, for example, when a young person reaches a certain level of education, he feels he should no longer be a peasant, so he abandons his native area and sets off to find what he thinks will be an easy life in the city.

As the deputies noted, however, the basic problem is that most of the rural population is still scattered, which hampers any initiatives to organize employment offices.

The fact that all the social and entertainment facilities are concentrated in the cities has also contributed greatly to the frustration of the rural population. Hence the Long-Range Indicative Plan calls for greater concentration of development efforts in the country than in the city.

Positive Reaction to Socialization

The people have already demonstrated their awareness of the recommended development strategy of rural socialization as the ideal means to achieve their objectives. An indication of this was their response when , soon after independence, the command went out to create communal villages and producer cooperatives.

Because the communal villages and cooperatives were not directed correctly, however, the peasants were unable to see the advantages of these modes of life, and this discouraged them.

"We have not yet managed to make the people living in the communal villages or involved in cooperatives see the value of collective life. On one hand, the price they are paid for their products is not consistent with the effort they have put into production. Moreover, the essential products which they seek to acquire in exchange are not only scarce but high-priced," one of the deputies said, explaining why the peasants feel their daily activity offers little reward.

It was also noted that when the young residents of rural areas are given a specific task, they carry it out. The example was given of their ready response to the literacy campaign.

However, because these young peopel are not given support and hence cannot satisfy their material needs, they feel frustrated. In the opinion of the deputies, this also leads them to think life is better in the city.

In the specific case of Mozambique, the population flow to the cities for various reasons has produced a high rate of unemployment, particularly in the city of Maputo.

SWEDEN PROVIDES ASSISTANCE IN DAIRY PRODUCTION

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 9 Oct 81 p 3

[Excerpts] Major support is being developed for the nation's livestock sector with the introduction of new methods to improve maintenance of the herd. Under the direction of ALFA-LAVAL, a specialized Swedish firm, the activities are concentrated on the care of calves and milk cows. Some improvement in daily milk production figures has already been recorded.

"Our company is interested in providing the necessary assistance within our field, because we can see that Mozambique has great dairy farming potential which, if suitably developed, could make it possible to reduce imports in this area and to export some products," ALFA-LAVAL representative Jaan Tear said.

The Swedish firm has already provided some assistance to livestock farming in our country, but this is the first time it will play a major part in the industrialization of some principal dairy products.

This participation includes training of Mozambican personnel and technical assistance in using the equipment to be installed in dairy units.

The ALFA-LAVAL representative said discussions are also in progress with Mozambican authorities regarding implementation of a technical support program in the livestock sector, including the industrial branch.

Regarding the care of calves, the Swedish firm has used a new technology which greatly reduces mortality. Success in preventing mortality in young animals depends greatly on the extent to which the livestock units have compiled with the standards the Swedish firm is introducing in the sector.

Regarding personnel training, ALFA-LAVAL trained 11 workers last year at the Namaacha School. Courses 3 to 4 months long are now being conducted for 20 to 25 students, training an average of 50 workers per year.

According to the firm's representative in Southern Africa, the ALFA-LAVAL program also provides for study grants for some Mozambican livestock workers.

VISITING FINNISH DELEGATION PLEDGES COOPERATION

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 1 Oct 81 p 3

> [Text] "We have no investments in South Africa," Esko Rekola said yesterday in Maputo, adding that his country is interested in cooperating with the Front Line States. Mr Rekola is the Finnish minister of foreign trade.

Finland is interested in cooperating with Mozambique in five areas: agriculture and stock raising, development of a fertilizer industry, raising the productivity of the sugar industry and in the production of furniture, wood and paper.

These facts were revealed yesterday afternoon when Esko Rekola, the Finnish minister of foreign trade, spoke with journalists after two days of conversations with Mozambical authorities.

Cooperation in those five areas could be accomplished by sending consultants, training and equipment, said Mauri Aggaert, director of the department for the development of international cooperation of the Finnish Trade Ministry.

Esko Rekola arrived in Maputo on Monday at the head of a 23-member delegation which includes representatives of 20 Finnish companies. During his stay he met with Salomao Munguambe, Mozambican minister of foreign trade; Antonio Branco, minister of industry and energy; and Alcantara Santos, minister of ports and land transport. The conversations covered agriculture and forests, industry, energy and mines and transports and finance.

Finland is a neutral country which is interested in cooperating with Mozambique and the other Front Line States, the Finnish minister declared. He added that his country has no investments in South Africa. Esko Rekola further stated that Finland gives humanitarian support to the African National Congress in South Africa and to SWAPO in Namibia.

Finland promised $6 million at the Coordination Conference for The Development of Southern Africa [SADCC] in November of last year. The minister declared that two projects of the SADCC in Mozambique were being studied for the purpose of granting Finnish financing. This is a question of projects to improve the Port of Nacala and to install new lighting systems in the airports of Maputo and Beira.

Finland does not have bilateral cooperation ties with Mozambique, but it has contributed to projects jointly financed by the Nordic countries. The latest of these contributions was of $1 million destined to a joint Scandinavian project for exploiting coal.

AFRICAN LUSOPHONE CHURCHES CONFERENCE HELD IN MAPUTO

Final Resolution

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Sep 81 p 1

> [Excerpt] The participants in the second conference of the churches of Mozambique, Angola, Cape Verde and Sao Tome and Principe have condemned the South African invasion of the People's Republic of Angola and have demanded the immediate withdrawal of the invading troops from that country.

In a resolution divulged yesterday in the precincts of the meeting which has been taking place since 17 September in Maputo, the participants demand both that an inquiry be made through the Organization of African Unity and the United Nations into the damage caused to southern Angola and the consequent indemnity by the racist regime of Pretoria to that brother country.

"We appeal to the international community to take the necessary measures to prohibit South Africa from repeating actions of this kind against neighboring countries," the resolution states.

The document from the second conference of the churches of the African countries that use Portuguese as their official language also refers to the inhuman situation to which the South African people are subjected by the racist minority South African regime, condemning the "apartheid" policy and repeating their urgent demand for the abolition of that criminal system. "We call upon the churches, and on state and private enterprise, upon all the states of the world to liquidate their investments in South Africa."

The second conference of churches raised several social, economic and cultural questions, focusing their attention on the theme of "the church in society." Thus one of the principal points for debate was the role which the church perform in the new society being built in the four young countries.

Christianity and Marxism, the prospects of an African theology and even the question of health and agriculture in Mozambique, Angola, Cape Verde and Sao Tome and Principe were also topics for reflection for the participants in the meeting.

Headed by Isac David Mahlalela, the Secretary General of the Christian Council of Mozambique, the meeting enjoyed the participation of representatives of the World

Council of Churches, the All-African Conference of Churches and the Christian Conference for Peace.

In their closing sessions yesterday, the participants sent messages to the chiefs of state of the countries represented there, in which they pledged their active participation in the building of the new society for the prosperity and development of nations.

In the meantime, in an interview granted yesterday to NOTICIAS, Reverend David Mahlalela declared that the second conference was able to achieve its objective, particularly as far as the participation of the church in the tasks of national reconstruction was concerned.

"On the same level as the strengthening of church unity, at this meeting we were able to study in depth the role of the church in the new society. The church is a part of society and is in society. It is important that all believers always keep this reality alive and that they understand the need to participate like all other citizens in the tasks of national reconstruction in all our countries." Reverend David Mahlalela declared.

Two Church Leaders Interviewed

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Sep 81 p 3

[Article by Bernardo Mavanga: "Churches Must Participate in National Reconstruction"]

[Excerpts] The need for the church's active participation in the tasks of national reconstruction was one of the principal points taken up by the secretary general of the Christian Council of Mozambique and by the representative of the United Methodist Church in Angola, respectively Isac David Mahlalela and Emilio de Carvalho, when they granted an interview to NOTICIAS yesterday. The churchmen spoke on the occasion of the second conference of the churches of Mozambique, Angola, Cape Verde and Sao Tome and Principe which ended yesterday in Maputo.

The international meeting of the churches was opened on 17 September with the theme of "the church in society" and it was devoted to the role of the church in the new society. It raised several humanitarian questions, seeking uniform means which will allow for an effective contribution by the church in the struggle to eliminate the people's misery in the four young countries.

As he spoke to NOTICIAS, the Reverend Isac David Mahlalela emphasized that the objectives of the meeting had been achieved, particularly "because we delved into the topic already taken up in the first conference on the necessity of all our churches to make Christians understand that even more than Christians we are members of a society, we are citizens."

"We are an integral part of society," Isac David Mahlalela added, "and as such we must participate in the tasks of society. This is not a question of a point of departure, since we have already accomplished several activities, both in the cultural and in the economic field in support of our brothers and in support of national reconstruction. However, we want these actions to increase and for all of us to understand that the church and society are not indifferent to each other."

The Reverend Bishop Emilio de Carvalho remarked on this point that at the same rate as society advances the church continues to understand the reality of society. He explained that the transformations which are being carried out in the four young countries, after the liquidation of Portuguese colonialism, also brought to the church the need to acquire a new appearance which will correspond to the social evolution of the peoples of these countries.

"It is the revolutionary transformations which are taking place in our countries which have made the Maputo meeting more profitable. We have acted on specific questions, unlike what happened in 1979 at the Luanda conference, where we did not even know one another," declared Bishop Emilio de Carvalho.

The representative of the United Methodist Church in Angola referred later to the fact that the churches of these countries existed until a short time ago within a capitalist system to which they were conditioned both socially and economically. According to him, the revolutionary process in Angola and Mozambique in particular demands that the churches today exist within their own context.

"Our churches are realizing new existence within the revolutionary system, they are acquiring a new dynamism, a new attitude for relating to the process. One of the aspects taken up at this conference which deserved particular attention from the participants was with respect to the present situation in southern Africa. We declare our solidarity with the struggle of the oppressed South African people," Bishop Emilio de Carvalho declared.

The conference of the churches, as the churchmen declared, also demanded the liberation of the leader Nelson Mandela and of other combatants imprisoned because of their identification with the cause of liberty and they called upon all the Christian communities in the world to actively support the struggle of the oppressed peoples.

HOTELS RESERVED FOR RESIDENTS, CLOSED TO PUBLIC

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 25 Sep 81 p 3

[Text] The Tivoli Hotel and the Turismo Hotel, in Maputo, are closed to the public, their services being limited exclusively to the use of residents. A note distributed by the CIT [Center for Information and Tourism] ascribes the adoption of this measure to the "lack of discipline" which has been observed in those two hotels.

The note sent by the CIT to those two hotels says that public access, "in addition to inconveniencing the residents, also caused over-utilization of the facilities and a bad atmosphere and permits the exploitation of the residents."

In a conversation with Mario Trindade, the director of the CIT, we learned that the lack of discipline referred to above is a question of noise, drinking, prostitution and other problems which affect the security of the residents themselves..." and the hotels are completely full of cooperants!"--he added.

He also said that in addition to that the CIT was aware of the illegal monetary transactions taking place in the above-mentioned establishments, which it considers a rather delicate problem. Concerning the over-utilization of hotel facilities, Mario Trindade told us that the facilities were designed for a certain number of persons. The indiscriminate admission policy has caused the hotels to be always full of people. The residents have complained because this is not what they want and they don't know where to go because the facilities are always full of people--he declared.

"In my opinion, a hotel is a hotel, it is for the residents and their guests. It is not for the public"--that official declared, and immediately added "all the hotels have the possibility of maintaining rooms for domestic service as well as for outside service, that is, for the public and the residents."

The managers of those hotels, when they were contacted, gave their opinions on the subject.

Mr Amadeu, manager of the Turismo Hotel, began by saying: "The director of the CIT telephoned last Monday to ask what my idea was on the matter. I replied that I thought it was better to have a meeting to study the benefits of the measure. After that proposal for a meeting, we received the communique on Tuesday. They are orders and they must be obeyed."

In his opinion he believes that to make this measure effective it is necessary to raise the prices for residents or to do something to maintain the earlier receipts.

Asked about possible cases of lack of discipline which have been observed in his hotel Mr Amadeu declared that cases of attempted assault had occurred and cases of burglary of residents' rooms which were stopped by hotel militiamen.

There were also cases of ladies going to the hotel looking for lovers among the residents. "The militiamen even found women from outside in residents' rooms," he said.

The militiamen of the Hotel Turismo, according to the manager, are workers in the same hotel working in several sectors of the hotel in coordination with the First Police Squadron.

In his turn, Gil Mabote, a man connected with the management of the Tivoli Hotel, limited himself to saying that he did not know the reasons for the prohibition and that a diminution in the receipts of the hotel had been observed since the measure went into effect.

BULGARIAN DONATION--A donation that includes records, magnetic tapes, books and a film was made yesterday by Bulgaria to the Mozambican Association for Friendship and Solidarity (AMASP). It was handed over by the Bulgarian charge d'affaires in Maputo, Mitodi Dinkov. In a brief speech, Mitodi Dinkov said that "we have made this small donation to express our gratitude for the extraordinary and brilliant way in which the FRELIMO and the democratic mass organizations organized the celebrations related to the 1,300th anniversary of the Bulgarian state in Mozambique." In his reply, the secretary general of the AMASP affirmed that he was receiving the donation with pleasure, since it came from a brotherly country. He added that "we hope that contacts such as these will not lose any of their strength, since they originated in the armed struggle." Our country was represented in the celebration of that anniversary by Mario Machungo, member of the permanent political committee. [Excerpt] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 21 Oct 81 p 8]

FISH SHORTAGE--The people's concern in acquiring foodstuffs enlivens every day the central market. But there was no fish yesterday. There were tomatoes, but no potatoes or onions. There was cabbage and lettuce, but only the very lucky got kale. It is no use even looking for fish and shrimp. The tables that were once intended for the sale of seafood have been empty for quite a few months. It is not known what has happened to the well-known market women who used to sell fish. They may have lost their jobs. There are some who say that whenever these women received any fish, they sell it on the outside, where there is no price control. Since prices are rigorously controlled within the market, it is always better to transact business elsewhere. The GOAM [?department in charge of supplies] has become aware of this situation and has decided to suspend deliveries of fish to certain sectors, while the best method to straighten out the situation is being studied at the moment. Dried fish was available yesterday. A lot of people purchased it, even while complaining about what they thought was a very high price. Potatoes are another product that rarely appears. The central market had practically nothing to sell yesterday. The baskets gradually leaving the market were all empty. [Text] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 2 Oct 81 p 2]

PORTUGUESE METEOROLOGICAL COOPERATION--Various programs of scientific cooperation in the field of meteorology have been implemented between the Mozambique Meteorological Service and the National Institute of Meteorology and Geophysics of Portugal. This cooperation is taking place in a spirit of friendship and mutual assistance. The director general and the deputy director of this institute, Professor Luis Mendes Victor and Dr Fernando Pastor respectively, are now in our country. Professional training is one of the sectors of this cooperation. The Portuguese institute is training without charge three Mozambican technicians, two of whom are suppose to return to Mozambique in March 1982 after a 3-year period of training in Portugal. These technicians are being trained in agro-meteorology and weather forecasting. The third one is attending a 3-year course on seismology. Cooperation between the two scientific institutions has led to a number of meetings on the earth's magnetic field, on seismology and on solar radiation. This project is aimed at turning the Zalala beach area, one of the most beautiful in Mozambique, self-sufficient and able to offer tourist facilities. I am one of the 1,000 young Mozambicans on this continent; we all write and our families have not received our letters for 5 months. Is it possible that the plane transporting the mail has not yet landed in Mozambique? Or are the letters left to "rot" in the warehouses of our mail service? THREE LEVEL SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT OPPOSED

[Article by Jonathan Sam: "The Ethnic System Will Not Work"]

[Text] During a meeting of the Namibia Educational Forum last night Attorney Brian O'Linn stated that it is one thing to recognize ethnicity, but it is another to make that the basis of a system which does not work.

O'Linn was taking part in a heated debate which followed a lecture about Proclamation AG-8 presented by Fred Visagie, the director of the Central Personnel Institution.

Visagie's discussion of the advantages of AG-8, which provides for the installation of a system of representative authorities for the various ethnic groups, prompted most of the reaction.

Dr Kenneth Abrahams shared O'Linn's views saying that he fails to find anything which could be of such great importance, within a population group, as to render a political system built upon such a group as an absolute necessity. According to him the needs of the community are not divergent enough to justify a three-level government.

He said: "To give an example, there are no essential differences in the health needs of the various groups."

In discussing AG-8 Visagie said that the present system of government in the South-West is not one of homelands, but rather that of "group governments" which is peculiar to the South-West.

"The advantages of group governments, in contrast with district governments, is that it gives power to the representative authorities to provide services to members of its population group, even though such groups may be located in any part of the country." According to him this also has the advantage of providing solutions for problems which are peculiar to the group and could be of a sensitive nature; such problems to be resolved by the representative authority of that group without interference from outside and in accordance with the customs and traditions of the group in question.

He also stated that the system of group-governments is the natural alternative for regional governments because the policy of "homelands" has been rejected by the majority of the inhabitants of the South-West.

"The people of the country decided on the system, but it is not being forced upon those groups who do not wish to accept it. The system provides that people may reside wherever they wish and still be served by their representative authorities, whereas this will not be the case under a system of district government." So stated Visagie.

Although he said that members of the various representative authorities must act responsibly in claiming second level governmental functions, he recognized the situation where certain authorities are now in difficulty due to the fact that they have allotted funds, intended for drought aid, in an irresponsible manner. He said: "But, multimately it is up to the voters to determine whether their representatives are sufficiently qualified to govern."

Attorney O'Linn expressed the opinion that the system will lead to general chaos and continuous confusion, because it is based on racial elements.

Visagie, too, recognized the fact that it could be difficult for this system to work in many respects.

FAILURE TO FUSE TWO PARTIES ENCOURAGES COLORED LABORITES

Windhoek DIE SUIDWESTER in Afrikaans 21 Sep 81 pp 1, 3

[Article by Jonathan Sam: "Point of Technicality Prevents Two Party Fusion"]

[Text] A "technical consideration" prevented the dissolution of the Liberal Party of Mr A. J. F. Kloppers this weekend for the purpose of fusing it with the new Democratic People's Party founded this week by the supporters of Joey Julius, a member of the Ministerial Council.

Julius, who was suspended as leader of the Labor Party 3 months ago, was elected as the leader of the new party.

Julius told DIE SUIDWESTER that there is, however, a written agreement which binds the two parties to collaborate for all times.

Reportedly, legal advice had been obtained with respect to the two parties' fusion. According to this advice the Liberal Party would have had no right to appoint a member in the event of a vacancy in the Legislative Assembly, because the new party, of which Kloppers and his party would have become a part, had not participated in the elections of 1980. This would have given the Labor Party the opportunity of appointing an uncontroversial candidate in the event of a vacancy such as now exists in the Legislative Assembly following the resignation of Mr J. Bok, the former chairman of the Legislative Assembly.

Following its foundation the Democratic Peoples Party also addressed a strong plea to the administrator general to call for a general election among the coloreds for the purpose of filling in the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr Bok. According to Mr Julius this election would be used as a test "to show that the majority of the coloreds reject the ruling Labor Party of Barney Barnes. He also said that if such a by-election were to be allowed, as stipulated by Proclamation AG-8, the Liberal Party would not appoint a candidate but would throw their weight behind the Democratic Peoples Party for the purpose of opposing the Laborites.

According to Mr Julius the Democratic Peoples Party - Liberal Party combination would gain more than 90 percent of the votes in a by-election.

While excitement and expectancy prevails among the coloreds over the founding of the new party, the leader of the Labor Party, Barney Barnes, labeled the party's foundation as "another political abortion."

This morning Barnes said that founding the new party was an artificial political effort which has failed because the people failed to respond to it. Moreover, he felt that the failure to name the party as the Workers Liberation Party is an indication that they cannot achieve a breakthrough with the name of "workers" because the colored community stands in close ranks behind the Labor Party.

Barnes went on to say: "The fact that Mr Kloppers does not wish to dissolve his party is a clear indication that he has seen the danger signs clearly."

He wished "a speedy demise" to the new party, because that is going to happen anyway.

SWAPO VICTORY UNLIKELY DUE TO INSUFFICIENT LOCAL SUPPORT

Windhoek REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 24 Sep 81 p 4

[Article by Nel Marais of the Political Science Department, University of Pretoria: "SWAPO Will Have No Easy Victory"]

[Text] As already pointed out by Mao Tse-Tung, insurgents must try to obtain the support of the population, because it is through this that they can obtain food, a hiding place and information...the three things which are absolutely necessary for the insurgents' ability to survive.

So, against this background, what is the situation in South-West Africa? First of all the war in South-West Africa is limited mainly to the northern border area. Consequently SWAPO does not have the opportunity of making contact with the entire population. Efforts at intimidating the population by armed action and propaganda consequently have an influence on only a portion of the population. SWAPO seldom succeeds in penetrating very far south into South-West Africa and the small groups that do come into South-West Africa are soon caught or killed. Thus SWAPO cannot play a "positive" role in South-West Africa. It is not in any position to provide services to the population; neither can it make any claims of exercising any administrative and governing functions in South-West Africa.

As far as the people of the South-West are concerned SWAPO's role is therefore limited to that of a revolutionary insurgent. Moreover, SWAPO realizes that it will be able to obtain "support" from the population through violence and intimidation. This appears clear from the fact that SWAPO is in no way limiting its attacks to military or economic targets, but often attacks the black civilian population, perpetrating murders.

On the other hand the security forces have the opportunity of playing a very positive role. Naturally their most important function is and continues to be the protection of the population against terroristic actions, but there are many other tasks which they can perform. In practice one also finds that the security forces are instrumental in training programs, health services, etc. By assuming these tasks the population can realize that the security forces are not carrying out suppressive actions, but they are in reality seeing to the security and well being of the people.

To insure that these types of actions are really successful the political leaders of South-West Africa must constantly point them out to the population. The attention of the people must be drawn to the fact that SWAPO wants to try to provide

"freedom" for them through violence, while the political parties in South-West Africa and the security forces are offering them freedom which is not based on intimidation, but on political, economic and social development. If this is done then SWAPO not only can be defeated militarily, but also politically.

The actions of the South African armed forces and of the regional forces of the South-West in the course of the past 3 weeks have again clearly underscored the fact that SWAPO is relatively ineffective from the military point of view.

Although the organization possesses highly sophisticated weapons supplied by the communist block and many of its members are also undergoing training abroad, the South African armed forces and the South-West Africa forces are succeeding in holding down this insurgency war at a very low level of intensity and our forces have the necessary military capabilities of going over the border and destroying SWAPO bases in Angola.

Even SWAPO's efforts at concealing its own defeats, by way of its propaganda abroad, and pretending that it is actually militarily very effective and successful, are attaining limited results.

Nevertheless, regardless of all these facts the idea that SWAPO will yet win an election in South-West Africa is often encountered not only abroad but also in the republic and in South-West Africa itself. Probably one of the most important reasons for this is the fact that in the past decade there have been "victories" for three terrorist organizations in Southern Africa, namely: FRELIMO in Mozambique, the MPLA in Angola and the Patriotic Front in Zimbabwe.

However, events in the above three countries cannot be regarded as indications that SWAPO will triumph in South-West Africa in view of the fact that there are important differences between the situations. In Angola and in Mozambique, for example, the terrorist organizations attained a "victory" mainly as a result of political events in Portugal and not as a result of political or military actions in these colonies by the terrorists.

The thing which is really of great interest is the problem of support on the part of the local population. Whether the conflict is mainly a terrorist or guerrilla warfare is not of decisive importance. In both instances insurgents will try to obtain the support of the population and in so doing deprive the government of its basis of power.

Efforts are constantly made in trying to persuade the population that the government is suppressing and exploiting it. The support of the population is, moreover, sought not just for political reasons, in other words, not merely for the purpose of combatting the government's influence. The insurgents must obtain the support of the population for very practical considerations.

DISAPPOINTING CANADIAN ATTITUDE ON CUBAN TROOPS IN ANGOLA

Windhoek REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 24 Sep 81 p 4

[Editorial: "Canada and Cuba"]

[Text] Canada is undeniably a Western country and nobody has any doubts about this.

However, the "Westernness" of any country comes under serious suspicion when, as Canada has done, such a country assumes the point of view, and announces it in the United Nations, that the withdrawal of the Cubans from Angola ought not to be a condition for the peaceful solution of the South-West Africa question.

In the first place the point of view should have been that the Cubans must get out of Angola whether or not the settlement of the South-West question is under discussion.

What do they want there? What does a country on the other side of the ocean have to do with the maintenance of a certain government in another country?

It wouldn't be so bad if this had to do simply with the maintenance of a certain government, but the fact is that the certain government in question is a disciple of Russian expansionism...as is also Cuba.

In the second place the South-West has a democratic government party which need not be bought by the West, but whose democratic tendency is completely above suspicion.

We are a Western ally second to none in the continent of Africa.

Yet Canada says that the Red Wolf can simply stay in peace above our northern border.

This is ironical!

REASONS WHY INDEPENDENCE IN 1983 IS A PREMATURE DREAM

Windhoek REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 22 Sep 81 p 6

[Article by J. A. Engelbrecht: "Independence in '83 Appears To Be Quite Impossible"]

[Text] Since last Friday certain sections of the South African press have come out with long drawn out reports dealing with the so-called "secret" meeting between Chester Crocker, of the United States, and a South African team of officials which included Danie Hough. There is broad speculation that the group, which has been meeting in Zurich since Sunday, has been discussing a plan for giving independence to the South-West in January 1983.

According to South African press reports the South African team led by Dr Brand Fourie is believed to be asking for clarification of the American proposals, including the target date of 1 January 1983 for the independence.

The Americans have indicated that the South Africans asked for this conference in Zurich.

South African newspapers have also reported that another thing to be discussed at the Zurich conference is an agreement between South Africa and SWAPO which would include guarantees on human rights...an agreement which must be concluded before an election under the supervision of the United Nations.

On the basis of what the Americans and South Africans will have hatched out between Sunday and today, the South African cabinet will then have to make certain decisions which must contain answers to the Western Powers for their meeting due to begin in New York on Thursday.

Thereafter, organizing the settlement plan in accordance with UN resolution 435 will get underway. The plan must last for at least 8 months - and then Uhuru on 1 January 1983!

The great optimism over this is certainly not being shared in all circles. At this stage it is absolutely unclear how an election under the supervision of the United Nations can take place so that there can be independence on 1 January 1983. Not unless the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance (DTA) or SWAPO or both of them throw in the towel with respect to everything they have stood up for until now...but there are no indications that either of them are going to do this.

Let's take a glance at the record.

At the January 1981 Geneva Conference, Administrator General Danie Hough spilled the milk way ahead of time by saying that according to paragraph 19 of Dr Waldheim's report (S/14266), which dealt with the question of mutual trust, it is not necessary to hold further discussions on the date on which Resolution 435 is to be implemented.

Mr Hough did this after the DTA had set a number of conditions for carrying on further talks on implementation, but most of these conditions have not yet been met.

For example, the DTA had asked that Mr Maarti Ahtisaari resign as the UN commissioner for Namibia before he could come to the South-West to play the part of arbitrator. He has not yet given up this position.

In addition the DTA demanded that the United Nations stop recognizing SWAPO as the only representative of the people of the South-West. The United Nations has not yet done this and this holy cloak hung over the shoulders of SWAPO is still there.

The DTA had furthermore asked that the United Nations stop providing financial help to SWAPO. This has not yet been done and as of this moment millions from the United Nations treasury and from its related organizations are going to SWAPO.

The DTA had also asked for an "adequate time period," and Dirk Mudge in particular for a "reasonable time," to follow the United Nations' confession of these sins, in the course of which it must provide proof of its impartiality.

Mr Mudge and the DTA have, moreover, asked for an equal status for the DTA with SWAPO in the General Assembly and in the Security Council, but the United Nations has failed to budge on this and just recently Peter Kalangula and Dr Bennie Africa have been refused access to the Security Council and the General Assembly to present their cases.

The DTA has furthermore stated repeatedly, and it is still asserting, that no implementation of any settlement plan or solution of the South-West Africa problem is possible without its collaboration.

Mindful of these things it is impossible to imagine how there can soon be any agreement on the part of the DTA for the implementation of Resolution 435, unless a couple of diplomatic miracles happen. If there is to be independence on 1 January 1983 the settlement plan in accordance with Resolution 435 must be enacted in March/April of the following year at the latest.

But how is it possible to get rid of all these DTA objections before that time?... Even if you consider the fact that Mr Mudge very recently stated that he thinks it is realistic to talk about an election between 12 and 18 months from now.

And where does SWAPO stand? Nujoma's most recent official statements make it clear that not one jot or title of the original Resolution 435 must be changed.

Just a week ago he and his henchmen came out saying that they are not interested in constitutional guarantees applicable to a parliament which must be constituted after the elections.

Nujoma will not allow any monitoring of his bases in Angola during such an election.

Thus under the present circumstances it is not very clear how Dr Chester Crocker's crystal ball can predict independence on 1 January 1983. After all there must also be time to organize the independence feast!

But with the bloody nose which SWAPO and its fellow travelers recently got in Angola and the world in which South Africa now finds itself...who knows!

ANGOLA FORCING VITAL WATER SUPPLY PROJECTS, MEASURES

Windhoek REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 25 Sep 81 p 5

[Text] The way Angola's beastly neighborliness is causing South-West Africa/Namibia to scramble for water and drive up its cost by millions of rand began to unfold little by little at a Wednesday afternoon meeting of the Grootfontein farmers meeting which was attended by a member of the Ministerial Council and the Secretary for water affairs.

Hope for the future is now being placed on the Kavango River in a project which will cost about 100 million rand and designed to get the water from the river to flow directly into a channel which will serve the central, eastern and possibly even the west coast areas. The entire water supply plan's estimated cost runs up to 230 million rand.

A possibility, which has degenerated into a bone of contention, is to currently draw water for the channel from the Karstfeld watershed of Grootfontein. Farmers in this aspiring agricultural community are refusing outright to provide water.

In the area of water and power supply H. J. von Hase, a member of the Ministerial Council, pointed out what good things could result from a good relationship with Angola. According to existing agreements Angola may now draw Kunene River water from the upper side of the Ruacana Falls and South-West Africa/Namibia can harness only the water on the lower side of the falls of the border river.

The result of this is that South-West Africa/Namibia has to draw water from hundreds of meters below and then has to pump it up to the higher ground levels with resulting astronomical costs.

With respect to a possible drawing from the Orange, Von Hase said that the border lies at the high watermark of the northern bank and consequently South-West Africa/Namibia does not have a natural share of the water.

He said: "The water from the border river is a national asset for all of us and consequently this asset must be distributed most advantageously for all."

Von Hase called the border river the most important source of water for South-West Africa/Namibia saying that it is necessary to differentiate between personal and national interests.

With respect to irrigation possibilities he stated that, besides, the Hardap-Scheme irrigation is uneconomical in the South-West.

The government is expected to provide water to municipalities, mines, etc.

River waters are public waters and permits are necessary to draw water from rivers such as the Swakop, the Vis, Kunene, Kavango and Orange.

An example of private water is that found on farms and is available to farmers. In such instances farmers can be forbidden from drawing too much water.

In addition there are managed private sources of water in regions such as Stampriet, Grootfontein, Omarauru, Windhoek and Gobabis. In these areas it is possible to drill for water only under permits. There the Department of Water Affairs has certain rights which it can utilize in the national interest. In such instances compensation is up for discussion.

He referred to regions where there exists a surplus of private water and the government's rights in this respect...rights which go as far as dispropriation.

The northeast water bearing region for Windhoek, the central area and even Gobabis and the western scheme for the coastal regions and Rossing represent the two great water projects on which work is now being done. Without these there will be no future for South-West Africa/Namibia.

As for irrigation he said that only the Caprivi area has enough water for this.

Jan Jordaan, the secretary for the Water Affairs Department, said that it is wrong to say that the northeast water-bearing area is intended for Windhoek only. The water will probably be distributed further east, south and west. The water must be provided in order to stabilize the unstable internal sources.

The first phase of the project consists of the Von Bach, Swakoppoort and Omatako dams. The central water sources are already being utilized up to 90 percent, but there is a 10 percent instability element. The internal sources can be stabilized through the utilization of antional water.

Due to the fact that at the present time the Kunene project is at an impasse he mentioned the possibility that the water from the northeast watershed can also be distributed to the west coast.

He compared the disagreement over the building of the canal to the dissatisfaction that also arose over the building of a road. Such projects infringe upon the existing order of things. However, a route must be followed and the most direct one is the least expensive.

He assured farmers that they would be consulted for seeing to it that their positions on the building of the canal will be the same. According to Mr Jordaan agreements have already been made with the first 18 farmers along the 2 starting points of the canal.

Mr Jordaan said that 40 meters will be cleared open over the route to be covered by the canal. This will be fenced off and the Department of Water Affairs will not transpass beyond that area.

He stated that in 1975-76 Grootfontein was declared a groundwater area for the purpose of protecting the farmers.

[There was] one "I protect myself" vote.

He went on to say that the drawing of water by mines in the north is being watched constantly and control is being exercised where, in the opinion of the Department of Water Affairs, too much water is being drawn on farms.

With respect to the drawing of water from the Grootfontein area Jordaan said that this will apply only to surplus water over a period of 5 to 6 years. Thereafter a connection will be made with the Kavango River.

After the connection with the Kavango River is made there will be no more drawing of water, except for the upkeep of the installations.

The remaining rants, valued at 438,900 rand, will go to 46 organizations in 17 countries. The program has caused agitation among the council's 300 non-Catholic member churches. EFFECT OF IMF, U.S. AID POLICIES ON BUDGET NOTED

Niamey SAHEL HEBDO in French No 287, 28 Sep 81 pp 4-5

/Article by Abdoulaye Boureima/

/Excerpts/ The budget adopted for the current year by the council of ministers--Fr CFA 93,853,819,000-even though it is up from last year--comes at a time when the price of uranium is declining, the dollar is fluctuating and inflation subjects our modest national resources to the harsh ordeal of economic recession.

Indeed, one should praise the efforts made by the state to provide for the continuation of various projects in the field of schools, health, rural development and water works, and one should not lose sight of the sacrifices made by the governmental authorities to provide an increased budget, on the one hand, and to insure that the people, whose purchasing power declines more every day, are not left at the trough of the wave.

Nevertheless, if the state has made this commitment despite the meagerness of its resources, it was assuredly in order to sharpen the awareness of all Nigeriens of the difficult international situation and lead them to confront the problems head-on with sound management involving the utmost in strictness and austerity. Our survival depends on it...in an economic sense, because 1982 will not be an easy year. Some global economics experts are predicting that Africa, because it is caught up in the cycle of deficits and debt, will plunge deeper and deeper into "crisis, and has no hope of extricating itself in the short term."

The economic projections are thus very pessimistic. Even the latest forecasts of the IMF seem gloomy, especially as regards African countries like Niger which do not produce oil. Now if one realizes that the price of certain products like oil and equipment goods is going to keep increasing, then one should not be surprised on reading the IMF study published under the title "World Economic Outlook." This veritable cry of alarm published by the IMF and dedicated to "the non-oil-producing underdeveloped countries" notes that "it is highly probable that internal as well as external problems...and especially the latter are going to get even more serious, and that a sizable number of countries will have to cope for a long period of time with a strained external payments situation."

How can such a situation be remedied? The IMF document suggests two possibilities:

The first scenario involves a "mild recovery in the economy, a dampening of inflation in the Western countries and stability in real terms in the price of oil."

The consequence: the deficit on current transactions of non-oil-producing countries will increase, to reach the $140 billion mark in 1985.

Given the size of this deficit, the various African countries who come under this category will have to increase the level of their external borrowing, while taking into account the limitations of financing and reduction in their reserve assets.

The second scenario assumes the continuation of weak economic growth in the Western countries, along with a situation in which developing countries will have to sustain their own debt burden and thus further reduce their rate of economic growth, which in light of current conditions may be less than the 4 percent shown this year.

Either way, no one considers the possibility that the balance of payments adjustment programs designed by the IMF for the "developing countries" could be called into question on the grounds that this international organization, whose economic thinking is far too monetarist, seems to act only on financial aggregates, that is on instruments of budgetary policy.

The IMF in particular calls on countries that desire its help to make cuts in the level of public expenditures, and thereby alter their distribution in favor of the key development sectors.

Now Niger is not in fact of the opinion that the best way to reduce the imbalances is to grant further public assistance, to which some Fr CFA 40 billion will be dedicated this year. In reality, if the state has chosen to play a big part in public assistance, that only proves that the CMS /Supreme Military Council/ and the government are preaching persistence in the policy of social justice; it also proves--by allowing certain sectors such as national education, rural development, health, national defense and planning to maintain a flexible rate of expansion--that the authorities have taken the right step.

One understands and realizes this is so when one considers that in Niger, as we are accustomed to say, we have learned to "prepare for the unpredictable." This is why we should appreciate the sacrifices made this year by the state to increase the budget. This is why we should once again praise its efforts, while keeping in mind that the present very difficult situation does impose a certain budgetary discipline on us. And it was not without obvious reason that the acting minister of finance said last week that "the budget is everyone's concern" and that "officials in the various agencies owe it to themselves to provide further proof of their vigilance and strictness."

When one realizes that very often money is acquired by dint of incredible acrobatics and at a rate of interest that is...high, one has a better understanding of the import of that appeal for greater parsimony. It is in our own interest, since 1982 will be a really difficult year.

The big offensive recently launched by the United States may exacerbate the situation. That offensive centers around a theme on which the U.S. secretary of state, Alexander Haig, elaborated last week at the United Nations: "Less official aid and increased reliance on enterprise and the private sector." This idea was very favorably received by the new head of the World Bank, who like General Haig considers that "the new strategy of the United States is to encourage poor countries to rely more on trade and private investment than on direct aid for their development."

The United States secretary of state even thinks that "a massive transfer of funds from the developed countries to the developing countries is not realistic." If one must add to that the opposition of Ronald Reagan, the President of the United States, to "any increase in the capital of the IMF as well as any new allocation of Special Drawing Rights /SDR's/ to the 141 member countries of the IMF, one has a perfectly clear understanding of this economic philosophy only a month in advance of the Cancun summit on the North-South dialogue!

WFP AID PLAN TO HELP BUILD CEREAL STOCK

Niamey LE SAHEL in French 1 Oct 81 p 4

/Text/ An operational plan for the implementation of a project to regulate prices and for support of a proposed cereals reserve stock was signed yesterday at the ministry of foreign affairs and cooperation by His Excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Mr Daouda Diallo, and Mr Wanis Semerdjian, a representative of the World Food Program /WFP/.

The assistance from the WFP is to help the government create a reserve stock of 18,000 tons of cereals (sorghum or millet) over a period of 4 years, by means of direct shipments from abroad or through trade and local purchases.

The WFP agrees to provide the government of Niger 18,000 tons of sorghum or millet, of which 50 percent is to be delivered to Niamey, 25 percent to Tahoua and 25 percent to Agadez, for a total value (including the cost of shipment and administration) of an estimated U.S. $5,965,000, or around Fr CFA 1.73 billion.

The 18,000 tons provided by the WFP will become a part of a regulative stock and will be utilized solely to stabilize cereal prices through adjustments in supply and demand when prices rise or decline.

JAPAN TO PROVIDE AID TO FISHING INDUSTRY

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 1 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] The Japanese mission to draw up the basic plans for a network of cold storage units for the fishing industry is continuing its dicussions with Senegalese authorities, and yesterday it was received by the secretary of state for maritime fishing.

The mission, composed of six members, has come to make an on-the-scene assessment of the program to build fishing infrastructure and equipment which the secretary of state for maritime fishing proposed to the Japanese authorities during his trip to Japan last July.

The proposal has been approved by the Japanese side, which promised to send a mission to Senegal to discuss it in more detail with our country's authorities and to visit locales where the refrigerating units are to be established (Matam and Bakel).

It must be noted that this is not the first time Japan has gotten involved with Senegal. This is its third project, for it already provided equipment and ships, piroque [boat] motors, fishing net and sailor's outfits to Senegal, before financing refrigeration units at Bambey and Louga.

Taking into account the quality of the equipment received and our partner's willingness, Japan was thus contacted a third time for the financing of a refrigeration project and the acquisition of boats and fishing equipment. The cost, which will be financed in grant form, is estimated at around Fr CFA 720 million.

Senegalese authorities, according to D'Sogui Diouf, director of oceanography and maritime fishing, are especially enthusiastic about this mission, because Japan has always provided high-quality assistance to our country, because of its vast experience in the maritime field. Senegal would like to profit from that experience as much as possible.

This exemplary cooperation is of special value for small-scale fishing venture, a sector which should be gradually expanded. Japan's assistance in this sector runs from providing boats, fishing equipment, sailors' outfits, and signal buoys for the ships to see to our country, to the purchase of refrigerated trucks for better marketing of fish products in the Senegalese interior.

The Japanese mission, during its visit which concludes 12 October, will visit the cold storage installation at Bambey before going to Matam and Bakel. In Dakar it will also visit SENEPESCA /expansion unknown/ (a joint Senegalese-Japanese company) and the port of Dakar.

According to Dr Amadou Cisse Dia, accords on these two projects will be signed in November by Senegalese and Chinese authorities. The president of the national assembly then praised China as "a courageous country which is solving its own problems with the help of its great people." Dr Amadou Cisse Dia then explained that the People's Republic of China wants to have solid relations with developing countries. In fact, said President Amadou Cisse Dia, China considers itself a developing country and does not grant exclusive rights to anyone, which is a fundamental position, the president of the national assembly remarked. We could appreciate the strength of the relations between our two countries by the warmth and quality of the welcome given us at Beijing and Shanghai, said Dr Amadou Cisse Dia in conclusion. BOMBALI CHIEFS PLAN ON LARGE SCALE RICE FARMING

Freetown DAILY MAIL in English 13 Oct 81 pp 1, 8

[Text]

PLANS have been drawn up for chiefdoms in Bombali Central Constituency to set up large rice farms next year. The three Paramount Chiefs in the Constituency are spearheading the plans.

Under the plan, competitive farming will be organised at which trophies and prizes will be offered to individuals, groups and chiefdoms with the highest production.

As an eye-opener, a farmer of Rogboreh, Alhaji Sallu is harvesting his 40-acre rice farm in Sanda Tendaren Chiefdom.

The plans were discussed during the visit of the Minister of Social Welfare and Rural Development, Mr. Thaimu Bangura, in his five-day tour of the constituency.

In a welcome address, the Court Chairman of Gbanti Kamaranka Chiefdom, Mr Samura Kamara, spoke of the Minister's impressive record in serving his constitutents.

He said that many roads health centres and schools had been constructed or improved.

Mr Samura Kamara said that Mr Thaimu Bangura's untiring efforts secured adequate supply of rice for the constituency despite the scarcity of the commodity.

The people spoke of the Minister's gesture in raising a relief fund to aid the victims of the 1980 storm disaster; the hygienic water wells dug in most villages in the constituency; the payment of medical bills for the treatment and cure of over 200 hernia cases, a disease which he hopes to eradicate in that area; the offer of scholarships to over 300 school and college students and his efforts in raising the producer price of tobacco from 35 cents to 55 cents.

BRIEFS

ENVOY CALLS ON INTERIOR MINISTER--The British high commissioner to Sierra Leone, Mr O'Leary, has paid a courtesy call on the minister of interior, S. B. Marah, to congratulate him on his reappointment. During the call, the minister and the envoy discussed matters of mutual interest and highlighted the long-standing cordial relationship which continues to exist between Sierra Leone and Britain. The minister took the opportunity to express his personal concern to the British high commissioner on the distorted reports about events in Sierra Leone in the British press and the BBC. The high commissioner assured the minister that he had always done his best to correct any inaccuracy appearing in the British media through the Britsh foreign office and he undertook to contact the appropriate authorities in Sierra Leone to obtain factual information which will be read to the British Government as and when the government demands. They also discussed technical assistance by the British Government and agreed that whenever possible, training courses should be organized locally, although in exceptional circumstances, consideration could be given by the British Government for training facilities to be accorded to Sierra Leone's local government officials in British institutions. The British high commissioner also informed Mr Marah of the past and ongoing British Government aid for agriculture and other sectors of the economy. The British Government had recently pledged the sum of 8 million leones for the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges throughout the country. ZANZIBAR GOVERNMENT FAILS TO ACHIEVE RICE CULTIVATION GOALS

Dar es Salaam UHURU in Swahili 10 Oct 81 p 6

[Editorial: "Our Views"]

[Summary] The council of representatives stated during its session held last week in Zanzibar that rice cultivation objectives during the past harvesting season were not met in the islands as a result of various problems. The junior minister of agriculture of the revolutionary government, Abdullah Rashid, informed the council that the government had relied on all districts in the islands to cultivate a total of 16,072 hectares of rice plants but only 7,873 hectares were cultivated.

This is not a small matter since rice is the main food of the citizens. Because of the importance of rice for the citizens of the islands, the revolutionary government had used millions in foreign exchange every year to import rice. Thus the failure to reach the goal set for rice cultivation means the government must continue to use more foreign exchange to import rice.

The junior minister said that the shortfall in rice cultivation resulted from various problems. These problems must be looked into to see how they can be resolved in order to increase rice production in the islands.

Because, although the government tried to provide incentives like credits for seed and fertilizer, why did only a few people come forward to make use of such credits?

Although many people knew about these credits, it is possible that they were not instructed sufficiently concerning these credits, how to pay them back and the benefits obtainable as a result of these credits.

However, for many years the citizens of the islands have been in the habit of cultivating their small rice fields and these habits have possibly made them unable to see the need for accepting credits and using the many opportunities provided by the government.

In order for the revolutionary government to attain its goal of developing rice cultivation and reducing the burden of rice imports, the past situation must be changed. Farmers must be trained in good agricultural methods which will provide much greater harvests.

NEED FOR CAMPAIGN TO ATTRACT SISAL CUTTERS STRESSED

Dar es Salaam MZALENDO in Swahili 4 Oct 81 p 1

[Editorial: "Our Views"]

[Summary] The problem of the shortage of youths to cut sisal is continuing to hinder production of this crop. The executive chairman of the Tanzania Sisal Authority [TSA], Shaweji Abdallah, told members of the TSA's board of directors in Tanga the day before yesterday that the shortage of young workers is causing the level of sisal cutting to decline. Also the general manager of the Muheza sisal company, which is a branch of the TSA, Peter Feer, explained that sisal cutters continue to leave work and to engage in the mining of ores in the Mwakijembe area in Muheza District.

The problem of a shortage of young workers to cut sisal is a long-standing one. The TSA chiefs have been talking about this problem since 1974. For some time the situation was very bad and caused the economic importance of this crop to decline.

As a result of this situation it was necessary to start a special campaign to revive the sisal crop in 1979. This campaign involved obtaining sufficient numbers of youths to cut sisal. As a result of the efforts which were made, the situation became better and 1 year after the campaign started, the TSA chiefs noted an increase in sisal production.

Peter Feer mentioned the fact that sisal cutters are leaving their jobs to take up mining but why do some youths not like the work of cutting sisal? In the past complaints were made about the difficult conditions of work in the sisal fields. But the TSA promised at the time to take steps to correct this situation including increasing the income and other benefits of the sisal workers.

It is apparent, however, that a campaign to inform youths about the value of the work and the fact that it is as much respected as any other work needs to be begun. Youths in the villages and members of the Youth Association can help greatly in this campaign.

Sisal is among the crops which are depended on in the effort to develop the national economy. If the production of sisal declines, the effect on the economy will not be negligeable.

Along with instructing the youths, the TSA must make certain that working conditions in the sisal fields are improving in order to attract more youths.

UNION LEADERS SPEAK AT SUVESS CONGRESS

Ouagadougou L'OBSERVATEUR in French 2 Sep 81 pp 6-9

/Article: "Tenth SUVESS /Sole VoHan Union of Teachers of Secondary and Higher Education/ Congress"/

/Text/As promised in yesterday's edition, our subject today is again the sessions of the 10th Ordinary Congress of the Sole Voltan Union of Teachers of Secondary and Higher Education (SUVESS), which was given its start last 31 August at the Ouagadougou Labor Exchange without a traditional thome (rather than with a traditional theme, as was reported).

It is the custom -- certainly a wise custom -- to stop from time to time during a long journey and take stock of things. Bowing to tradition, SUVESS, like a responsible organization, decided to stop and take a critical look back as it assessed the results of its various past struggles (rather than mass struggles, as also reported yesterday), by way of approaching a fresh page in its long history, with a distinguished body of political and union officials as witness, including Soumane Toure.

Soumane Toure is the secretary general of the Voltan Trade Union Confederation (CSV), the central with which SUVESS is affiliated. It was in this capacity that he was to speak, wishing the congress participants every success in their deliberations. An indefatigable fighter, always the same, Mr Toure, it will be noted, even at a time that some people describe as a period of social truce, did not deem it necessary to put on kid gloves for anybody's benefit.

"Comrades! The Voltan Trade Union Confederation (CSV), through me, is happy to bring its militant greetings and support to the 10th SUVESS Congress. This 10th Congress, the first to be held since the teachers' long struggle in October and November 1980, will, as you have decided, be an opportunity to make a full assessment of the lessons to be drawn from those struggles, as well as from the work of SUVESS since the struggles. For there is no doubt that, through the scale of forces and the range of the struggles, as well as through the situation prevailing in the unions since 25 November 1980, valuable lessons must be drawn to aid in strengthening and consolidating the SUVESS, the CSV, and Voltan trade unionism.

Comrades, the CSV would like to take the opportunity offered by your 10th Congress to inform SUVESS militants of its satisfaction at the spirit of solidarity and unity that they showed unanimously during the support struggles decided upon by the Voltan Trade Union Confederation in October and November 1980, and for the lofty spirit of sacrifice and unselfishness they displayed when SUVESS decided to engage in an indefinite strike in support of SNEAHV [National Union of African Teachers of Upper Volta] from 29 October 1980 on.

This spirit of unity, solidarity, and unselfishness is an honor to SUVESS and must form the basis of responsible trade unionism, that is to say, one engaged exclusively in the defense of the interests of the workers and the people, without opportunistic scheming and without political allegiance-forming.

This is where we must denounce all those who, during the struggles or in the present situation, outside the unions, in the ranks or in the corridors of government, and in the very heart of our union organizations, claim the right to try to draw this or that Voltan union into postures of compromise or subordination, try to make them lose their independence and their autonomy, or cause them to engage in or stop struggles on order, merely for the sake of their current political schemes.

Unity, solidarity, which are the indispensable conditions for union effectiveness, cannot tolerate isolated efforts in contradiction with union practice and principles.

That is why the BNC [expansion unknown] showed its disapproval as soon as it was informed of the SUVESS and SNEAHV initiative to send the CMRPN [Military Committee for Recovery for National Progress] a letter that that committee looked upon as support, and that it exploited against the CSV.

In Upper Volta's present condition, the independence and autonomy of the union movement are as important as its unity and its cohesion, for this independence and unity will enable our organizations to never lose sight of the fact that their essential role is to defend the interests of their militants, of the workers and people of Upper Volta as a whole, in every circumstance, and whatever the regime may be.

Now, this independence and this autonomy are being threatened today by the various restrictions of union freedom that we have experienced and that we have fought against; restrictions which are incidentally behind the postponement of the original date set for holding this 10th SUVESS Congress.

Union independence and autonomy, as well as the full exercise of union freedoms, are the conditions and the means which enable union organizations to defend the interests of the workers effectively. Respect for them and their defence are thus permanent responsabilities of our organizations and our militants, and we must never, at any time, for reasons of opportunism, anarchism, thoughtless and willful excitement, permit certain elements to give the enemies of unionism opportunities and easy pretexts for undermining our independence and our autonomy and to attack democratic union freedoms.

It is all the more important today, when union freedoms are still being threatened on one hand, when the cost of living for workers is rising at the rate of two oil increases in less than 4 months, and when numerous union demands are still being ignored, like certain SUVESS demands that go back to its establishment.

Comrades, this is the time for union mobilization, for the strengthening and the consolidation of our organizations, for today, just as yesterday, we shall get no improvement in our living and working conditions except through constant consistent struggle. The CSV therefore wishes you every success in your 10th Congress.

Long live the SUVESS, within an ever-stronger CSV, long live Voltan unionism; comrades, the struggle continues."

Speaking in his turn in his familiar polite but firm and outspoken manner, Anatole Nyameogo, retiring SUVESS secretary general, made this statement:

"Comrades, the 10th SUVESS Congress is being held at a time when the workers and the people are faced with enormous difficulties due to a generalized crisis in capitalistic economy. These difficulties are giving rise to a merciless struggle between those who exploit and those who are exploited. The conflicts are forcing imperialism to invent all sorts of subterfuges to blunt the political awareness of the people. Tricks like these: interminable conferences on the deterioration of exchange rates, on aid to the world's poorest countries, on disarmament, on settlement of the Palestinian problem, etcetera.

It goes without saying that none of these dilatory tactics can stop the growing impoverishment of the popular masses being exploited.

This situation has worsened with Reagan's accession to power in the United States.

In deciding to increase the military might of the United States and its allies, the Reagan administration is trying to terrorize those peoples struggling for their independence and to reactivate the cold war between the super powers. Israel, which has become more arrogant than ever since the Camp David accords, and which enjoys the unconditional support of the United States, is pounding southern Lebanon without a break, and destroys Iraq's nuclear installations with impunity.

In France, the accession to power of a socialist-communist coalition casts a gleam of hope over international relations, especially over France's relations with its former colonies, which are supposed to lose their status as reservoirs of raw materials and outlets reserved for the disposal of capitalist surplus output. Peoples yearning for justice and freedom expect socialist France to begin a qualitative change of direction in its foreign policy as soon as possible, and to honor the ideals of socialism by getting rid of the neo-colonial, reactionary, imperialistic policy that it had formerly, so that in the Western world a voice will be raised that is listened to and respected, and that [France] will take action to promote self-determination, the independence of peoples, and international justice. Of course we Africans must depend first on our own policy, rather than on that of the new team in power in France, to change the nature of the neo-colonial relations that exist between our states and France.

We would like to see the French position recently taken in favor of the Salvadoran opposition, unjustly martyrized by a fascist junta put in power by American imperialism, as an indication of fidelity to socialist ideals. All countries yearning for peace and justice must support, in El Salvador, in Chile, all over South America, the progressive forces struggling against puppet regimes being actively upheld by American imperialism so as to safeguard and defend its capitalist interests.

Nearer home, the arrogance of the racist leaders in Pretoria is a permanent challenge to the international community. In fact, at this very moment, in defiance of international law, they are starting military operations against the front line countries in defense of an unjust cause. Military intervention in Angola, where South African troops are still encamped, revolts any lucid mind that cares about basic human rights. SUVESS condemns this unspeakable invasion and appeals to the international community for a stop to be rapidly put to it.

Moroccan expansion has resulted in the continuation of aggression against the Saharan people, and the latest proposals by the reactionary Moroccan regime are intended to do nothing but spread confusion and indefinitely delay a proper solution of the Saharan problem, which must necessarily involve the right of this people to self-determination. In any case, we are relying on the Saharan people and its representatives to avoid the snare of the referendum that they agreed to in principle at the last OAU conference, and to foil King Hassan II's dilatory tactics.

In defiance of the rights of peoples to self-determination, the reactionary government of Abdou Diouf has just intervened in Gambia to reinstate the puppet Daouda Jawara, rejected by his nation and overthrown by a coup d'etat while he was taking part in the festivities celebrating Prince Charles's wedding in England. SUVESS energetically condemns the Senegalese intervention against the Gambian people.

In Upper Volta itself, the most important political event is unquestionably the 25 November 1980 coup d'etat which swept out the reactionary, shady gang of politicians of the 3rd Republic, the very ones who had sworn to kill off Voltan trade unionism.

The proclamation by the Military Committee for Recovery for National Progress (CMRPN), guaranteeing union freedoms, and the first measures taken for the benefit of teachers have given rise to an enthusiasm that is readily understood by anyone who who knows about the difficult conditions surrounding our history and the dangers threatening the strikers.

The temporary restrictions placed upon the exercise of union freedoms are falling one by one, and we hope that they will soon be no more than an unpleasant memory associated with the postponement until today of our 10th Congress, which was originally planned for 1 to 5 August 1981.

On 1 December 1980, SUVESS, in collaboration with SNEAHV, made a point of setting forth the conditions for true recovery in the joint letter No. 16/80/EN/SNEAHV-SUVESS. At that time, L'OBSERVATEUR reported our letter, of which the following are the main points: "The effective, just, and objective resolution of the education crisis, which on its own crystallizes and expresses the essence of the ills suffered by the Voltan people.

Social justice through equality of opportunity, threatened again by piratical competition and appointments through patronage; social justice for all through democratization of Voltan schools and restoration of value to the teaching profession.

True democracy through real expression and exercise of individual, collective, and union freedoms....

An audit of the previous regime's management, and the systematic, strict, and clear liquidation of any dispute that may arise at any level.

Fulfillment of the basic needs of the rural masses through effective solution of the consequences of the drought; this solution must involve an audit of OFNACER [expansion unknown], the National Fund for Price Stabilization, The National Social Security Fund, the National Deposits and Investments Fund (CNDI), the administrative offices of Young Farmers Training (FJA), and all para-governmental offices and establishments, and effective dynamic reorganization of these organizations with a view to the priority goals assigned to them.

An audit of the management of the main national resources, especially the equipment and buildings of the transportation fleet, the administrative housing, real estate, etcetera....

Strict systematic purging of the administrative chain of command.

Protection of the effective independence of the magistrature.

Establishment and actual expression of freedom of the press, of information, and of opinion.

Proper revision of international cooperation accords, especially with France, so as to promote and protect our national sovereignty and the highest interests of the Voltan people."

This letter has been interpreted as a letter of support for the new government, whereas it concerns a program of action.

Today, 10 months after 25 November, we can say that some of the actions of the Military Committee and its government demonstrate a desire to do what is right, even though they do not always succeed in reaching their goals, and though their efforts are hampered by procedural, administrative, and other delays not always justified by the spirit of equity.

To the credit of the Military Committee for Recovery for National Progress must be mentioned meeting SNEAHV's slate of demands, the reason why the 1980-1981 school year was prevented from starting; recovery measures such as stopping the proliferation of firearms, prohibition of hunting to preserve our wildlife from destruction, regulation of taverns and the use of government vehicles, reduction of the scale of living of semi-official offices and establishments, etcetera....

In our opinion, these still-inadequate measures ought to be incorporated into an overall, progressive, consistent policy for the benefit of the masses, whose standard of living is steadily growing worse from day to day.

With respect to auditing the previous regime's management, we think that the inquiries cannot last for ever, just as the commissions cannot pursue their deliberations indefinitely. Upper Volta yearns for justice. But even though it fears hasty justice, as a source of mistakes, it is just as much afraid of lagging justice as a source of compromises. And the file on dignitaries of the former regime is starting to lag too much.

In our opinion, too, changes occurring in certain important administrative offices should not be synonymous with changes in continuity [as published]. There must be a break with the methods, reactions, and habits of the past.

As concerns our action during the past union year, it began with the solidarity strike for SNEAHV, as our contribution to the fight against arbitrariness, nepotism, and favoritism, which the leaders of the 3rd Republic had set up as a system of government.

After the establishment of the Military Committee for Recovery for National Progress as government, SUVESS began efforts to bring to a successful conclusion the demands emerging from our 9th Congress. The numerous meetings and exchanges of correspondence with various ministers produced nothing, especially so far as the housing problem is concerned. So we find ourselves at this congress with the same social and professional problems again.

With regard to the housing problem, militants have been indignant at seeing our allowances kept at 10,000 francs while at the same time other state bodies for which housing does not, as it does for us, constitute a work tool, receive housing allowances of 50,000 francs or more....We also note that the Military Committee for Recovery for National Progress had no hesitation in raising the allowances for overseas missions from 9,000 to 17,000 francs per day.

We have no choice but to draw the conclusion that the government of the Military Committee for Recovery for National Progress is adopting toward the housing problem, a crucial one for us, an attitude of indifference. From this we have to deduce that the Military Committee for Recovery for National Progress and its government have not understood SUVESS, although the latter has always shown that it is a responsible union in every respect.

The lesson to be drawn from this is that we shall again have to redouble our efforts, close ranks to prepare ourselves for union struggles, which will be the only way to oblige the government properly to resolve our social problems, with the housing problem first among them, and on this one we will brook no compromise, because the teacher's home is his office.

Comrades, mobilization and vigilance must therefore be more than ever our concern at this time.

In any case, so that the fight may continue, I now declare the 10th Ordinary Congress of SUVESS open.

Long live SUVESS. Long live CSV. Long live solidarity among workers.

Thank you."

NAMIBIAN SETTLEMENT EFFORTS--Salisbury, 31 Oct (AFP)--Zimbabwe's national newspaper called the West's new diplomatic effort to bring about a settlement in Namibia suspicious in an editorial today. THE HERALD, which is indirectly government-controlled, wrote that U.S. President Ronald Reagan appeared reconciled to Namibia's becoming independent of South Africa during 1982. What is uncertain...is just what kind of independence Namibia will have, the newspaper said. The editorial hoped for enlightenment when the contact group mission arrives today to explain the western constitutional proposals to Zimbabwean leaders. The paper said that judging by leaks in the world press about the plan, it was reasonable...but not based on U.N. resolution 435. The resolution, passed by the security council in 1978, calls for a ceasefire in the Namibian guerrilla war and free elections to choose an independence government. Free and fair elections are crucial to any solution of the Namibia impasse, THE HERALD said. South Africa...is frightened that SWAPO (the Namibian guerrilla group) would win elections without too much sweat. We would not put it past the racist regime to try to abrogate an election result which favored SWAPO. The Zimbabwe newspaper called on the contact group to say so openly if it is planning to scrap resolution 435, and we can then deal with the problem in a different light. FIRST OPEC FUND LOAN--Vienna, 29 Oct (OPECNA)--Zimbabwe signed a 10 million US dollar loan agreement with the OPEC fund for international development on Thursday. The money will be used to finance the rehabilitation of the manufacturing sector. Under the program, raw materials, spare parts, balancing equipment and other essential components will be imported to increase the utilization of existing manufacturing facilities, step up export and increase employment. It is the first OPEC fund loan to Zimbabwe. It is interest free, has a nominal service charge and a 15-year period of maturity with a five-year grace period. The World Bank will act as local administrator of the loan. [Text] [LD301416 Vienna OPECNA in English 1530 GMT 29 Oct 81]

KEREKOU COMMENTS ON FRANCO-AFRICAN SUMMIT

AB031049 Cotonou Domestic Service in French 1930 GMT 2 Nov 81

[Excerpt] President Matthieu Kerekou left Cotonou this morning for Paris where he will take part in the Franco-African summit conference from 3 to 4 November. In a press statement before his departure for the French capital, the head of state gave the fundamental reasons for the participation of a high-level Beninese delegation at this conference to which the new French leaders have given a new perspective.

[Begin recording] It may seem strange to anyone who is not well informed or who is evil-minded that we are going to Paris for the second time at the head of a delegation of our revolutionary party and state within 2 months. In fact, the conference of African and French heads of state in which we will participate from 3 to 4 November in Paris is being held after the first official working visit we made to France from 22 to 26 September 1981. It was in order to dispel all misunderstandings and also to prevent all whimsical forecasts or all tendentious interpretations of the aims and objectives of our present trip to France that we found it necessary to give some explanations before our departure.

We must recall here to the militants of the Beninese revolution that since 1973, this is the first time we are personally leading our country's delegation to the conference of African and French heads of state. But, as you know perfectly well, our country has always been represented at each Franco-African summit at the ministerial level. This means that the Franco-African summit conference, which will take place in Paris from 3 to 4 November 1981, falls within a particular and new context which demands that our country, the People's Republic of Benin, be represented at the highest level.

This summit conference, in our opinion, is being held at a historic moment in the development of relations between the African states and France since it follows that of the less advanced countries which was held in September 1981 in Paris and the Cancun summit held from 22 to 23 October 1981. REVOLUTION ANNIVERSARY--Cotonou, 26 Oct (AFP)--The People's Republic of Benin on Monday morning celebrated the ninth anniversary of the revolution that began on 26 October 1972 and which brought the army to power. This celebration also marks the fifth anniversary of the creation of the Beninese Popular Armed Forces. The main event of the day took place at the Martyrs of the Revolution Square in Cotonou where President Mathieu Kerekou, the Beninese authorities and the diplomatic corps watched a parade of the popular armed forces displaying their new equipment and also a very colorful parade by the people. Yesterday evening, in a message to the nation that was broadcast on the radio and television, the Beninese head of state said in particular that the Beninese army, which is intimately linked to the people has become the indestructible shield and the impassable rampart of the democratic and popular Beninese revolution. President Kerekou urged the Beninese army to forever strive in the path of honor and remain faithful to its pledge which is not only to defend the nation against any external aggression whatever its origin but also to actively participate in the task of development prescribed by the Beninese People's Revolutionary Party. REGRET EXPRESSED OVER DISTURBANCES IN NETHERLANDS

Praia VOZ DI POVO in Portuguese 7 Oct 81 p 10

[Text] The "Week of Solidarity With Cape Verde" afforded the opportunity to learn a few things about our community residing in the Netherlands.

It is an attractive and hospitable community, that made every effort to welcome the Cape Verdian delegation both in Amsterdam and in Rotterdam, that maintains close ties with Cape Verde through culture, family ties and various feelings, that is concerned about its homeland, that is avid to learn what is new in Cape Verde: agrarian reform is the subject of the moment and despite its concern, the community fortunately does not put much credence in the statements made by certain individuals. It is a politically active community, which has the right to criticize the government--please note, however, that criticism must be honest, fair and responsible--as well as to assume a supportive attitude.

Meanwhile, the regrettable fact that a number of Cape Verdians attempted to invade the consulate and attack its employees was never customary among Cape Verdian communities. Ideas impose themselves through reason and not brute force. The Cape Verdian community in the Netherlands felt shame at this irresponsible act and asked to know how a few can arrogate themselves the right to stain the reputation of the entire community.

Don't the leaders of the group know that all this will result in increased control of the unemployed and the illegal immigrants? It is obvious, of course, that in a country that works hard, a demonstration that starts at 1000 hours on a Thursday is equivalent to providing ways of detection to the police.

Don't they know that to use or advocate violence is to provide a good argument to those who believe that immigrants are naturally of an aggressive nature and, consequently, a danger to their society.

Don't they know that the consulate belongs to the entire community and not only to a few disorderly individuals?

Reactionaries believe they have gained ground (have they really?). I only know that the community can lose much, much more.

However, the reactionaries in the Netherlands do not even constitute the most representative part of the community. There is no doubt that the Cape Verdian Association supports the government, because its members were with us during the week of solidarity. It is also certain that there are Cape Verdians who deeply love their country and feel proud of a free and independent homeland: they were also with us. To all of them, we express our friendship.

Nevertheless, the most significant and valuable gesture for us was the dialogue that brought about the solution of the dispute within the association. The issue was to ascertain who had the right to use the name and the symbols of the glorious Cape Verdian Association of Rotterdam. This question had been under debate for a long time and had even been taken to court. It was finally solved on 10 September when, at the end of a frank and friendly dialogue, the two sides signed a document expressing their consensus and the decision to close the case. There were no winners and no losers; there was only the will to settle a situation unprofitable for all. Remember the date: 10 September, exactly the day following the disturbances in front of the Cape Verdian consulate. This joint document also affirmed that the association will never be used against the state and government of Cape Verde. Our thanks to all our compatriots who represented the opposing parties and were able to put the interests of the community on a higher level. You enriched the week of solidarity.

ASSURANCE THAT COMMUNITIES ABROAD WILL NOT BE MISUSED

Praia VOZ DI POVO in Portuguese 7 Oct 81 p 4

[Excerpt] Having accepted an invitation from the United States, Minister of Economy and Finance Lopes da Silva visited a number of states in that country for 2 weeks to get acquainted with the situation there. He took this opportunity to meet with members of the Cape Verdian community. An attempt was made to find ways and means to mobilize U.S. public opinion in favor of Cape Verde through the creation of lobbying groups working with senators and congressmen. The minister told us in this respect:

"We had the opportunity to talk about what has been accomplished in Cape Verde and of what we expect from our communities overseas, especially in the United States; also, we talked about their role in strengthening cooperation and friendship between our two governments and peoples. I made it perfectly clear that the Cape Verde Government does not intend to take advantage of its communities to manipulate, maneuver or put political pressure on the governments of those countries where Cape Verdian communities reside. Anything that would take place would be within U.S. legal regulations and nothing beyond that. I stressed this aspect, in order to avoid any misunderstanding."

PARIS PAPER REPORTS DEVELOPMENTS SURROUNDING CHAD

PM291311 Paris LE MONDE in French 28 Oct 81 p 3

["J.C.P." report] [Excerpts] "Colonel al-Qadhdhafi sent a message to Mr Mitterrand on Monday, 26 October, through the French ambassador in Tripoli, but the content of the message was still not known late on Tuesday morning. However, according to a well-informed source the Libyan leader may simply have tried to deny exerting pressure on Ndjamena in favor of a union between Chad and Libya. In a more general way Colonel al-Qadhdhafi apparently intended to reply to the suspicion that he is playing a double game with Chad where, according to the French, more than 10,000 Libyan soldiers are deployed. The Chadian warning to Libya--accompanied by a warning to Sudan--confirms, in the French view, the argument that the national unity transition government president is trying to maintain a degree of independence from Tripoli. In addition Paris notes that many OAU member states are starting to support "France's pledge to restore independence and sovereignty to Chad," to cite the expression used by Sierra Leone President Stevens on Saturday.

In any event the French call for the "urgent" dispatch of an inter-African force seems to have accelerated the course of events markedly since, following the audience granted by President Ahidjo to President Goukouni Oueddei's envoy, Cameroon radio announced on Monday the forthcoming arrival in Ndjamena of OAU and UN experts responsible for organizing the deployment of this peace force.

LIBYANS LEAVE--Ndjamena, 5 Nov (AFP)--Libyan troops started pulling out from bases in eastern Chad on Tuesday, the day they began to withdraw from the Chadian capital, Ndjamena, a Chadian army spokesman announced here today. National army chief of staff Colonel Ngolobaye Allafi said that Libyans positions in the towns of Guereda, Adre and Iriba, all along the eastern fronter with Sudan, were all evacuated within 48 hours. The Libyan withdrawal is at the request of Chad President Goukouni Oueddei, the man who called for assistance from Libyan armed forces in December last year to help him crush rebel troops loyal to former defence minister Hissen Habre. The Libyans had taken all their equipment with them. [Text] [NC050842 Paris AFP in English 0834 GMT 5 Nov 81]

LIBYAN FORCES WITHDRAW--Ndjamena, 3 Nov (AFP)--Colonel al-Qadhdhafi has ordered Libyan troops stationed in Chad to leave that country immediately, Col Radouane-Salah-Radouane the Libyan colonel commanding the Libyan forces in Ndjamena, announced on Tuesday afternoon. He told an AFP special envoy in Ndjamena that Col al-Qadhdhafi told me that the withdrwal of our troops should go into effect within 2 or 3 days. The Libyan colonel stated that Colonel al-Qadhdhafi personally called him on telephone to give him that order. The Libyan colonel, however, declined to indicate the number of Libyan soldiers to leave Chad during this period. It is a military secret, he said. LIBYAN TROOPS TO LEAVE--Ndjamena, 3 Nov (AFP)--Chadian President Goukouni Oueddei said today he was convinced that Libyan troops currently in Chad would leave by the end of the year, as he asked them last week. Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi had given his word on the matter, President Goukouni said. He maintained that there was no split within his government, and refused to comment on a statement today by Foreign Minister Acyl Ahamat that he was opposed to a Libyan withdrawal. LIBYAN WITHDRAWAL OPPOSED--Ndjamena, 2 Nov (SUNA)--Ahmat Acyl, Libya's strongman in Chad, has confirmed what was announced by SUNA; namely, that he is the only Chadian who opposes the decision on Libyan forces' withdrawal from Chad, the decision that was made by the Chadian Government unanimously, with the exception of the vote of Ahmat Acyl, who is the foreign minister. A few days ago, Acyl carried out a Libyan scheme for a coup attempt, knowing about the decision which the Chadian Government was to make on the Libyan presence in the country. At a press conference in Ndjamena yesterday prior to his departure for Paris via Tripoli, Acyl said that he is opposed to the Libyan withdrawl from Chad. Acyl went so far as to proclaim his absolute subservience to Libya when he officially admitted that he is receiving all his arms from Libya. CABRAL TO BE TRIED--Bissau, 25 Oct (AFP)--The announcement of the coming release of Luiz Cabral, 51 years old, former president of Guinea-Bissau and imprisoned since the 14 November coup d'etat, has been officially denied by Victor Saude Maria, vice president of the ruling Revolutionary Council and minister of foreign affairs. The release of Mr Cabral had been announced by the Portuguese press which thought the former head of state will be permitted to go to Cuba. This version is only pure speculation by the press which takes advantage of trips of Guinea-Bissau leaders abroad to sow confusion, Saude Maria said on his return to Bissau after a trip which took him to Cuba. He affirmed that the former president will be tried for crimes committed without, however, specifying the date of the trial. [Text] [AB250948 Paris AFP in French 0821 GMT 25 Oct 81]

EQUIPMENT RETURNED TO GAMBIA--Banjul, 28 Oct (AFP)--Large consignments of military equipment were handed over Monday in Banjul to the Gambian authorities by Guinea-Bissau's ambassador to Gambia resident in Dakar, Alexandre Nunes Correia, a communique from Guinea-Bissau's general consulate in Banjul announced. The equipment, which is unspecified, was seized from the Gambian putsch leaders who sought refuge in Guinea-Bissau after the abortive coup last 30 July, the communique notes. After the event, coup leader Kukoi Samba Sanyang and nine of his accomplices fled to Guinea-Bissau in large canoes carrying their military equipment. Gambia has demanded their extradition, which has not yet been obtained. According to Senegalese sources, Guinea-Bissau authorities might allow them to leave the country for another African country more distant from Gambia. In this regard, the handing-over of the equipment could be, according to observers in Banjul, a good-will move by Guinea-Bissau toward Gambia. In its communique, the Guinea-Bissau general consulate in Banjul pledged its country's determination to maintain good relations with Senegal, Gambia and Guinea, its immediate neighbors. The communique further said Guinea-Bissau would never be a cause for tension in the region. [Text] [AB281655 Paris AFP in French 0858 GMT 28 Oct 81]

MOI SPEAKS ON BORDER PROBLEMS, CHAD FORCE

EA302346 Nairobi Domestic Service in English 1800 GMT 30 Oct 81

[Excerpts] His Excellency President Daniel arap Moi today expressed concern over the increasing incidents of cattle rustling along the Kenya-Uganda border and called on the police and the administration to cooperate in eradicating the menace. He was officially opening the 1981 Kitale Ask [Agricultural Society of Kenya] show. The president promised to inform the Uganda Government of the situation so that it can stamp out the menace from the Uganda side.

President Moi called on Wananchi to inform the police of any suspected law-breakers and show them that they would not be harassed. He told them to report immediately if they saw guns in the wrong hands as such weapons could be used to harm them and their families. President Moi further urged Bungoma and Trans Nzoia district commissioners to cooperate in eradicating stock theft.

The president commended Kenya's armed forces for maintaining a high standard of discipline and asked leaders and government officials to do the same. He advised leaders against dividing Wananchi and added that leaders should not quarrel over petty matters if they believed in nyayoism [footsteps: following Kenyatta's philosophy]. He said Wananchi know the people who are true nyayo followers and added that one thing leaders have not discovered is that Wananchi know everything. The president reiterated that Wananchi have a right of demonstrating their loyalty directly to him and not through anyone else.

Speaking in his capacity as the current OAU chairman, President Moi briefly outlined the problems on Chad, Western Sahara and Namibia. He expressed the hope that Namibia would achieve her independence soon.

On Chad, President Moi said that a pan-African force will soon replace Libyan troops in that country. He stressed that a pan-African force could not affect Libyan troops as Libya had agreed to pull out its troops as soon as the pan-African force arrived in Chad. He disclosed that some OAU member states, which included Nigeria, had provided troops to be sent to Chad.

FORD TRACTORS IMPORTED FROM BRAZIL

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 81 p 21

[Article by Peter Moscardi]

[Text] Ford's tractor division has moved to the fore in its field by clinching two R1,7 million contracts for the supply of tractors to the countries of Lesotho and Lebowa.

Recently, the tractor division delivered a consignment of 107 tractors, comprising a variety of models, to Dr C Phatudi, Chief Minister of the Lebowa government.

The sale, valued at over R1,7 million, reflected the largest single tractor transaction conclued by the Ford Motor Company, thus establishing a new record.

Following the Lebowa transaction, Ford has now secured a contract to supply the Lesotho government with 150 F6600 tractors in a deal valued at over R1,7-million.

However, unlike the Lebowa contract, the Lesotho order will be met by the importation of tractors from Ford's Sao Paulo plant in Brazil.

Explaining the Brazilian importation, Ford's director of Tractor Operations, Wally Rautenbach said: "With our tractor facility in Port Elizabeth working at full capacity, it was necessary to import the F6600's to meet the critical ploughing and planting deadlines of the Lesotho government's maize self-sufficiency programme."

The order, said Mr Rautenbach, was processed in record time, with the consignment landing in Port Elizabeth only 25 days after confirmation.

The fleet sale, estimated to be the largest single transaction handled by a South African manufacturer, also involves a back-up parts package worth over R200 000.

The Brazilian-made units were among the best quality Ford tractors available and already 2 500 tractors have been exported from there this year, said Mr Rautenbach.

To ensure the tractors are operational as soon as possible, the Sao Paulo company has sent out full-time instructors to train 150 operators.

"Our business with Lesotho underlines Ford's commitment to assist neighbouring developing markets in their realisation of their goal of self-sufficiency in food production.

"Apart from the Lebowa contract, the company has also concluded substantial fleet sales with Bophuthatswana, Gazankulu and Kwazulu," said Mr Rautenbach.

RHODESIAN FRONT, ZIMBABWE FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION ATTACKED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 25 Sep 81 p 8

[Article by Carlos Cardoso]

[Text] Zimbabwe's Prime Minister Robert Mugabe and some of his ministers have recently accused Ian Smith's Republican Front [FR] (formerly Rhodesian Front) of having taken on the goal of destabilizing the country.

This destabilization has various facets, and its targets include the political and strategic policy of maintaining ties with Mozambique.

Among the platforms chosen by the FR to launch its attacks against ties with Mozambique has been the Zimbabwean Parliament itself.

The Lancaster House Accord handcuffed the Zimbabwean Government in a temporary compromise with the Rhodesian Front by means of a tortuous and dangerously limited constitution for Zimbabwe. The freedom of speech and action granted by the constitution to the FR has come to represent a curb on the freedom of the Robert Mugabe government to carry out its development program.

In the matter at hand, the process works this way. The 20 FR members of parliament, some of them more outspoken than others, have as their primary target the developing relations between Zimbabwe and Mozambique, particularly transportation.

Thier speeches in parliament have the following basic premise: When Zimbabwe was Rhodesia, there were no transport problems, but now that the country is Zimbabwe and is making use of Mozambique's ports and railways, large problems are beginning to arise.

Two statements are invariable repeated with the regularity characteristic of a campaign. First: Mozambique's ports and railways are inefficient, and second: Mozambique's ports and railways are not secure. Conclusion: Zimbabwe should go back to depending entirely on the South African route.

In the first place, rail traffic between Zimbabwe and Mozambique and subsequent use of Mozambican ports have been increasing gradually since the reopening of the border. This fact in itself leaves the FR speakers very little latitude. Moreover, the only reason there is not more movement is that the Zimbabwean Government does not control--and according to the constitution cannot control--the choice of shipping routes by private enterprises or even quasigovernment enterprises.

In the second place, the rhetorical recourse to the insecurity of the Mozambican ports and railways has someting to do with the voodoo of the FR itself. Let us see. The counterrevolution in Mozambique depends, for its leadership and as its principal source of supply, on a power which the FR considers friendly to Zimbabwe: The Government of South Africa. Moreover, it was the Rhodesian Front itself which creted and nurtured this counterrevolution when Zimbabwe was Rhodesia. For some obscure reason, the current FR parliamentarians seem to have forgotten this.

In the third place, the role of spokesman for South Africa in Mozambique is played--often blatantly--by the FR.

Recently, Mr. Bill Irvine, an FR parliament member, suggested in full session that Zimbabwe's transportation problem could be solved if there were a meeting at the ministerial level between Zimbabwe and South Africa--which is exactly what the apartheid government has been seeking to bring about in order to link Zimbabwe politically with apartheid.

Domestically, the FR claims that the NRZ [Zimbabwe Railway] is incapable of transporting the cargo waiting for shipment, particularly corn.

If there is a crisis in the NRZ, it is essentially a crisis of growth.

The sanctions have been lifted and national production has increased considerably, placing demands on the NRZ which it did not face earlier. This is the first point. The country needs more locomotives and will soon acquire them.

The second point: Dozens of Rhodesian railroad technicians have left the country. To solve this problem, the Zimbabwean Government has imported skilled manpower from India and Pakistan and--a crucial point--is undertaking an intensive program to train Zimbabwean railway workers. Put simply, this means that the NRZ is in the process of becoming a true Zimbabwean carrier. Since the FR is not politically or culturally Zimbabwean, it cannot support this transformation. Therefore, on this technological point as well, the crisis is a crisis of growth.

Moreover, if the rumors are true that NRZ operations are being boycotted by certain public servants interested in maintaining dependence on South Africa, then the FR should look among its members for the individuals involved in this boycott.

The turn to Mozambique for rail and port services has another side, however, a darker side and one kept a dirty secret until now.

During the years when the border with Mozambique was closed, South Africa exploited to the utmost the squeeze on Rhodesia. South African rail and port charges rose many times over, milking the Rhodeisan economy of most of the foreign exchange obtained by Rhodesia through its illicit foreign trade. South Africa took in millions at Rhodesia's expense because of the sanctions. Now it must be asked: Who in Ian Smith's Rhodesian Front split the financial pie with the South Africans--the exaggerated fees that Rhodesia paid to the South African ports and railways? Who in the Rhodesian Front fattened his bank account as a result of this tie with South Africa? When will the millions of Zimbabweans of all races and colors have a clear and definitive answer to this question?

The FR parliamentarians talk. The constitution guarantees them this freedom. They speak and they act systematically against the Government of Zimbabwe, and thus they act against the people of Zimbabwe, against the people's attempt to achieve a better life. They talk; they make speeches. They use freedom of expression to restrict the Zimbabweans' freedom to build a new life, freedom won with the noble blood of thousands of Zimbabwe's finest sons.

The FR parliamentarians speak, and the newspapers publish their statements, conscious or not of the political effect of these speeches on Zimbabwean and regional public opinion.

Thus the freedom of expression which the FR enjoys in parliament is extended to freedom of expression in the mass media.

Let us dot the i's and cross the t's, once and for all.

There is nothing ingenuous, nothing innocent, about the way news is published. Absolutely nothing. The very act of choosing what is newsworthy is affected by the ideology and objectives of the newsman, whether or not he is aware of it. It is even less innocent when the replies by ZANU-FP parliamentarians to the FR attacks are given only three or four lines at the end of the news article.

There is a struggle in the Zimbabwean press today. The defenders of an independent Zimbabwe are still struggling against sectors and individuals representing the written extension of the spoken word of the FR in parliament.

Therefore, the FR is using this freedom to put a lid on Zimbabwe's greater and worthier freedom to cut the ties that keep it hostage to apartheid.

In sum, the Zimbabwean Republican Front and the social forces it represents have not budged an inch from the reactionary and antihistorical position they held before Lancaster House. To believe otherwise is to believe exactly what Ian Smith's Republican Front wants us to believe.

DECREE ON STATE ENTERPRISES PUBLISHED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 3 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] Law No 2/81, describing the organization and function of state enterprises, has just been published, having been approved by the Permanent Commission of the People's Assembly. The law underlines the important role of the state enterprises in constructing the material, political and ideological bases for the building of the socialist society and for planned economic development, and defines standards and principles of organization, function and management of the state enterprises.

"The radical political, economic and social changes of the last 2 years have confirmed and deepened the socialist character of our revolution. Hence it is important to clarify certain concepts and principles, particularly with respect to economic management, direction and the individual character of the director, and to redefine the organization and responsibilities of the state enterprises." the document states.

Law No 2/81 adds that, as the driving force behind the nation's economic development, the state enterprises must assume primary responsibility for achieving the objectives defined by the state for each sector or branch of activity, according to the guidelines of the FRELIMO Party.

The Executive Council is no longer an organ of the state enterprise. It is replaced by the Executive Group for support to the director-general in making and implementing decisions. The document also says it is essential that the state enterprises clearly reflect the important role of the workers' organizations in enlisting the workers and in directing and supervising production, as one of the great victories of our revolution.

Law No 2/81 consists of 34 articles. It provides that the director-general of the enterprise shall meet with the workers whenever he deems it suitable, for broad discussion of matters related to the life of the enterprise.

The law states: "The director-general will thus establish direct contact with all the workers, not only to explain major issues in the life of the enterprise but to insure that the workers participate in the search for solutions to the problems of the enterprise." It also provides that, in addition to the duties established in the law, the directors-general of the state enterprises may, on a case-by-case basis and as authorized by the director of the central government agency which supervises the respective branch or sector of activity, exercise specific functions of direction and supervision of the enterprises in the sector, including private and mixed enterprises.

With the promulgation of the law defining the rules governing state enterprises, the form of model statute is superseded and no longer valid.

The full test of Law 2/81 will be published in a later edition.

DEFICIENCIES NOTED IN YOUTH ORGANIZATION

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 3 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] "The Organization of Mozambican Youth [OJM] in Maputo Province has not yet created the dynamism among the young people that will move them to take a more active part in the tasks of national reconstruction. The OJM structures are inoperative, particularly the rank-and-file structures where most of our young people are found," declared the Central Committee secretary for organization of the party, opening the proceedings of the second Provincial Meeting of the OJM yesterday in the capital.

The topics to be taken up by the participants in the 2-day meeting include an accounting of the work accomplished from January to September, definition of more correct working methods, activation of rank-and-file structures and a study of the enlistment of youth in specific tasks of production and national defense.

Speaking at the opening session, the secretary for party organization noted the inactivity of the rank-and-file structures of the organization and the failure to enlist young people in specific tasks, which would involve them more closely with the organization. He stressed how important it is that the structures of this mass organization, particularly those in the border zones, make an effort to insure that young people participate in the nation's defense by joining the peoples militia.

He also stressed that the experience gained by the youth during the armed struggle for national liberation, applied to current conditions, could contribute to the success of the work the organization is seeking to accomplish.

In conclusion, he said that, despite the shortcomings that had been noted, participation by young people involunteer work is an indication that the OJM is growing.

Lack of prior planning and programming is a major factor in the poor performance of rank-and-file structures, concludes the Provincial Secretariat report analyzing the work effected in the last 9 months.

The report also notes the shortage of cadres to insure execution of the tasks. The problem is aggravated by the apathy of some officers of the OJM district structures, since, according to the report, they do not have a deep understanding of the problems affecting local and other rank-and-file structures.

Taking part in the meeting are OJM district secretaries, representatives of some strategic enterprises and representatives of some primary and secondary schools.

TOOTHPASTE PATENT ISSUE THREATENS COURT ACTION

Accusation Denied

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Sep 81 p 8

[Text] The Unit Directorate of the Directorate of Detergents has protested the meddling attitude of a British firm which holds one of the patents on the toothpaste manufactured in our country. The firm threatened to take the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique] to the Hague Tribunal if the country used ingredients supplied by other companies to manufacture the toothpaste.

On learning that Mozambique's Foreign Trade Enterprise had placed an order for raw materials, the British firm sent its representative in Zambia to Maputo to present his management's position regarding the toothpaste manufacturer.

"They had no business contacting us. They could do this only if they had learned that the foreign trade enterprise had delivered the products to us and we had accepted thm, knowing they were not suitable for the manufacture of the toothpaste," said Tito Uamusse, unit director of the Directorate of Detergents.

It happens, however, that the raw materials in question have not even arrived in Maputo. The shipment is expected in the Mozambican capital only in the next 2 months. The representative of the British firm came to Maputo in late July, 5 months before the products were to arrive.

"Even if the materials had already arrived, we are aware of our obligations. We know that prior consultation is required if we want to introduce ingredients that might change the product in some way. Incidentally, the patent holders conduct periodic test on the products we manufacture. We send them samples," Uamusse pointed out.

In addition to holding the patent, the British firm traditionally supplies the essential ingredients.

Several orders were placed last year, including one to the firm's branch in South Africa. Currency exchange problems made it impossible to pay for the material and all the orders were moved forward to 1981.

The order placed with the British firm still stood, since it consisted mainly of essential ingredients.

Mozambique was granted a line of credit from France, which provided an opportunity to place orders to augment those already placed with the usual suppliers, and this was done.

The new orders were not for the basic materials, however, but for ingredients considered to be [permissible] alternatives.

"From the order form submitted to the British firm, they knew that some ingredients needed to manufacture the toothpaste were missing. They have various sources of information and they knew we had placed orders with othe suppliers," Uamusse explained.

"The Foreign Trade Enterprise is free to look over the market. The country was having currency exchange problems. They [the British firm] were aware of this, but they want us to be dependent on them, to import only from them," he said.

After the firm's representative returned to Zambia, the unit directorate of the Directorate of Detergents sent a letter protesting the firm's attitude. There has been no reaction to the letter to date.

The orders are still standing.

Toothpaste Supply

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 26 Sep 81 p 3

[Text] FID Mozambique resumed full production of toothpaste in mid-August and immediately placed on the product with COGROPA [State Wholesale Marketing Enterprise] and the State Supermarket Enterprise for later distribution to the local market.

The firm underwent difficulties during July, producing at only 50 percent capacity because it feared its stock of raw material would run out before the new orders were received.

Adelino Mussui, representing the General Directorate and a deputy in the firm told NOTICIAS that the toothpaste shortage that has affected Maputo Province for over 3 months was due to factors beyond the company's control.

FID is headquartered on the outskirts of Maputo and is expected to supply the province with the products it is responsible for manufacturing, according to a directive from the Domestic Trade Ministry.

The firm manufactures "Macleans" and "Palmobeach" toothpaste, as well as shaving cream, lotions, shampoos, waxes and other products.

According to Mussui, the Domestic Trade Ministry has directed the firm to cease its shipment to other provinces.

Among the reasons for the toothpaste shortage, Mussui noted the complexity of the import process and the consequent delays.

NATION FACES 6 PERCENT GRAIN SHORTAGE IN 1982

AB221731 Paris AFP in French 1421 GMT 22 Oct 81

[Excerpts] Niamey, 22 Oct (AFP)--Presenting the results of the 1981 agricultural season, President Seyni Kountche indicated that Niger will face a 6-percent grain shortage in 1982.

The head of state, who has just concluded a tour of appraisal of the harvests and the livestock all over the country, said during a press conference that this year's available stocks of millet and sorghum amount to 1,390,180 tons while the requirements are estimated at 1,405,560 tons. Fifteen thousand five hundred tons will have to be imported.

As far as rice is concerned, Niger--which produced this year about 38,315 tons as compared to 32,000 tons in 1980--will still have to import 60,000 tons to meet the needs of the people. In this regard, the head of state announced that the $15 million loan recently granted by Saudi Arabia will be used to purchase 30,000 tons of rice. The country will also import some 20,000 tons of wheat since it does not produce any.

The head of state pointed out that the shortfall in grain production this year is partly due to insufficient rainfall ranging from 10 to 50 percent according to the regions, the Diffa region in the east of the country having suffered most. Moreover, Niger has a population estimated at 5.824 million which is growing at the rate of 2.7 percent. This increases the grain requirements to between 37,000 to 40,000 tons.

Despite these difficulties, the head of state said that Niger will be able to feed its people and preserve its livestock thanks to the cooperation of friendly countries. He called on the people to avoid wastage and to protect the grazing grounds against the numberous bush fires which destroy them.

This circular, which was signed on 14 October, forbids these same people to travel without a reliable means of transport or a recognized guide, except on these routes from Agadez-Zinder and Agadez-Tahoua via Ingall. It also stipulates that any person benefiting from an administrative or professional lodging and particularly the French Government aid workers can only house their father, mother, brothers and sisters, after obtaining permission. People who do not fall into these categories have been asked to lodge at the hotels. About 1,500 French aid workers living in the region are affected by these new measures. DIOUF COMMENTS ON FRANCO-AFRICAN SUMMIT ISSUES

AB041016 Dakar Domestic Service in French 2200 GMT 3 Nov 81

[Excerpts] The conference of African and French heads of state was opened this morning in Paris by President Francois Mitterrand. The main topics on the agenda are Chad, Namibia, Western Sahara and economic problems.

Many of those who addressed the conference called for measures to ensure the stabilization of the prices of raw materials. The foreign ministers met to try to formulate proposals in this regard or that an appeal may be made in favor of this stabilization. President Abdou Diouf proposed that 5 percent of the war budgets be devoted to development. According to experts, a total amount of $85 billion would thus be realized. Outside the conference, Mr Abdou Diouf made the following statement to Charles (Lepieux):

[Begin recording] [Diouf] The conference has begun very well. I was looking forward to a well organized conference characterized by solidarity, friendship and inspiration and I can say that my wishes have been gratified to the fullest. I wish to pay particular tribute to President Francois Mitterrand not only for his remarkable opening address which touched on all the major problems of interest to us but also for the extraordinary ability with which he is conducting the discussion. This made it possible to hold this first session in excellent conditions.

[Question] Are you in favor of enlarging this French-speaking group?

[Answer] Certainly! Solidarity demands that we should be as numerous as possible because we must influence decisions at the world level and I think that the more numerous we are, the better it will be for France and the African countries.

[Question] But the enlargement of the circle of participants would automatically result in an increase of the topics to be discussed. Do you think that you will one day be overwhelmed by the number of topics?

[Answer] We will not be overwhelmed by the topics because the problems we discussed this morning for example are all problems of world importance. They concern not only those who are taking part in this conference but also those who are not participating in it.

[Question] Mr President, you proposed this morning that 5 percent of the war budgets should be devoted to development. Do you think your proposal will be accepted?

[Answer] This is not the first time Senegal is making this proposal. My predecessor, President Leopold-Sedar Senghor, made it at the United Nations and I think we must plead and try to convince the developed countries. I am sure that this proposal will be accepted one day. The interesting thing is the connection between disarmament and development and this idea is dear to us.

[Question] What should be given priority in such meetings: politics or economics?

[Answer] There is a relationship between the two; they are linked. For example, I think that security is a political problem. One cannot develop without security and when one does not develop fast enough, one may become a prey to destabilization. I therefore think that the two are linked and I cannot accord priority to any of the two, especially because I am a politician who is busy with development problems. [end recording]

ECONOMIC LIBERALIZATION POLICIES REVIEWED

London 8 DAYS in English No 42, 24 Oct 81 pp 34, 35

[Article: "Somalia Is Betting on the Workers"]

[Text] SOMALIA'S 100 per cent devaluation of 1 July followed intensive pressure from the IMF and western aid donors, who pushed their standard panacea of economic liberalisation for Third World countries. But according to Commerce Minister Ahmed Mohammed Mohamoud: 'We took these measures ourselves — they reflect not just pressure from the IMF but a reorientation. The moves have been approved by the party (the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party).'

The IMF provided Somalia with $50m in Special Drawing Rights, while the Arab Monetary Fund put up another $35m to 'backstop' the liberalised economy until it finds its footing. The IMF and AMF are betting that the more than 100,000 Somalis working overseas, mostly in the Gulf states, will start taking advantage of the liberalised banking rules which accompanied the devaluation and begin depositing their hard currencies in Somali banks.

World Bank officials estimate that those workers earn $600m each year. Currently, the portion they repatriate comes home in the form of non-government controlled imports, bought with money exchanged mostly in Jeddah. The government has now started to issue letters of credit and import licences for all imports, along the lines of most other developing countries which have to control their hard cash.

So far, the workers' response has not been encouraging. Bank officials in Somalia admit there has been no noticeable increase in bank deposits from overseas, despite their assurances that depositors would be allowed to make withdrawals in the same currency. Following the devaluation, the exchange rate offered in Jeddah fell from a high of about 20-22 Somali shillings to the dollar to the current SSh18.5 to the dollar.

That rate is about 50 per cent better than the government's offering — the official rate for Somali citizens is SSh12.46 to the dollar.

Implementation of the new import system was designed to allow importers with back orders, who could document those claims, to bring in their unlicensed goods, partly out of fairness to them and partly to give the government time to get its own house in order. Mohamoud told 8 Days: 'The implementation of these decisions and others are what is getting the interest. But we've decided to go ahead on an ad hoc basis. It's still too early to become committed to any specific implementation policy.'

The IMF is often accused of callousness when dealing with the peoples who must bear the brunt of the economies it designs. Prices almost always increase. In Somalia, petrol was the first to take off, up by 153 per cent, which was 'a clear result of the devaluation', according to a western economist. Moreover, the government is required to cut back on 'non-productive' social welfare expenditures. Somalia's budget — one of the government's better kept secrets — is sure to take a blow.

No one is willing to talk about military allocations, which were budgeted at 39.7 per cent of the government's ordinary expenditure in 1979, the last year for which figures are available. However, the Somali population has become accustomed to a shrinking shilling. From December 1977 to June 1980, the government puts the rise in the general price index at 104.3 per cent, and the IMS says that average real wage and salary earnings declined by 50 per cent between 1970 and 1978.

All that paints a dreary picture of an underdeveloped economy which earns 83 per cent of its foreign exchange from selling live animals (mostly sheep and goats) to neighbouring Arab states — Saudi Arabia being the main buyer, accounting for about 90 per cent. Its annual economic growth, generously reckoned at 2.5 per cent, is raced by a population growth of 2.3 per cent. Nonetheless, some economists predict a boom once the economy is liberalised.

BRIEFS

EEC AID--European community assistance to Somalia will increase by about EUA24m (1 EUA = $1.1) in 1981, following a recent decision by the EEC Commission to aid the construction of the Golwein-Gelib road and the Saakow experimental farm in the Juba Valley. As a member of the Lomé Convention, Somalia is entitled to EUA73m-83m of EEC aid over the next five years. About EUA19m of the total has been earmarked for the 257km-long Golwein-Gelib highway project, which is being financed jointly by the European Development Fund and the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development. Since 1977 the EEC has contributed over EUA19.5m to the project. Nearly EUA5m in aid will go to the Saakow experimental farm, part of Somalia's plans to develop the Juba Valley by building the Baardheere Dam. The farm will gather physical, agricultural, technical and economic data on potential crops in the valley. EEC experts stress that about 220,000 hectares of the Juba Valley are suitable for cultivation, and could provide over half of Somalia's food requirements by the year 2020. A general study of the valley indicates that bananas, sugar cane, rice, cotton, groundnuts and maize could be grown in the region. European aid is also being considered for the Baardheere Dam, whose total cost has been estimated at $600m. [Text] [London 8 DAYS in English No 42, 24 Oct 81 p 35]

PROGRESSIVE FEDERAL PARTY'S NON-RACIAL POLICIES FACE TEST

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 81 p 13

[Text] CAPE TOWN. — The Progressive Federal Party — and particularly its youthful new MP for Constantia, Mr Roger Hulley — faces a crucial test of real voter support for its non-racial policies tomorrow.

Residents of the Constantia constituency who returned Mr Hulley to Parliament in the general election with a resounding majority of more than 3 000, will be asked tomorrow to take a stand on whether they are prepared to share their mink-and-manure suburb with Blacks.

After a Government decision to create a prestige Coloured township in Cape Town and a subsequent challenge by the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, to Dr Alex Boraine, PFP MP for Pinelands, to hold a referendum on the principle of open residential areas in his constituency, Mr Hulley announced he would go to his own constituents on the issue.

Tokai

One of the areas the Government is looking at for the Coloureds-only suburb is in Tokai, which Mr Hulley represents in Parliament.

The proclamation of a Coloured group area there — it has already been advertised for objections — would mean either the expropriation of one of the oldest farms in the historical agricultural Constantia Valley, or the destruction of part of the Tokai forest reserve.

Mr Hulley maintains that Tokai and Constantia residents do not want Nationalist ideology in the form of another segregated group area dumped on their doorsteps any more than they want to see the demise of the farm or the forest.

Sure that the majority of property owners would prefer the entire area open to all races, Mr Hulley will ask municipal voters to say so in a referendum tomorrow.

Not official

The poll is being underwritten personally by Mr Hulley and is not an official PFP exercise, although party leader Dr Frederik van Zyl Slabbert has expressed support for it.

Despite his confidence of success, Mr Hulley has been criticised for the wording on the ballot paper, which asks voters to say "Yes" or "No" to: "I am opposed to new race group areas in Constantia/Tokai and am in favour of allowing any person to acquire property in the normal way in terms of the existing town planning scheme."

Mr Hulley's critics say this is Hobson's choice. By voting against the proposed Coloured group area they automatically vote for the suburb becoming racially mixed. Similarly, a "No" vote implies support for the Coloured area.

Boycott call

The National Party MP for Simonstown, Mr John Wiley, whose constituency touches on a part of the proposed new group area, has called for a boycott of the referendum because, he says, voters will not be given the choice of expressing themselves in favour of the status quo.

Mr Hulley argues that there is no question of maintaining the status quo. The Government has decided that Coloured people will live in the area and it is up to the residents to take a stand on how they are brought in.

Economics

Some property owners have come out in favour of opening Tokai and Constantia for purely economic reasons. The cost of homes in Tokai averages R70 000 and in Constantia a house can cost anything upwards of R90 000. There are plenty of wealthy Coloured people in the Peninsula and wider based competition for property must push prices even higher, they say.

Others, who will fall in the buffer zone between White Tokai and Coloured Tokai, may vote for an open area in the hope of avoiding having their properties frozen by the Government or expropriated at values fixed by a depressed market.

A third group, who want neither a Coloured township nor the areas opened to all races, are welcome to indicate their position by spoiling their ballot papers, said Mr Hulley.

On the line

Mr Hulley has put his political career on the line by organising the referendum and has admitted a majority of "No" votes would be "embarrassing".

Just as disconcerting would be the collapse of the whole exercise through a percentage poll too low to provide a true picture of opinion.

However, a high poll —and there are about 4 500 municipal voters in the area — and a majority of "Yes" votes will be a political triumph for the PFP and Mr Hulley and could go a long way towards laying the ghost of the White South African limousine liberal. —Sapa.

PAC MEMBER OUTLINES GROUP'S POLICIES, OBJECTIVES

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 1 Nov 81 p 10

[Article by Gora Ebrahim: "PAC In The Forefront of The Freedom Struggle"]

[Text] THE Pan Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC) came into being as an organisation on April 6 1959. But ideologically speaking, the PAC emerged as the true custodian and vanguard of the policies contained in the 1949 programme of action which was presented by the ANC Youth League and duly adopted at the 1949 ANC conference held in Bloemfontein.

The preamble proclaimed "the fundamental principles of the programme of action are inspired by the desire to achieve national freedom. By national freedom we mean freedom from white domination and the attainment of political independence . . ."

However, the leadership, instead of implementing this fundamental principle deviated from it. The fact that the indigenous people were nationally oppressed, exploited and discriminated against was relegated and the class struggle was made into the main issue.

TRADE UNIONS

According to this theory the people in South Africa were oppressed as workers, both black and white. Such glaring truism that white workers were, and still are, getting 20 times more salary than their black counterparts; the Job Reservation Act, which preserved majority of the jobs for whites only; whites were allowed to form trade unions to protect their rights while black workers were completely denied this fundamental right and the fact that the whites could advance their technological skills through free, state-provided education while free education was totally denied to blacks, were deliberately ignored by the advocates of the class struggle theory. The Africanists, on the other hand, stood firmly by the principle of national liberation first.

The struggle for self-determination by a dispossessed people must of necessity be a national struggle. The class struggle is the next and inevitable stage.

To call for an exclusive class struggle at this stage is either to display political naivety or tacitly to accept that South Africa attained "independence" under the South Africa Act of 1909.

In PAC's view both these are wrong and unacceptable. Dwelling on this very issue, Mangaliso Robert Sobukwe, the first president of the PAC, said in an interview: "We, however, stand for the complete overthrow of white domination. That means that the South Africa Act of 1909 — that falsified relic of the white man's exclusive privileges and prejudices — must be scrapped."

This view, needless to say, is diametrically opposed to the slogan that "South Africa belongs to all those who live in it . . ." as this is based on a supposed "judicially balanced" union of the exploiter and the exploited, the oppressor and the oppressed.

The programme of action also reiterated the policy of non-collaboration. The authors of the programme strongly felt that the leaders of the liberation movements should not at the same time serve on dummy institutions created by the oppressors.

STOOGES

The PAC remained true to this principle and, consequently, has had no dealings whatsoever with stooges and so-called Bantustan leaders. For instance, the large gathering that attended Sobukwe's funeral almost lynched Chief Gatsha Buthelezi when he tried to address the crowd.

In short, therefore, the policies of the PAC are the continuation of principles enunciated in the 1949 Programme of Action and are based on nationalism, socialism and democracy.

Nationalism demands that the interests of indigenous peoples should dominate over those of aliens, because the country belongs to the indigenous peoples. Socialism demands that the interests of the workers should dominate over those of their employers, because their role in the creation of wealth is more significant than that of their bosses. Democracy demands that those of the majority should exercise the prevailing view.

MOBILISATION

Soon after its formation the PAC embarked on a serious mobilisation campaign, not merely to protest against the numerous unjust laws, but to resolutely challenge the whole oppressive system. The result of this nationwide mobilisation was the launching, by the PAC, of the March 21 1960 Positive Action Anti-pass Campaign.

This first major nationwide campaign culminated in the Sharpeville massacre, when police opened fire on unarmed men, women and children, killing 69 and wounding 189 . . . many of them seriously.

In Cape Town more than 30 000 marched from Langa and Nyanga townships to Parliament buildings . . . the like of which was never seen before in South Africa.

The overwhelming response by the people to the first PAC campaign so frightened the authorities that they declared a state of emergency in the country, suspended the pass laws and banned the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania and the African National Congress.

The campaign also awakened hitherto complacent world public opinion. The massacre led to a worldwide condemnation of the rulers of South Africa and paved the way for their eventual international isolation.

Also, and for the first time, foreign capital was withdrawn within a matter of days. Today March 21 is universally observed as the International Day for the Elimination of Racism.

The PAC had a short legal existence, because of the mass support it enjoyed and the serious challenge it posed to the regime.

The first step the PAC took after Sharpeville was to establish its armed wing, POQO. As the PAC was now a banned organisation, new methods of work and organisation had to be worked out.

The PAC established its headquarters in the then Basutoland (now independent Lesotho) but in 1963 the South Africans, with the connivance of the British, raided the PAC offices in Maseru and took away most of the documents.

This raid led to the arrest of over 10 000 PAC/POQO activists throughout the country. The raid and the subsequent arrests constituted a temporary setback for the organisation. While the clampdown on PAC/POQO activists was going on, the authorities decided not to release Sobukwe from Robben Island, although he had completed his sentence.

In the mid-1960s the Portuguese colonies were not independent, and neither was Zimbabwe. Tanzania was our political haven and reliable rear and Zambia had just attained independence. In 1966 the PAC mounted a military operation through the then Portuguese-held Mozambique.

TRAIL

The PAC guerillas fought their first battle at Vila Perry with the Portuguese. Keeping to the mountain range they eventually entered South Africa after crossing the Sabi. The aim of this operation was to establish a sort of "Ho Chi Minh Trail". However, we had to abandon this line of action because of the domino theory adopted by the OAU.

In 1969 the South Africans and some of their western supporters propounded the "dialogue" line. Some African countries took up this line and wanted the OAU to open "dialogue" with the South Africans.

At the 1970 OAU summit the "dialogue" attempt was defeated, but not completely. The PAC felt that under the circumstances the most effective way of destroying the "dialogue" plot was to keep the political fires inside Azania burning . . . in other words, the politicisation and mobilisation of the masses had to be stepped up.

The result of this conscious campaign was the 1976 Soweto uprising. Many organisations have claimed to have been behind the Soweto uprising but the truth is that the PAC is the only national liberation movement whose leading members have been formally charged and sentenced for their role in the uprising.

Eighteen leading PAC members, including the veteran PAC leader Zeph Motupeng, were the accused in the first and longest secret political trial held in South Africa.

I should also point out here that the commission set up by the authorities to look into the "causes" of the Soweto uprising, the Cillie Commission, also reported that the PAC played a leading role in the uprising.

The PAC is considered a serious threat by the regime, hence its being banned only 11 months after it was formed.

The chief of security police in South Africa, Major-General Johan Coetzee, dealt at great length on the PAC when he addressed a conference on "terrorism" organised by the Centre for International Politics at the University of Potchefstroom last August.

He acknowledged the fact that the PAC "feels attracted to platteland terrorist (read revolutionary) actions" — in other words the PAC is more rural based. What is most significant is his contention that if the PAC and ANC "make common cause" they will "cover the geographical area more effectively".

ACCUSED

PAC has been accused in some circles as being racist or anti-white. This allegation was put to our late president Mr Sobukwe as far back as 1959 and this is how he answered it: "What is meant by anti-whiteism? Is it not merely an emotional term without a precise signification?

"Let me put it this way. In every struggle, whether national or class, the masses do not fight an abstraction. They do not hate oppression or capitalism (in the abstract). They concretise these and hate the oppressor, be he the Governor-General or a colonial power, the landlord or the factory owner or, in South Africa, the white man.

They hate these groups because they associate them with their oppression.

"Remove the association and you remove the hatred. In South Africa then, once white domination has been removed/overthrown and the white man is no longer "white man boss" but is an individual member of society, there will be no reason to hate him and he will not be hated even by the masses.

"We are not anti-white, therefore. We do not hate the European because he is white! We hate him because he is an oppressor and it is plain dishonesty to say I hate the sjambok and not the one who wields it!"

Moreover, the PAC was the first organisation to both propound and practise non-racialism as opposed to multi-racialism. From its very inception the PAC opposed the formation and perpetuation of ethnic organisations such as the South African Indian Congress, the now defunct Coloured Peoples Congress and the so-called all-white Congress of Democrats.

TRANSVAAL NATIONAL PARTY CONGRESS LIKELY TO BE PEACEFUL

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 81 pp 1-2

[Article by Jaap Theron]

[Text] TODAY's Transvaal National Party congress in Pretoria is likely to be a peaceful event, demonstrating unity and loyalty to the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha.

Reports of confrontations and fireworks are expected to be proven wrong, although it has been suggested that if anyone starts looking for trouble they could find it in full measure.

Dr Andries Treurnicht, Transvaal NP leader, who is due to officially open the congress tonight in the Pretoria City Hall, yesterday reiterated that the alleged controversial secret meeting in his Cape Town office on October 6 this year, at which the political futures of three Cabinet Ministers, Mr Fanie Botha, Mr Chris Heunis and Dr Gerrit Viljoen, was discussed, in fact never took place.

The Citizen contacted most of the Transvaal National Party MPs whose names were published in connection with the meeting on October 6 in Cape Town and they, without exception, denied attending such a meeting and all knowledge of it.

It now appears that certain people, who were responsible for spreading the rumour about the controversial meeting, are neither close friends nor supporters of Dr Treurnicht and are known to be opposed to his leadership in the Transvaal. The rumours included allegations that Mr Fanie Botha, the Minister of Manpower Utilisation, had to be chopped from his deputy leadership position in the Transvaal NP, that Mr Chris Heunis, the Minister of Internal Affairs, had to be monitored, and that Dr Gerrit Viljoen had to be nominated for election to a senior position, which nomination he would lose, thus giving him a loser's image.

The Transvaal NP executive, as well as the full Transvaal NP head committee, meets in Pretoria this morning prior to the opening of the congress, which starts at 2 pm.

It is likely that both the alleged secret meeting, as well as the strong remarks of Pretoria MP Mr Daan van der Merwe, at Nylstroom, last Thursday, will be discussed or raised at the executive meeting.

But the likelihood of these two explosive matters being discussed at the succeeding head committee meeting or at the congress itself is less strong.

Mr Van der Merwe supported Dr Treurnicht during a report-back meeting at Nylstroom and launched a scathing attack on certain "assassin writers, assassin politicians and academics", he said regularly and on a selective basis picked on certain close friends of Dr Treurnicht.

The Citizen was told yesterday that Mr Van der Merwe had not attacked fellow-Nationalists at Nylstroom, but referred to the numerous attacks from outside the National Party ranks on close Treurnicht supporters.

But it was nevertheless interesting to see how Mr Van der Merwe's Nylstroom speech led to a scurrying behind the NP scenes by certain Nationalists who tried to fit the Nylstroom boot and who then denied that they were responsible for either the attacks on the close Treurnicht supporters or for the spreading of the rumour about a secret meeting in Dr Treurnicht's Cape Town office.

The Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, will reply to resolutions at tomorrow's session of the congress.

THREE 'SILLY' POLITICAL NOTIONS ARE REFUTED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 81 p 6

[Editorial: "Silly Season"]

[Text]

IT'S the silly season in politics and in sections of the Press.

It is said in the PFP Press that there is going to be a massive confrontation between the Prime Minister and business leaders at his summit in Cape Town on November 12.

Now we cannot for a moment think that any business leaders — even those in the Anglo-American camp who have been sounding off the loudest in the past couple of weeks — will get up and wag their fingers at Mr Botha and attack him verbally.

That's not what such conferences are all about.

The Prime Minister is not an Aunt Sally for anyone — and that includes Mr Chris Saunders, the sugar baron, or Mr Denis Etheridge, the Anglo-American executive, or the Assocom chief, Mr Stuart-Reckling.

The Prime Minister, if they did get uppity, would have good grounds for squashing them in front of the rest of the 600 conference delegates.

He is, after all, the Prime Minister; they are, after all, people who have been invited to attend a conference with him. Good manners, if nothing else, should preclude any businessmen from slanging him.

Confrontation?

It's just not on.

The wish is father to the thought.

Item 2 in this silly season:

The Progfed Press, ably supported by a couple of Nationalist newspapers, is making much fuss about a secret meeting at which Dr Treurnicht, the Transvaal leader of the party, and 21 of his supporters allegedly decided on a strategy to remove Mr Fanie Botha, the Minister of Manpower Utilisation, from the vice-chairmanship of the party and to discredit the Minister of National Education, Dr Gerrit Viljoen.

Dr Treurnicht has denied that anything of the sort has taken place or is contemplated.

Since Dr Treurnicht could have made an issue of Mr Fanie Botha after they had clashed over labour policy four months ago, it seems unreasonable to expect that he has anything to do with any plot to oust this senior Cabinet Minister now.

Indeed, Dr Treurnicht said then — and he has repeated it this week — that "they were not together to chop off heads."

We don't expect any fireworks, therefore, at today's head committee meeting — unless Dr Treurnicht's opponents are looking for trouble.

The three vice-chairmen come up for re-election in mid-December — and whether there will be any attempt to replace Mr Fanie Botha then, is a moot point.

What Dr Treurnicht wants to do is to keep in the party its existing members — a wise decision in view of the defection of thousands of Nationalists to the Herstigte Nasionale Party.

The Progfed Press is also suggesting that the Transvaal congress will result in a head-on clash between Dr Treurnicht and the Prime Minister over Mr Botha's reformist policies.

But though there are resolutions before the congress that could result in the Transvaal party taking an unambiguous stand on issues like a common voters' roll for Whites, Coloureds and Indians, there is no suggestion that the Government has in mind a common voters' roll.

In any case, whatever the Prime Minister does, he always relates it to the traditional policy of the party, and Dr Treurnicht has not yet found an issue — Craven Week aside — over which he has been required to take a major stand on principle.

Our information suggests that the Transvaal congress will not result in any open conflict.

Confrontation between the party and the Prime Minister? Showdown?

Wishful thinking again on the part of the PFP Press.

Item No 3 in the silly season.

It is suggested in some newspapers that there may be an open row between the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance and the South African Government.

This is supposed to be the reason why Mr Pik Botha was in Windhoek yesterday to have talks with the South West African leaders.

But the talks had been arranged before the Western contact group put its latest proposals to the internal parties, the Foreign Minister having promised to reserve South Africa's position until the internal parties had studied the Western plan.

That Mr Dirk Mudge, the chairman of the DTA, is worried about the plan's failure to stipulate how and by whom the constitution would be safeguarded once independence is achieved, is well-known.

But that does not mean that the DTA is heading for a serious clash with South Africa, since South Africa may have similar reservations.

Besides, South West Africa cannot be looking for any confrontation with South Africa at this delicate point in the negotiations.

We did say it was the silly season, didn't we?

SPEAKER DISCUSSES, DEFENDS GOVERNMENT APPROACH

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 31 Oct 81 p 8

[Text] THE South African government was presently looking into the possibility of making the policy of homeland linkage for urban Blacks "more meaningful in the confederated context," the Minister of Internal Affairs, Mr Chris Heunis, said last night.

Addressing the Houston World Trade Club in Los Angeles, Mr Heunis said the South African government might even consider other options within the confederal framework.

"It is against this background that the South African government has committed itself to a careful scrutiny of existing policies within the parameters of our principles, resources and assumptions.

"The reforms and changes to date are in themselves creating new challenges, not only on the country's resources but also on the qualities of leadership.

"It goes without saying that without good leadership any system, how good it may be, is doomed to failure."

Mr Heunis said the question arose as to whether the government was correct in taking ethnic pluralism into account in its endeavours to shape government policy in South Africa.

"I believe we are, because it should never be overlooked that we are in Africa, our problems are African and the solutions must therefore also be consistent with the realities of Africa," he said.

A fourth black state (Ciskei) would become independent in December, after which these independent states could start negotiating agreements to join the RSA in a southern African confederation of states.

Six other national states were self-governing, and in order to solve and settle the problems of meaningful accommodation of the Coloured and Asian populations, the President's Council had been established and would, according to schedule, table its proposals next year.

This would, hopefully, lead to a better dispensation for those population groups.

Mr Heunis said the alternative of one-man, one-vote was unworkable in Africa, and the greater majority of African states had discarded this formula. There were in fact no fewer than three military dictatorships, 11 one-party totalitarian states and 22 one-party "democracies" on the continent, that now had 54 states.

"Some people may now contend that we in South Africa are not seeking the common will, this is not true," the Minister said.

"We are seeking it through the multitude of joint structures that have already been set up, and that will further increase in future, and that are engaged in the political business of consultation and dialogue.

"The President's Council is one such institution. There are many others, while the confederation will produce still some more."

Mr Heunis said South Africa harboured the "first", "second" and "third world" at once. However, there was a difference . . . " a crucial one for the better understanding of our problems, and that is that the gap between our "haves" and "have-nots", our "first" and "third" peoples, is in fact narrower than the global gap.

"But despite the discrepancies in standards of living, the distribution of wealth and the provision of basic needs, the situation is far more positive than elsewhere, because while the global gap between the north (the first world) and the south (the third world) is widening (and World Bank statistics prove this), ours is narrowing." —Sapa.

TRANSMISSION PLANT AIMS FOR FULL LOCAL CONTENT BY 1984

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 81 p 25

[Article by Peter Moscardi: "Fillip for Local Engines"]

[Text] SOUTH African-made engines on their own could not provide continuation of the country's road transportation infrastructure, says Dr Willem de Villiers, executive chairman of Gencor.

Dr De Villiers was addressing a function to mark the official opening of the new plant of AS Transmissions and Steerings at Boksburg last week.

"Suitable transmissions are equally essential and this company was commissioned by the Gencor group to produce specialised transmission systems and expand further into this demanding high-technology sphere," he said.

Independent

As Transmissions and Steerings (Astas) will be assisted in the project by Daimler-Benz Aktiengesellschaft of Stuttgart, with the licensors and fellow shareholders of the Boksburg company being Zahnradsfabriek Friedrichshafen Aktiengesellschaft, the largest independent manufacturer of transmissions in Europe.

"The price impact of our gearboxes on a finished heavy truck will vary from a fraction of one percent to a maximum of 2,5 percent in certain cases.

"This is surely a small premium to pay for national independence on the 15 percent segment of the national heavy vehicle market which is our target area," he suggested.

Astas intended to achieve a 42 percent local content by this time next year, with 70 percent the following year and 100 percent by October 1984, said Dr De Villiers.

"Our facility has been planned to cater for the manufacture of 18 000 gearboxes as a first phase in local manufacture, representing a capital expenditure of R50-million."

The blueprints for the eventual facility for 100 percent local content on 30 000 gearboxes and 12 000 drive-axles had been completed, representing an estimated R120-million at present values and which were planned for commissioning over the longer term, he explained.

"Astas will provide job opportunities for about 800 people — of whom 400 will be Blacks and Coloureds from surrounding townships. Training of labour for semi-skilled jobs has been in progress since the beginning of the year," he said

Skills

Highly skilled workers were in short supply and would be supplemented by imported skilled workers on a contractual basis over the short to medium term.

"It is our group's policy to upgrade the basic skills of its labour force and training programmes and facilities have been provided," he said.

LOCAL LORRY PRODUCTION DESCRIBED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 31 Oct 81 p 3]

[Text] IT WAS of strategic importance that South Africa minimised its dependence on foreign countries for the supply of lorries, the Minister of Industries, Commerce and Tourism, Dr Dawie de Villiers said at Boksburg yesterday.

Opening a new plant of AS Transmissions and Steerings, he said the SA Government could not passively accept the United Nations boycott of the export of lorries to South Africa.

The decision by the UN in 1977 was mainly aimed at the supply of vehicles to the defence force and police, but it held far-reaching implications for the strategic and economic preparedness of South Africa, Dr De Villiers said.

Lorries and tractors performed a key role in the transport and production industry.

"You can imagine what the effect would have been on the country if the strategic needs of lorries had to be left to foreign countries," he said. "The Government could not remain neutral or passive against the decision by the UN.

"In the interest of the future of the country, it is essential that the Republic minimises its dependence on foreign countries for its supply of lorries."

The obvious answer was to go ahead with the local production of engines and transmissions. — Sapa.

MOSQUE INFIGHTING--A 24-year-old Muslim denied in the Durban Regional Court yesterday he was part of a group which attacked other Muslims at a mosque. Mr Mohammed Raffik appeared before Mr J J Augustyn with Mr Ahmed Raffik Deedat (25) and Mr Swalen Gaffur (22). The three have pleaded not guilty on charges of attempting to murder Mr Mohammed Bassa near the mosque on the morning of July 16 and assaulting seven other Muslims. It is alleged that the fracas in the mosque arose from religious differences between factions. Before Mr Raffik began his evidence, Mr Augustyn refused a defence application at the end of the State case for the discharge of the three accused. Mr Raffik told the court he was leaving the main hall of the mosque after prayers when he heard shouts and screams. In a smaller hall, he saw a crowd milling and pushing, and people hitting and kicking each other. He also saw sjamboks raised to strike. He did not see who the attackers were, nor who was being hit, because he was shocked to see such an incident in the mosque and wanted to leave. As he was trying to get out he was punched and he struck back. The case continues.--SAPA. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 29 Oct 81 p 11]

MINISTER AGAINST MIXED MARRIAGES--Durban.--The Reverend Charles Gordon of the Durban North Presbyterian Church has stated there will be no mixed marriages in his church. Mr Gordon, who is also moderator of the Durban Presbytery, told his congregation in a sermon last Sunday morning he would not conduct mixed-marriages services in his church. This was contrary to a recent instruction by the general assembly of the Presbyterian church for ministers to conduct such marriages in contravention of the Mixed Marriages Act. Approached later for comment, Mr Gordon said, he could see no point in asking ministers to break the law. However, he emphasised, he was not against mixed marriages and was determined to work for change in South Africa. But he would not be a party to civil obedience. Many members of Mr Gordon's congregation told THE CITIZEN they fully supported his stand on the Mixed Marriages Act. They admired his courage in saying that he would not be party to civil disobedience. One of his congregation told THE CITIZEN he hoped more ministers in the church would take a similar stand to that of Mr Gordon. He claimed the ruling body in the Presbyterian Church was out of touch with the views of ordinary parishioners on the issue. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 29 Oct 81 p 11]

SOWETO ECONOMIC BURDEN--Estimates of the cost of providing housing for low-income groups in Soweto from now till the turn of the century range from R20 000-million to more than R100 000-million. This was said by Mr Louis Rive, chairman of the Greater Soweto Planning Council, when he addressed the annual dinner of the Transvaal Society of Chartered Accountants in Johannesburg this week. "No government can make this type of money available on a sub-economic basis," he said. "The State alone cannot shoulder the burden. I am delighted at the initial intimation of the Viljoen panel of experts that the principle of greater private sector involvement has been accepted by the Government. "I am hopeful that the new dispensation that will now evolve will result in maximum private sector and community involvement." Mr River aid self-help was part of the Black man's cultural heritage and was a powerful force which should be harnessed to his own and the country's benefit. HNP VS. CISKEI PROPOSALS--The leader of the Herstigte Nasionale Party, Mr Jaap Marais, has attacked the latest consolidation proposals for the Ciskei. The Deputy Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr G de V Morrison, announced on Thursday that about 90 000 ha of land would be added to the Ciskei. Mr Marais said the Government had already announced two consolidation programmes, in 1972 and 1975. "Each time their proposals have been shown up as having acted wrongly, or unscientifically. No doubt they will also later announce further proposals to correct the latest ones as well." Mr Marais said while he had not yet had the opportunity of studying the plans in detail, it appeared the Government was trying desperately to make the Ciskei economically viable. To achieve this it was giving away highly developed and productive White farms, state forest reserves and the Kat River tobacco and citrus cooperatives. Mr Marais said the decision forced White farmers to take a painful decision: to sell out or find themselves at the mercy of the Ciskei.--Sapa. R100 MILLION FOR CISKEI--King William's Town.--Ciskeian national Development Corporation (CNDC) yesterday announced it had stimulated an investment of about $100-million and the creation of 10 000 employment opportunities in the Ciskei in just five years. The general manager of the CNDC, Mr F S Meisenholl said that when the corporation began its activities in April 1976, an investment of some R12-million had already been made in the Ciskei by the Xhosa Development Corporation. "Today the activities of the CNDC have already stimulated an investment (actual and contractually commited) in the Ciskei of R113,3 million," he said. He went on to say that if one considered that 12 100 jobs had been created as a result of the abovementioned investment, it could be seen that the cost per job opportunity was R9 363--low by any standards. The real impact of the entire development action must, however, be seen in its correct context. By applying a multiplying factor of one and a half jobs, which are created outside industry for every one created in industry, and multiplying this again by six--the average Ciskeian family--it can be seen that 96 000 people have directly benefited from an improved standard of living due to the CNDC's activities in the Ciskei. RAIN FOR MAIZE AREAS--South Africa's major maize producing areas need rain within the next week or two to ensure a good 1981/82, September to April, crop, National Association of Maize Producers' Organisations general manager Pieter Gouws says. He told Reuters by telephone from Bothaville, Orange Free State, very little maize had been planted in the main growing region, where plantings usually stretch from mid-October to mid-November, because of dry conditions. Gouws said, however, if widespread rains fell in the next week or so, prospects for the 1981/82 crops were good as there was already substantial sub-soil moisture in production areas. The agriculture department's final official estimate of last season's crop put maize output at a record 14.2-million tons, sharply up from 1979/80's actual outturn of 10,73-million. Gouws noted that last season's plantings were also delayed and that there was less sub-soil moisture at this stage last year. He said in the Northwest Free State and Western Transvaal, which together produce about 80 percent of the maize crop, very little maize had been planted. In the eastern production areas, however, which included the Eastern Transvaal and Natal and produced around 20 percent of the domestic crop, planting had proceeded more or less normally, he said. Where plantings have been deferred, producers need about 25 mm of rain in the next week or so to provide sufficient surface moisture to begin planting. TRANSKEI SOLDIER DEATHS--Libode.--Fourteen Transkeian soldiers were killed instantly and 39 injured when their army truck overturned at Gosshill, near Libode on Thursday night. The Transkei CID chief, Colonel Stan Funani, said the injured were taken to the St Barnabas Hospital, a few kilometres from the scene of the accident. He said the tragedy occurred when the truck, which was returning to Umtala from Lusikisiki, failed to negotiate a bend. A St Barnabas Hospital spokesman said 12 soldiers were admitted on Thursday night with serious injuries while 27 were treated and discharged. One of the seriously injured was later transferred to the Umtata Hospital intensive care unit.--Sapa. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 31 Oct 81 p 15]

VENDA POLICE STATION ATTACK--The Venda National Force, aided by members of the South African Security Police, were still combing the area in and around Venda yesterday in search of the terrorists who attacked the Sibasa Police Station on Monday night. The massive manhunt for the attackers, thought to number at least three, was originally hampered by bad weather. Adding to the searchers' worries is the fact that Sibasa is in a thickly vegetated, mountainous region. Helicopters and dogs are being used in the search, but so far no trace has been found of the terrorists, who used Russian-made AK-47 automatic rifles and hand-grenades in the attack. A spokesman for the Venda National Force, Colonel P J Nembambula, yesterday said it was difficult to tell if the terrorists had headed towards the Zimbabwe or Mozambique borders, either of which were only about 100 km from Sibasa. Constable R Maude and Constable M E Netshitungulu were killed in the attack. The condition of Constable M A Phadziri, who was seriously injured, was improving, Col Nembambula said. Const Phadziri was transferred to Pretoria's Kalafong Hospital. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 29 Oct 81 p 3]

CEMENT HOLDUP--The first shipment of cement--imported from Taiwan to relieve the crucial shortage prevailing in South Africa at present--failed to arrive at Durban yesterday as scheduled, due to the carrying vessel being delayed by heavy weather. This was confirmed yesterday by Hartley van Schalkwyk, general manager of the Cement Marketing Organisation. "The vessel was due to dock in Durban yesterday, but it failed to arrive. We understand that the delay has been caused by heavy weather at sea and we now hope that it will dock in about five days time," he said. It is understood that the vessel has about 14 1/2 thousand tons of cement, which it took on in Taiwan several weeks ago. Meanwhile another vessel has already left Taiwan and is bound for Durban with a cargo of cement of about the same quantity. "We have received information that the second vessel is actually ahead of schedule, said Mr Van Schalkwyk. The Cement Marketing Organisation, in conjunction with the cement producers, have stated that supplies of imported cement will be sold at the same price as the locally produced commodity. "It was decided that our customers should not be asked to meet the extra cost incurred by the importation, which will be borne by the CMO, he explained.--[Peter Moscardi] [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 81 p 24]

TIENTARABOUM DISCUSSES TRIP TO U.S., CANADA, UK

AB271310 Ouagadougou Domestic Service in French 2000 GMT 26 Oct 81

[Press conference by Upper Voltan Foreign Minister Felix Tientaraboum on his return from visits to the United States, Canada and Great Britain on 26 October--recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] Mr Minister, it is generally believed in Upper Volta that there has been very little information concerning the negotiations going on between Canada and our country. Since you personally led our delegation to these negotiations, can you tell us more about them?

[Answer] What is going on can best be described as exchanges of views between Canada and Upper Volta. There is no need for us to negotiate because there is no dispute between the two countries. We made this second visit to Canada in order to reach agreement on a program to be implemented in the coming years. This was the purpose of the recent meeting which took place in a very friendly atmosphere. Everything was done to make the Upper Voltan delegation feel comfortable, materially and psychologically. Without going into details, I can tell you that the results are beyond our expectations.

[Question] Mr Minister, we do not want to be inquisitive but can you tell us something about these results?

[Answer] [Passage indistinct] We cannot give you any details now but we can inform you that we went there with about 20 projects and more than 10 of them were accepted and will be financed. [passage indistinct]

[Question] Mr Minister, we know that your delegation also visited Great Britain. What can you tell us about this visit?

[Answer] Our visit to Great Britain was of particular significance [words indistinct]. As you know, Great Britain is a country of great technical and technological experience. As you also know, Great Britain is a great trading nation. [passage indistinct] We deemed it necessary, within the context of our open door policy, to make contact with that country. [passage indistinct] we must go out to meet people and not wait for people to come to us. [passage indistinct]

CMRPN SUSPENDS RIGHT TO STRIKE; UNIONS WARNED

AB020924 Paris AFP in French 1456 GMT 1 Nov 81

[Text] Ouagadougou, 1 Nov (AFP)--The right to strike has been suspended until further notice in Upper Volta, by decision of the Military Committee of Recovery for National Progress [CMRPN], headed by Col Saye Zerbo, head of state, the Upper Voltan Radio announced on Sunday.

In another development, Alexandre Zoungrana, minister of works and public service, on Satuday issued a strong warning to the Upper Voltan trade unions, notably the Voltan Trade Union Confederation [CSV], and Soumane Toure, its secretary general.

He stated that the government opposed any attempt at subversion when he met the secretaries general of the four central trade unions in the country (National Confederation of Voltan Workers, CNTV; Voltan Trade Union Confederation, CSV; Voltan Workers Trade Union Federation, USTV; Voltan Organization of Free Trade Unions, OVSL).

The minister's warning to the unions follows a recent meeting of the CSV's union council during which Soumane Toure strongly criticized the military authorities and the government for the restriction on trade union freedom in the country since 25 November 1981, date of the coup d'etat.

The CSV [words indistinct] deliberate restriction, we have initiated a struggle to demand the complete lifting of this restriction, Soumane Toure said. He also invited the other central unions to join the CSV to continue the fight.

CIVIL SERVANTS SALARIES ADJUSTMENT--It will be recalled that during the last cabinet meeting, the government examined the cases of the Upper Voltan workers. Concerning this point, Finance Minister Edmond Ky this morning received the press in his office in order to give more information to the public. Here is Mr Ky's statement to our colleague Oussoni Zorome: [Begin recording] As the government's spokesman said recently, the cabinet examined the case of the salaries of civil servants. This was because of the obvious fact that the civil servants' purchasing power has deteriorated because of the rise in prices observed during the period. The cause of this rise lies mainly in the petroleum products. As you know, fuels and petroleum products constitute strategic and rare commodities. Fuels and petroleum products are used in most sectors of the country's activities with the result that their very high prices have repercussions on the prices of services and products. In order to remedy this erosion of the civil servants' purchasing power, the government during its last meeting discussed this case and decided to readjust salaries during 1982. MUGABE BACKS DISTRIBUTION OF LAND TO PEASANTS

Need To Resolve Issue

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said yesterday that there can never be any peace in Zimbabwe until the peasants are given enough land.

He told a packed meeting of white farmers at the Centenary country club that although the Government was getting co-operation from the mainstream of commercial farming in its endeavours to acquire more land for redistribution, there were some recalcitrant elements.

"Some farmers are resorting to all kinds of tricks to circumvent Government policy. Land which is obviously unoccupied, is being occupied by the neighbouring farmer who regards land vacated some time ago as his own.

"I do hope that those of you with land to spare can allocate it to the State. We are not seizing it, but buying it from you and would like you to be understanding in this matter.

"We can never have peace in this country unless the peasant population is satisfied in relation to the land issue."

The Prime Minister urged farmers to assist the Government to promote the welfare of farm workers by paying the statutory minimum wage of $30 a month.

He said the Government would have wished to legislate for a higher minimum wage, but took the sympathetic view that commercial farming had been hard hit by the cumulative effects of war, droughts, thefts, and damage by animals.

"And yet there was not the same response from farmers to commitment to the minimum wage act as there was, perhaps, from the mining sector.

"Some farmers circumvented regulations in a variety of ways. They embarked on a policy of retrenchment. In other cases they decided to transform the position of workers from full-time to part-time so as to make the burden on wages lighter."

Mr Mugabe said this circumvention of Government policy on wages was only attributable to a minority of farmers.

The Prime Minister cited the shortage of machinery, spare parts, and fertiliser, as some of the difficulties faced by farmers.

Mr Mugabe said until the country was able to earn more money from its exports, the Government could not increase foreign currency allocations to all sectors of the economy.

Zimbabwe, he added, like other developing countries, did not determine the price of its export commodities.

The Prime Minister expressed optimism that present transport difficulties would be resolved within six months.

He said the Government inherited the problem of having too many locomotives in a state of disrepair. This was exacerbated by South Africa's decision to withdraw its locomotives from Zimbabwe.

"I am happy to say they are now considering giving 26 locomotives to us to use together with Zambia and Zaire."

Mr Mugabe also addressed an enthusiastic crowd of about 25 000 people at a rally in Sipolilo.

Racialism 'Must Be Stamped Out'

Mr Mugabe told white farmers at Centenary yesterday that while the Government was determined to maintain high standards in health and education, no racialism could be tolerated.

Expressing his views on the two issues the farmers cited as the most sensitive to them, Mr Mugabe made it clear that the Government's acceptance of private hospitals and schools did not compromise its stand against racialism.

He said while the Government would not interfere with existing private medical institutions, it was firmly opposed to the establishment of structures designed to preserve racial exclusivity.

"We are dismayed at attempts to circumvent policy by establishing a network of private hospitals in areas where there is an adequate supply of medical service.

"We are not opposed to individuals taking initiative to establish private institutions in areas where such amenities are scarce or non-existent."

He urged the white farming community to promote the "positive policy of reconciliation" by adopting practical measures to improve relations between the black peasant and white commercial sectors.

He assured white farmers that they were welcome to live in Zimbabwe, pointing out that if this were not the case, no incentives would have been offered to them.

Mr Mugabe thanked all those farmers who had responded to the call for higher productivity and for reconciliation and unity.

Land, The 'Driving Force'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 12

[Editorial: "Hunger for Land"]

[Text]

THE Prime Minister was speaking figuratively when he told farmers in Centenary that there could never be any peace in the country until the peasants are given enough land. All Zimbabweans, particularly those who live in the farming areas, are now enjoying freedom and tranquillity such as they have not experienced for years.

But Mr Mugabe was hammering home a point that has been made time and again. Land was the driving force behind the war. Land was the issue that dominated the Lancaster House conference. And it is the hunger for land that has created the squatter problem we are now experiencing on a national scale.

It is a hunger that must be satisfied. The message is clear for all to see.

Yet there are still some people who, for motives of greed, prejudice or whatever, do not want to see it. This is a highly dangerous attitude. The Government has an obligation to the people which it must fulfil. The pressures on Mr Mugabe and his colleagues are well-nigh irresistible.

So far the Prime Minister has taken a reasonable and patient line on the issue. He has made it clear that land will not be seized: it will be bought. And he has asked for co-operation and understanding from farmers. Let us hope that it will be speedily forthcoming from them all. There must be no more fiddling and feet-dragging.

The Government has treated the commercial farmers handsomely, and that policy has brought a rich harvest of benefits to both sides.

The flawed and twisted thinking of a recalcitrant minority must not be allowed to jeopardise the great progress that has been made. The people must have land. It is in the interests of us all to see that their genuine needs and aspirations are satisfied as soon as possible.

COMPLETION OF BEIRA-UMTALI PIPELINE SCHEDULED

Salisbury THE BUSINESS-HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by David Linsell]

[Text] MAJOR repairs to the Beira-Umtali pipeline will be completed by the end of this month and pumping of refined products will begin in early December.

"We are still on schedule for the completion of major works by the end of October," Lonrho Zimbabwe director Mr Ken Scheepers said this week.

As of Sunday night only 3 km of the 40 km stretch through the Pungwe Flats, which had to be replaced, needed wrapping. This is the equivalent of two days' work. The rest is all back in the ground.

"Whenever the pipe has had to be cut for handling purposes we only need four days to complete the final welding.

"Then pressure testing will commence. This will take between two to six weeks depending on whether any leaks are discovered. If all goes well this should be finished in a fortnight. Six weeks is being very pessimistic," said Mr Scheepers.

But before those tests can begin a 200 m stretch running through a minefield on the border between Zimbabwe and Mozambique has to be lifted out.

Although army engineers have cleared a right-of-way on either side of the pipeline they have now to clear a wider stretch.

Once this has been done replacement piping will be slotted in.

Mr Scheepers said that this was merely a precaution as the original 200 m section could have been damaged. It was better to be safe than sorry.

"Pumping station operatives are due to arrive during the next fortnight. Most are Portuguese and their work permits have been approved by the Mozambique Government," he added.

"So we are still looking to start up in December. Costs are also still within the project's $12 million budget."

Cleaning materials are to be pumped in at Beira in the first week in December. These are to be pushed up the pipeline by a shipment of diesel. Mr Scheepers said that the cleansing agents will take about two weeks to emerge at the storage tanks at Feruka refinery followed by 14 000 tonnes of diesel. It will take that long to fill the pipeline completely.

SHIPMENT

The actual size of the diesel shipment is not known, but it is likely to be more than 14 000 tonnes.

Meanwhile, conversion works linking the pipeline exit to storage tanks at the refinery are almost complete, according to Mr Bob Yeoman, general manager of Central African Petroleum Refineries Ltd.

"We are ready to receive the remaining crude oil still in the pipeline and we will be in a position to take refined products by the end of November," said Mr Yeoman.

Crude oil remaining in the pipeline between Maforga and Umtali is due to be discharged at Feruka by this weekend.

Negotiations between the governments of Zimbabwe and Mozambique on the question of royalty payments to the authorities in Maputo have still to be resolved.

The Mozambicans are understood to be still holding out for a tariff of $30 a tonne.

NO DECISION

Asked to comment on the stalemate a spokesman for the Ministry of Transport would only say: "No decisions have been reached. The matter is still under discussion."

As for the future of out-dated refinery there is no word either from the Ministry of Industry and Energy Development. Mr Yeoman said that CAPREF is still awaiting a decision. "We understand that the ministry and the Government are waiting for the World Bank energy report."

Senior ministry officials were not available for comment.

MUGABE REASSURES NATION ABOUT FUEL SUPPLIES

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 1 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] THE PRIME MINISTER, Mr Mugabe, yesterday assured the nation that there was no cause for anxiety about the fuel situation in the country.

Mr Mugabe, who was addressing local farmers and businessmen at Bindura High School yesterday afternoon, said that although he accepted that the beef industry had been hit by the fuel shortage, stocks were improving every day.

The shortage was not of the Government's making. South Africa had decided to tighten the screw on the country's transport.

The problem had been heightened by two derailments in South Africa and Mozambique, he said.

The Prime Minister assured farmers that their future depended entirely on themselves.

"The Government will not stand in your way. On the contrary, we shall stand by you, and there will be no conflict between us.

"Farmers need not have any fear about their future. As long as you comply with the Government's wishes we shall continue to hold you in our esteem."

On the transport problem, Mr Mugabe said the Government was working hard to improve the railway system. "In another year we shall have electrified part of it."

He added that 25 more locomotives would be available this month, and another 35 later to enable Zimbabwe to export its products.

"Until we are able to export the bulk of our products, there is bound to be a shortage of foreign currency," he said.

He encouraged farmers to plough as much land as they could and produce an abundant crop in the coming season.

He was delighted that those in the cattle industry were improving their stocks.

However, the national beef quota had not yet improved. This was posing difficulties to entry into the European Economic Community.

Earlier yesterday morning Mr Mugabe officially opened the Chindunduma Youth Academy at Camp Haven near Shamva.

The Prime Minister heaped praises on Danish Aid from People to People, and Swedish aid organisation SIDA, for their help in setting up and building the academy.

Addressing a second rally at Madziwa near Bindura soon afterwards, Mr Mugabe said the academy would be handed over to the local people when the refugee children brought back from Mozambique finished their schooling there.

The hand-over would start next year when Grade 1 children would enter Grade 2, thus providing vacancies for local children.

The Prime Minister said Chindunduma was built to a knowledge the gratitude felt by freedom fighters for the help they received from the people of the rea where the armed struggle started in earnest in 1972.

He said another national youth centre was being established in the area to train young people in various skills and to provide basic military training.

Vigilant

"Don't get frightened when you hear the sound of guns," he joked. "Those will be your children practising to shoot. You never know, we might need their military skills in the future."

Mr Mugabe, who was accompanied by Minister of State, Mr Emmerson Munangagwa, told the crowd of about 3 000 that the explosions at Inkomo Barracks had destroyed only the ammunition, but not the guns.

"They were the results of attempts at sabotage by South Africa," he said. "But they had also served to teach us to be vigilant all the time."

Turning to unity, he said, he was laying the ground for a merger between ZAPU and ZANU (PF).

"We must begin to look at Zimbabweans as one people, and not as separate tribes," he said.

"That is why we invited ZAPU to join the Government."

The Prime Minister attacked Government ministers who wished to employ in their ministries only those people who came from the same areas as themselves. "Pasi navo (Down with them)," he said.

"The Government must see itself as responsible for every Zimbabwean, irrespective of who they are, where they come from or which political party they belong to," he said. "It must cater for all in the same manner."

Also present were the Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Dr Sydney Sekeramayi; the Minister of Community Development and Women's Affairs, Mrs Teurai Ropa Nhongo; the Minister of Health, Dr Simon Mazorodze; the Deputy Minister of Works, Mr Rwizi Ziyenge; and the Deputy Minister of Youth, Sport and Recreation, Mr George Rutanhire.

Mr Mugabe addressed a third rally in Zvipadze, Bindura, where he later attended a fund-raising dinner dance.

PUBLIC WILL FEEL PINCH IN CUTS OF ALLOCATIONS

Salisbury THE BUSINESS-HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 pp 1, 4

[Article by Keith Atkinson, Angus Macmillan]

[Text] FOREIGN currency allocations in the commercial and industrial sectors, cut by just under 15 percent in the current quota period, are not expected to increase in the next six months.

At a recent meeting of the Import Control Policy Advisory Committee (ICPAC) members were advised by the Ministry of Trade and Commerce that there was an overall 10 percent cut in the allocation from the Treasury.

However there would be no cuts to essential commodies such as fuel, fertilizer, pharmaceutical products and service approved projects.

This means an effective cut for commerce and industry of 14.9 percent.

The meeting was also told that new projects requiring allocations would only be entered into if they were absolutely essential or export earning.

Christmas trade will not be affected, however, as the main impact of cuts on low priority and luxury goods will only be felt early next year.

Mr Bert Yarwood, president of the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries (CZI) believed one of the main reasons for the move was the transport bottle-neck, which had slowed down the export of high earning commodities.

He cited the example of crops, such as tobacco, manufactured products and steel.

"Because foreign exchange has not been generated by exports, we are faced with a cash flow problem," he said.

Mr Yarwood added that allocations had to be reserved for essential imports and there was unlikely to be an improvement in the first six months of 1982.

"However for the long-term good of this country, people should be willing to forego luxuries," he said.

Although commercial sector cuts have averaged 15 percent, non essential items have been far harder hit than those deemed necessary.

In some cases cuts have been total (100 percent), whereas in others they have been less than 15 percent.

A spokesman for the Ministry of Trade and Commerce gave the following examples of cuts in import allocations.

- Non-educational books and magazines — 47 percent.
- Tinned fish and non-essential electrical appliances — 100 percent.
- General photographic materials — 47 percent.
- Dried fruit — 33 percent.
- Scotch whisky — 30 percent.
- Sports goods — 28 percent.

The spokesman added that educational books and periodicals had not been seriously affected as they fell under a special reserve allocation.

All cuts were totally impartial and based on a priority rating devised by the Ministry of Commerce and Industry in 1975.

Importers were unanimous in their concern for the latest restrictions and said that the man in the street would feel the pinch.

Photographic suppliers, Kodak, said that their 47 percent cut from October 1, combined with a 5 percent reduction in the previous quota, had depleted their imports by 53 percent in the last four months.

"We are now getting about 40 percent of what we were importing at the beginning of the year and if this pattern continues, we may have to consider laying off staff," a spokesman said.

Electrical wholesalers, Corbett and Johnson, have had an overall cut of 20 percent on their wide range of spares and products.

As a company spokesman put it: "We now have an acute shortage in all our stocks and our customers will suffer."

Our Bulawayo correspondent reports that Philpott and Collins will be closing their bookstore in Salisbury at the end of the year because of the cuts.

A spokesman for the Book Centre said their allocation had been more than halved, but the effect was cushioned as the firm also has an educational section.

"We are OK for Christmas but I think the crunch will come in about March next year," he said.

The spokesman mentioned that his company had no policy of retrenchment of staff.

Mr Barney Pycroft, managing director of P M Barbour (Pvt.) Ltd, said the department store's allocation had dropped by 28,7 percent, and the effect would be felt in about six months.

He realised that some of the merchandise was low priority but other items were household goods which were not manufactured locally.

The general feeling of the commercial sector was expressed by one businessman who said, "What are import allocations?"

ONE-PARTY STATE ISSUE: CONTROVERSIAL BUT CRUCIAL

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 1 Nov 81 p 10

[Editorial: "One-Party State"]

[Text]

THE idea of a one-party state in Zimbabwe remains a topical and controversial issue. Indeed, it is a crucial issue.

The Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe, is well aware of this. A keen protagonist of the one-party system, he wisely avoids making a rash decision on the question and keeps flying the kite.

The intention, as we see it, is to expose the issue to the widest spectrum of intensive and extensive debate and scrutiny by informed, incisive minds, with a view to laying bare all the pros and cons of the matter. This is most desirable and indispensable for a wise decision.

The question of the one-party state is two-forked. The first is the idea of the one-party state per se — that is, its desirability or undesirability. The second is the modality — that is, the method of bringing it about.

We have no doubt about the desirability of the one-party system for our country, as for other African states and nascent nations. It is a question of values — and correct values, for that matter.

We believe that peace, unity and stability are supreme values for our country. They are the conditions for national development and happiness. They are easier to achieve in a one-party state than in a multi-party system.

The one-party system synchronises with the political culture, history and tradition of the African people.

It is a way to adapt the modern political form and make it intelligible and acceptable to the African people. The idea of people of the same country belonging to different groups is culturally incomprehensible among the African people. There is no such thing in their tradition and history.

Groups are hostile to one another; and they regard each other as enemies, and not rivals or opponents. Hence the constant fights among the followers of different parties.

It is perhaps these disruptive fights that the advocates of the multi-party system regard as freedom and democracy.

We agree with the Prime Minister's formula for bringing about the one-party system in Zimbabwe. Political leaders must come together, work out a formula for unity and sell it to their parties or to the people as a whole through a referendum.

We cannot over-emphasise the importance of a broad unity agreement encompassing all the viable and relevant shades of political persuasion. This will guarantee the peace, unity and stability our country needs for progress and prosperity.

The idea that the one-party system is a dictatorship and that democracy resides only in a multi-party system is a worn out myth that has long been exploded by political empiricism.

There is opposition in a one-party system, and removal of incompetent and dictatorial leaders is no more difficult than in a multi-party system.

Democracy means effective political participation in decision-making at grassroot level. The greater the base of participation, the deeper the level of democracy.

The Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole would be well advised to study further the merits and demerits of the one-party system vis-a-vis the multi-party system.

'NOTHING SINISTER ABOUT 5TH BRIGADE'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 p 5

[Text] THE formation of the Fifth Brigade was not for imposing the Government's plans for a one-party state, the Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office, Mr Emmerson Munangagwa, said yesterday.

Speaking during the debate on the Appropriation (1981-1982) Bill on the Ministry of Defence vote for $280 461 000, Mr Munangagwa said the Government had no programme for a one-party state.

He also denied suggestions by Senator Archie Wilson that the Korean - instructed Fifth Brigade had been formed to help Mozambique or to guard selected installations or persons.

Senator Wilson asked the minister to justify the expense of this new unit in light of the number of British military instructors already in Zimbabwe.

He asked how the Korean assistance compared with the British military aid and added: "I do not recall the Koreans, in isolation from the Chinese, having been successful in military operations."

The minister said that the Fifth Brigade had been formed to accommodate the two extra armies in the country after independence (ZIPRA and ZANLA). When the Prime Minister visited Korea, Zimbabwe was offered a grant of "military hardware" worth £12,5 million, he said.

The British training team in Zimbabwe was not equipped to do all the necessary training, and was already fully committed.

"Being a non-aligned country we have relations with countries in the West and in the East," said Mr Munangagwa, and to prove that Zimbabwe was fully non - aligned "we have the British training four brigades and the Koreans training the fifth".

Senator Wilson also asked the minister whether it was true that a Korean ship carrying military equipment for Zimbabwe had demanded rations and diesel fuel from the Government for the return journey.

Mr Munangagwa said there was an agreement between the two countries which covered the question of supplies.

The board of inquiry into the explosion at Inkomo Barracks had made its report to the Prime Minister, and he would make a statement on the issue "in the very near future", the minister told Senator Wilson.

He said that demobilisation had begun at the end of last month and 36 ex-combatants had been demobbed in that time.

This month the expected demobilisation figure was 700 and in November 1 000. "As we go on the figures will increase," said Mr Munangagwa.

The issue of double pay books being held by military personnel was also raised by Senator Wilson. The minister said the Government was "extremely concerned" about this, and "everything possible is being done to hunt down and trace" those guilty of drawing two salaries a month.

The pay for unattested personnel had been stopped with effect from September, he said.

The results of investigations into the affair would be available in six months, "bearing in mind that it has to examine approximately 70 000 accounts".

Military police had carried out a "nation-wide" survey to determine the extent of misuse of Government transport, and abusing their authority.

The minister told Senator George Hartley that the Government did not "advertise the composition of its army headquarters. In my view I do not think it is proper to state the composition of our defence headquarters in terms of the identity of officers."

Senator Hartley asked for the names and curriculum vitae of the officers as this had been normal practice in the past, he said. He also asked for the figures relating to the number of high-ranking army officers.

Mr Munangagwa said there were two lieutenant generals, three major-generals and 13 brigadiers, eight of whom had been commissioned by the present Government.

He said he would like to "correct the impression" that black officers had been promoted at the expense of whites. "With promotions in the army, if we look at the proportions of those promoted since we came to power, putting ZANLA and ZIPRA on one side, and the former Rhodesian army on the other, the people to complain would be ZIPRA and ZANLA."

He said the two guerilla armies were larger than the former Rhodesian army, and integrating the three armies had also meant integrating the three commands. This necessarily involved the commissioning of guerilla commanders, "but not the former Rhodesian army officers because they were already commissioned".

The purpose of the army was not just for war, and the Government was introducing a new concept of the army in which it would participate in the economic endeavours of the country.

"This cannot be achieved overnight, but we believe our army commanders are doing everything possible to realise this objective," he said.

He told Senator Hartley that army vehicles could not be used to carry agricultural produce like fertiliser because the army itself was short of transport.

Senator Terence Oatt asked the minister how many members of the military forces had been integrated into the national army to date.

There were 39 battalions integrated and three in the process, Mr Munangagwa said. — Zana.

CANADIAN AID WILL BUY LOCOMOTIVES

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] CANADA is to provide Zimbabwe with more than $12 million in soft loans to buy locomotives and other urgent needs, the Canadian Secretary of State, Mr Mark MacGuigan, announced in Ottawa recently.

He said that more than $3 million of the total amount would be provided through the Canadian International Development Agency for the purchase of five locomotives and related spare parts.

Mr MacGuigan also said that the Canadian locomotives—to be delivered during the first half of 1982 — would help Zimbabwe move its exports more efficiently

He added that the Canadian International Development Agency would also provide a soft loan for more than $8 million to Zimbabwe for the purchase of Canadian graders, combine harvesters, fertiliser, veterinary supplies, rural electrification equipment and irrigation equipment.

INFRASTRUCTURE

"Under the terms of the line of credit, the Canadian goods are to be purchased over the next four years. They are to assist Zimbabwe to develop new and rehabilitated infrastructure in rural areas," he said.

He said the Canadian aid was in line with its pledge at Zimcord to assist Zimbabwe and he disclosed that Canada's assistance would be in the reconstruction, rural development, agriculture, power, transport and mineral development fields, according to a statement released by the Canadian High Commission in Salisbury.

GDR TEAM DUE SOON TO SIGN TRADE ACCORD

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 4

[Text] A MAJOR trade agreement will be signed in Salisbury on Monday between Zimbabwe and the German Democratic Republic.

The agreement will be signed by the German Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade, Mr Friedmar Clausnitzer, who is due to arrive in Salisbury at the weekend.

The head of the visiting seven-member trade delegation from the GDR, Mr Wolgang Bruckner, said discussions were currently under way with Government officials to finalise details of the agreement.

Mr Bruckner said his country was interested in participating in Zimbabwe's economy on the basis of the possibilities existing in the GDR and on the willingness of the Zimbabwe Government.

"It is the aim of our delegation to talk to officials from different ministries to identify the possibilities of economic co-operation and also agree on working steps to be taken within the framework of that co-operation," he said.

Mr Bruckner added that there was "good scope for developing the already existing warm political relations into the economic field". He said that during the recent visit to the GDR by the Minister of Industry and Energy Development, Dr Simba Makoni, agreement had been reached on possible GDR participation in the fields of agriculture, rural resettlement, irrigation and rural electrification.

Mr Bruckner said that although Zimbabwe's economic structures were "comprehensive and encouraging", the problem of transport was "the main bottleneck" to slowing economic growth.

ASSIST

Asked whether the GDR could assist Zimbabwe in the transport field, Mr Bruckner said: "If the Government of Zimbabwe asks us to take part in improving the transport system, we will be prepared to analyse the requirements and enter into joint operation".

He said his country was also helping improve the transport system in Mozambique, including the provision of port facilities to improve the Beira and Maputo harbours.

Mr Bruckner, who is also the GDR director-general in the Ministry of Foreign Trade, said these developments would go a long way towards easing Zimbabwe's transport problems.

He added that discussions were being held to pave the way for GDR participation in SADCC projects.

Mr Bruckner said that SADCC was a "very important organisation" which would bring "the progressive people in Southern Africa closer together and strengthen the economic base of member countries". — Ziana.

SOUTH AFRICAN PRICES SEEM HARMING MAIZE SALES

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 p 15

[Text] THE chairman of the Grain Producers' Association, Mr Bill Francis, yesterday expressed fears that Zimbabwe may lose its maize export market to South Africa if it does not establish a reliable transport system.

In an interview he said South Africa was trying to undercut Zimbabwe by selling its maize at "a cheaper price than ours".

The move, he said, was "a systematic campaign" aimed at strangling Zimbabwe economically.

He said South Africa had taken advantage of its reliable transport system and reduced its grain export prices so that it could have more buyers than Zimbabwe.

"There is a growing competition among grain producing countries because each one wanted to sell its grain as quickly as possible," he said.

But Zimbabwe could not afford to reduce its grain export price because it was paying heavily on transport costs due to the lack of reliable transport, a problem which was created by South Africa itself, he said.

"We, unlike the South Africans have to hire our own transport to deliver the maize to markets and we just cannot afford to reduce our prices, otherwise, we would be running at a loss," said Mr Francis.

He added that South Africa was buying its maize from the producers at $95 a tonne and selling at $90 a tonne to export markets.

This figure was highly subsidised by the South African Government, he said.

Mr Francis said the Grain Marketing Board was buying the maize from the producers at $120 a tonne.

And the average price of Zimbabwe's export grain is estimated at $154 a tonne.

Mr Francis admitted the Zimbabwean price was high and there was a scramble for markets between the two countries.

"The South Africans have been competing with us in selling maize to Zaire, but we have been beaten because we have not got the wagons to send to Zaire," he said.

However, the only advantage was that politically, Zimbabwe was more accepted than South Africa.

"But we're still threatened until a reliable transport system is found," Mr Francis said.

The deputy representative in Zimbabwe for the World Food Programme, Mr Desmond Taylor, said fears that most African countries would be forced to buy South African maize because it was cheaper, were unjustified.

"Most of their maize is yellow and it is not in high demand in many countries," he said.

Besides, African countries would prefer to buy maize from Zimbabwe than South Africa because of the latter's racial policies.

Mr Taylor said Taiwan was now South Africa's biggest buyer of maize, while Zimbabwe sold its maize to Tanzania, Mozambique, Angola, Zambia and would soon start shipments to Mali and Senegal.

He admitted that the shortage of locomotives was the main reason behind the high prices and that this would in the long run force other countries to look elsewhere for grain.

COMMENTARY ON NEED FOR GRAIN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 p 14

[Editorial: "Against the Grain"]

[Text] THE world is heading for a record wheat harvest this year — but this, regrettably, does not refer to Zimbabwe, which faces a deficit and must import this vital product.

This year provides a disappointing chapter in the wheat story. Twenty years ago hardly any was planted, but by 1976 there was self-sufficiency and a surplus for export. Now, there might be a flour shortage.

There is plenty of maize, but that is not an adequate substitute. For lower-income families bread is the second highest item in the food budget, after meat.

Because wheat requires irrigation, it is initially expensive to produce. But the need to provide water brings other benefits to the farm and the workers. But farmers have not been finding wheat a profitable crop, so production has been declining while consumption is rising.

The experts have all the figures: About 40 000 hectares are under wheat this season. Another 10 000 ha need to go to wheat each year to a total area of 200 000 ha. This would give jobs to 800 000 people.

Irrigation costs are $2 000 a hectare, so 10 000 would cost $20 million a year. This may sound like a lot of money, but it is a paltry sum compared with the extra food, and the extra employment, that would result.

The need is to translate the statistics into grains of wheat. But what is being done?

The Minister of Agriculture said two weeks ago that plans had to be made now to increase local production. These plans must be ready in time for farmers to plan before the next planting season, so that the country can get back to the 1976 position.

Zimbabwe should be an exporter, not an importer, of wheat.

PM SAYS SOUTH AFRICAN TRADE LINKS TO REMAIN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

GLENDALE.

TRADE links with South Africa will continue, even though the Pretoria Government is trying to strangle Zimbabwe economically, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, told white farmers here yesterday afternoon.

"We know they are doing this because we have denounced their political policies but we shall not stop criticising until they have abandoned these inhuman policies," the Prime Minister said.

Commenting on Zimbabwe's transport problems, Mr Mugabe said the situation was expected to improve within the next six months.

Zimbabwe had been badly hit, especially by the shortage of railway locomotives which had affected overseas markets. "I must admit this problem has been with us for a long time but we hope it ends in six months."

He said Zimbabwe was buying locomotives which would be used to clear the backlog of maize to export markets, "but this is only a temporary measure as we intend to switch from diesel to electricity."

On the question of fuel, Mr Mugabe told the farmers that the reserves in the country had improved recently. There was a satisfactory amount of diesel, he said, and assured them that there was no need to panic. "The reserves we have now are better than they were three weeks ago."

Mr Mugabe, who was replying to a farmer who said the shortage was affecting farming, assured them that whenever there was a shortage farmers would get priority.

The Prime Minister said the Government attached great importance to farmers and he assured them of a bright future in Zimbabwe as long as they conformed to Government policies.

"I want to assure you that your future in this country is bright as long as I am in power." — Ziana.

COUNTRY HIT BY DRUGS SHORTAGE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] ZIMBABWE is critically short of prescription drugs — particularly those for dealing with hypertension — leading pharmacists in Salisbury confirmed yesterday.

One pharmacist said there was a shortage of all types of drugs, but Protension and Brinidon, the two most important in treating hypertension, were the most scarce.

Doctors tried to find substitutes, but the patient's body did not always agree with the alterrative drug.

"A patient's blood pressure may go up or down depending on how he reacts to the drug. He has to go back and forth to the doctor until a suitable alternative is found."

Most of the pharmacists contacted said the shortage had lasted for over a month — the longest period they had experienced.

The Minister of Health, Dr Simon Mazorodze, said in Parliament on Tuesday that the demand for hypertension drugs had increased, but the situation was under control.

He said the drug companies were trying to meet export obligations as well as supply the domestic market.

The main reason for the shortage of drugs was the lack of foreign exchange.

Another pharmacist said there was a shortage of pre-natal vitamins for pregnant women and doctors had instead prescribed a one - month supply of multi-vitamins, hoping that the shortage would be over before women ran out.

"When I don't have what they need, they just have to shop around until they find what they want."

The pharmacist said he had not known as serious a drug shortage since he arrived in the country in 1974.

He submitted an order of 35 drugs to a wholesale company and only two were in stock. But the shortage was expected to improve in a few weeks.

UNITE FOR PROGRESS, ZAMBEZI FOLK TOLD

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 8

[Text] THE Minister of Local Government and Housing, Dr Eddison Zvobgo, yesterday urged people in the Zambezi Valley to unite and help resettled families.

Addressing the Doma people and other residents of Chapoto in the Kanyemba area, near the border with Zambia, Dr Zvobgo said: "Through unity and self-reliance, this valley can be turned into a flourishing intensive farming area."

The valley was fertile and had several rivers which made it ideal for commercial farming, he said.

"I have been sent by the Prime Minister, to get first-hand information on the problems facing you," said the minister. "During our tour of Matabeleland north and south, we saw the social life and problems of the people who live there. That's why I have come here to get information on your own problems."

He said he would see the ministers of health and of education and urge them to send professionals to work in the valley and help the people.

The area has only one clinic with one trained nurse. The ministers concerned will be asked to deploy more staff to the area.

Food supplies and clothing will be sent through the district council in the area. — Zimbabwe Information Services.

HANSARD RUNS INTO PRINTING SNAGS

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 1 Nov 81 p 6

[Text] THE daily Parliamentary and Senate report, Hansard, has run into a new problem — a printing crisis.

Government Printers can no longer cope with the reports because of other Government printing demands and an acute shortage of skilled staff, particularly compositors.

Hansard is already in trouble because of a shortage of shorthand writers.

The compositors have left because of better pay in the commercial printing field. The normal complement of 15 to 20 compositors is down to only three.

Commercial printers have already been asked to tender for the Hansard contract, but it is understood few are interested.

Most firms already have a full work load and are said to be reluctant to undertake a contract with the exacting daily deadlines demanded by Hansard.

Although the print order is small — fewer than 2 000 copies — the major problem is the speed of type-setting.

One firm interested, however, is ZANU (PF)-owned Jongwe Publishing Company, which launched operations at the beginning of September.

A Parliamentary spokesman said last week: "It is no secret that Government Printers have problems, but no firm decision on Hansard has yet been made."

A meeting of senior House of Assembly and Senate staff to discuss the printing issue would be held soon, he said.

Officials had been awaiting the return of President of the Senate Mr Nolan Makombe from the Parliamentary conference in Fiji and Speaker of the House of Assembly Mr Didymus Mutasa from his six-week tour of Cuba and the United States.

Jongwe managing director Mr Gordon Tollins said last week that a quotation for the Hansard contract had already been lodged.

He anticipated no problem meeting the demanding production deadlines.

"We have one of the only two photo-type setting machines in commercial use in Zimbabwe. It works at very high speed," he said.

Mr Tollins said Jongwe had already run off several books since September, and would soon take over printing the ZANU (PF) party monthly, Zimbabwe News.

Announcing the launching of Jongwe in August, the party's acting secretary for publicity Dr Eddison Zvobgo, said the firm would also publish a new weekly newspaper in Shona, Ndebele and English.

Last week the Australian Government offered to help solve the acute shortage of shorthand writers by providing scholarships to Zimbabweans for a 10-month Hansard training course at the Canberra College of Advanced Education.

'TRANSPORT SNAGS CAUSED CURRENCY CUTS'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 8

[Text] ZIMBABWE'S transport position has forced the Government to make foreign currency allocation cuts in certain quarters, the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr Moses Mvenge, said yesterday.

Mr Mvenge, on a tour of Philpott and Collins site in Salisbury, said this year's tobacco prices for sugar and other crops had been lower and this had lessened the country's overall availability of foreign currency.

As a result, allocations had been reduced by 10 percent, with some cuts in the commercial sector being as much as 15 percent.

"But we hope that as soon as our transport situation has improved we will be able to increase the allocation," Mr Mvenge said.

The deputy minister was briefed in the company's boardroom and then toured the factory.

Later he held talks with members of the workers' committee. He said he was satisfied with the benefits the group was offering its workers.

Mr Woody Hornbuckle, for the group, said the firm was diversifying. Stationery and general books had fallen away and they would concentrate on educational books.

All the workers would be absorbed into the education side, he said. There would be no redundancies.

The deputy minister, who also visited the Sinoia Street showroom of the group, was accompanied by the Under-Secretary for Import Control, Mr E. W. Wells.

CHURCHES REACT TO CHAVUNDUKA'S ACCUSATIONS

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 1 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] IF the President of Zinatha, Professor Gordon Chavunduka, could remove the evil aspect of the n'angas by stopping them from accusing innocent people of being witches or wizards, he would have done his country a great service.

This was the view expressed by Zimbabwean churches last week when they outlined their declared policy with regard to Zinatha and its functions.

Anglican, Methodist, Roman Catholic and United Methodist churches were reacting to Dr Chavunduka's accusations a fortnight ago that they were engaged in a campaign to discredit the n'anga organisation.

All four churches said that while they fully accepted the success of herbs in curing diseases, they were, however, totally opposed to Zinatha's encouragement of superstitious beliefs and witchcraft.

They agreed that as long as members of Zinatha continued to encourage superstition and witchcraft, the Christian church would remain in conflict with the organisation's activities.

The Anglican Bishop of Mashonaland, The Right Rev. Peter Hatendi, said his church's policy towards n'angas was positive, depending on the definition of a herbalist.

If the n'anga was an expert on the medicinal properties of certain herbs, roots or leaves, the church had no quarrel with him.

But the major area of disagreement was where the n'anga divined all illnesses as having been caused by hatreds or jealousies.

FINGERS

"No n'anga ever divines the causes of illnesses as being disease viruses or germs," he said.

"Without exception, they personalise the causes and point accusing fingers at their patients' neighbours, relatives, friends, wives or husbands.

"It is that aspect of the n'anga which should never be tolerated, and which should be wiped out from our country if communal harmony is to be achieved," he said.

Because of n'angas' accusations of witchcraft, he added, brother had turned against brother, son against mother and husband against wife.

Worse still, too many murders emanated from false accusations of witchcraft.

"To do a great service to his country, Professor Chavunduka must himself embark on a campaign to convince his followers to do away with superstitious beliefs," he said.

The president of the Methodist Church in Zimbabwe, Rev. Caspen Makuzwa, said his church had never worked against n'angas as herbalists, but was totally opposed to superstition.

On Dr Chavunduka's assertion that churches were against n'angas because they feared losing their congregations, Mr Makuzwa asked whether the professor intended to turn Zinatha into a religion.

"There could never be any rivalry between the church and Zinatha because belonging to a n'anga organisation did not mean belonging to a religion.

"It is merely a healers' association, just like so many other associations in the country," he said.

The leader of the United Methodist Church, Bishop Abel Muzorewa, said herbalists had existed from time immemorial. There was no question of his church working against Dr Chavunduka's organisation.

AZ STANDARDS WILL BE MAINTAINED, ASSURES MINISTER

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 p 5

[Text] ANYONE who doubts the ability of the former guerillas who trained to become pilots "needs to have his head examined", the Minister of Transport, Mr Josiah Chinamano, said.

During the seven-year bush war a number of friendly countries had offered to train some of Zimbabwe's young people as pilots, "and we selected from our cadres young men who had the aptitude". He added that he was "quite satisfied" that those chosen not only received the best training but also responded very well to that training.

"Anyone who doubts the ability of these young men in this field needs to have his head examined," he said to applause from several senators.

"I just cannot accept the innuendo that some of these young people trained outside are not skilled enough to fly planes in Air Zimbabwe."

The minister also told the Upper House that although Air Zimbabwe was willing to give pilots trained outside the country the "further experience and further training" they needed, the airline did not have the facilities for doing so.

As a result some of these people would be sent abroad for further training, he said, adding that at least nine would be going to Greece next month and that "France will soon be taking a number of our young people for training in air traffic control".

The minister assured the House that standards would be maintained and that selection of trainees would be based on merit alone.

Commenting on the possibility of a new international airport in Salisbury, Mr Chinamano read from an investigative report which said that because of more immediate demands on Zimbabwe's funds, particularly for rural development, "an early construction of a new terminal is out of the question".

The report suggested, instead, the expansion of existing facilities.

On the transport problem, the minister said everything possible had been done not only to ease the situation but also to circumvent a similar crisis in future.

"We feel that with the measures we have taken, by the beginning of next year our transport problems will be over."

He warned that if the South Africans, who had "for reasons best known to themselves" withdrawn their locomotives from Zimbabwe, tried to "twist our arms politically", they would "find us firm".

PAPER MILL EXPANSION TO REDUCE SHORTAGES

Salisbury THE BUSINESS-HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 pp 1, 4

[Text] THE rebuilt $2.5 million paper making machine at the Norton mill of Hunyani Paper and Packaging Ltd was officially commissioned by Mr John Nkomo, Deputy Minister of Industry and Energy Development, on Tuesday.

In his address Mr Nkomo said there would be many benefits as a result of the machine's commissioning.

There would be employment benefits as the paper and timber industry was highly labour intensive.

The mill would also help to alleviate the shortage of paper, particularly for printers, publishers and government departments.

The Deputy Minister added that the mill could provide paper for export which was one of the factors that convinced government to allocate foreign exchange to the project.

The No 1 paper machine (PM1) was installed in Norton in the early 1950's producing the first brown kraft paper for the country. The PM 3 machine, which is more than twice the capacity was added in the 1960's.

Mr Chris Molam, general manager of the mill, said that due to political events the mill was forced to close down the PM 1 in 1975.

"During sanctions it was necessary for us to utilise many components from the PM 1 to improve performance of PM 3.

"A partial rebuild was started but was never completed," said Mr Molam.

As a sign of good faith in Zimbabwe, the go ahead was given to refurbish the machine. Commerce and industry and the Government granted the necessary foreign exchange, contractors were appointed and work began early last year.

"It was an extremely difficult task to refurbish an old machine with the problems of continuity of skills, transport bottlenecks for imports, and procurement of imported items which were becoming more scarce in growing Zimbabwe," said Mr Molam.

The project took longer to complete and cost more than was planned, but the alternative of importing a new machine would have cost more than double.

The machine cost $2.5 million of which $1 million was for imported parts, $800 000 for locally produced components, and $700 000 in labour costs.

The annual capacity of the mill to produce kraft papers will increase from 28 000 tonnes to more than 45 000 tonnes when PM 1 reaches full capacity.

Mr Molam said: "The extra capacity will allow development of exports, particularly to those SADCC neighbours who can pay."

At present there is a $100 000 export order and potential exports could earn $4 million a year.

However, these efforts were hampered by the lack of an export incentive scheme, which was scrapped last year, said Mr Molam.

Further drawbacks were escalating inflation in the costs of labour, materials and power which are reducing margins to negligible proportions in the highly competitive export markets.

On the local front some markets were threatened by substitute products.

An intensive training scheme for the machine operators was mounted as more than 80 jobs were created by the addition of PM 1.

Every position was filled by internal training and promotion from within and the recruiting of local Zimbabweans to fill in from below, said Mr Molam.

"The production crews are comprised of Zimbabweans with only one exception. We have blended experience across the two paper machines and it is significant that over the weekend we produced as much good quality paper in 24 hours as we have ever produced," he said.

One of the uses of the quality paper will be for school exercise books, of which there has been a critical shortage.

Mr Nkomo mentioned that the project was a result of the co-operation between the Government and private industry.

Referring to manpower training, the deputy minister said the Government did not want the situation to arise where for every machine imported it would be necessary to bring in technicians from abroad.

He also expressed the hope that management and employees at the mill would work together in a healthy atmosphere.

BRIEFS

RAIL CONTRACT--A local electronics firm, Radio Frequency Communications, is involved in a communications project for the electrification of the Salisbury to Dabuka railway line. The initial project is to connect about 40 stations and sidings, providing communications in UHF frequency for control of locomotives on the route and for maintenance purposes. Started in April last year, the company has handled contracts worth about $2 million and has recently opened technical workshops to provide a spares and back-up service for its clients, says its managing director, Mr Roger Capper. Specialising in systems design engineering, telecommunications and audio technology, it also has offices in Swaziland, Malawi and Zambia. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 29 Oct 81 p 4]

UNION CHIEF ATTENDS TALKS --The secretary-general of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, Mr Albert Mugabe, leaves Salisbury today to attend an international labour conference in New Delhi. The conference, which will be attended by nonaligned countries from Africa, Asia, South America and Europe, is to discuss the promotion of worker participation and self-management in industry. It is being organised by Yugoslavia's International Centre for Managing Enterprises in the Public Ownership. Yugoslavia has long been regarded as a pioneer in the field of socialist self-management of industrial workers. Mr Mugabe said yesterday that the conference would be of special benefit to developing countries wishing to improve prosperity by involving workers in every aspect of industrial life. BONN ENVOY--West Germany is trying to promote free world trade because protectionism is on the way out, the Ambassador to Zimbabwe, Dr Richard Ellekmann, said in Salisbury yesterday. A global division of labour and markets open to foreign products was the best way to overcome poverty in the world, he said. Addressing more than 500 students at the Highfield Community School annual prize-giving ceremony in Salisbury, Dr Ellekmann said Germany was prepared to change its economic policies to suit world needs. The growth of West Germany's "miracle" economy since 1950 was based on private enterprise with strict measures to help those in need, he said. Dr Ellekmann said that as in other industrialised countries, however, West Germany was experiencing major constraints on its economy, which included: A high rate of unemployment affecting about 1,4 million people; The world-wide energy crisis which caused a deficit of DM26 million ($8,2 million) in 1980 due to rising oil prices. Speed restrictions and taxes caused a reduction of 15 percent in oil demand which led to a cut in prices for the first time in 20 years; and Stiffer foreign competition. GERMANS STUDY FREIGHT SNAGS--The Central Association of the Road Transport Industry of West Germany is willing to give Zimbabwe technical and operational aid to ease the freight bottlenecks. In an interview yesterday, the association's president, Mr Heinz Herzig, said he was making a careful study of the problems and his association would try to find ways of solving the problems. He is leading a group of 74 members on a business and pleasure visit to Zimbabwe. The group first went to Namibia and fly on to Nairobi before returning home. The first secretary with the Federal Republic of Germany's Embassy in Salisbury, Mr Juergen Louis, said the visit showed the interest in Zimbabwe by West Germans. The West Germans were willing to help solve Zimbabwe's transport problems and the visit would also help the flow of tourists from West Germany, the leading tourist nation on earth, to this country. "This tourist drive is heavily supported by all parties concerned, especially the news media." The association's visit would help boost tourism because of the influence of members and by the very fact they were tourists. He said a recent visit by representatives of three leading German newspapers had led to very favourable articles on Zimbabwe's tourist potential. DA's WARNED--The Deputy Prime Minister, Mr Simon Muzenda, yesterday urged newly appointed district administrative officers and senior administrative officers not to get involved in the local politics of the areas they will be running. Mr Muzenda was speaking at a reception for 55 district administrators which was also attended by the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Dr Eddison Zvobgo. Mr Muzenda said if the new district administrators got involved in the local politics of their areas, they would not stay in the areas for a long time. Dr Zvobgo said people with very rare qualifications had been chosen to be district administrators. Many Third World countries' development plans failed because there were not people to administer the plans at grassroots level. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 3]

DELEGATION TO CHINA--The Deputy Minister of Community Development and Women's Affairs, Dr Naomi Nhiwatiwa, today heads a four-woman delegation on a two-week visit to China. The delegation has been invited to tour community projects by the All China Women's Federation. Before returning to Zimbabwe th women will visit Korea. They are expected back on November 18. BY-ELECTION CONTESTED--Two candidates are to contest tomorrow's Fort Victoria municipal by-election following the resignation last month of Councillor Sheila Simbi. The deputy mayor, Councillor Philip Debwe, said yesterday that Mr Lameck Gore, representing ZANU (PF), would challenge an independent, Mr Geoffrey Bwerinofa. "In the last municipal elections, all ZANU (PF) nominees for the council were elected unopposed and this will be the party's first challenge here," he said. NEW LOAN--A new Government loan floated by The Reserve Bank yesterday drew an enthusiastic response from many subscribers, it was announced. Soon after subscribers lists were opened at 9 am the loan was oversubscribed and the lists were closed. Oversubscription also led to a scaling down of applications of $1,5 million and over, to about 87,5 percent of the amounts for which the application was made. The Reserve Bank said in a statement that applications were received from a wide range of individual and private sector investors. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 8]

UANC RALLY BANNED--A UANC rally which was to have been held at Stanley Square, Bulawayo, on Sunday has been cancelled because the party failed to get ministerial approval. The rally was to have been addressed by the party president, Bishop Abel Muzorewa. A spokesman for the Ministry of Home Affairs said he was not at liberty to give reasons why ministerial permission was not granted or to divulge meetings that had not got ministerial approval. The ministry, however, announced that two political meetings will be held in the city on Sunday. ZAPU will hold a rally at White City Stadium and ZANU (PF) will meet at Sizinda Hall. POLICE OFFICER PROMOTED--A police senior assistant commissioner, Mr George Stewart, has been promoted to deputy commissioner, a police spokesman announced yesterday. Mr Stewart, who was born and educated in Southern Ireland, came to Zimbabwe in 1951 and later joined the police force. Since then, he has served in various stations in Bulawayo, Matabeleland, Salisbury, the police general headquarters and Manicaland. In recent years he has worked at the Morris training depot, and been Officer Commanding Manicaland Province and chief staff officer to the Commissioner of Police. TRAVEL INDUSTRY--Zimbabwe has aroused the interest of several members of the international tourist industry who will visit the country next month. A group of Malawian travel agents will arrive in the country for a one-and-a-half week tour on November 4 and will visit Great Zimbabwe, Kariba, Wankie National Park, Victoria Falls and Bulawayo, says a statement from Air Zimbabwe. A Canadian freelance travel writer, Mr David Wishart, arrives in Salisbury on November 5 to promote Zimbabwe's major tourist attractions through the North American trade and consumer Press. On November 6, a party of 14 Press, magazine and radio journalists will arrive from Holland for a 10-day visit on which they will familiarise themselves with the country's tourist resorts and the infrastructure of the tourist industry. Also arriving in November will be Mrs Gini Carroll, a travel consultant from Boston, and Mrs Caryn Leland from London. Both will visit Wankie and Victoria Falls. --Ziana. MERGER EXPLAINED--The Ministry of Agriculture yesterday issued a statement clarifying the merger of Conex and Devag into the new department, Agritech. Proposals for the ministry's new department were approved by the Prime Minister and the Public Service Commission and came into effect on July 1, the statement said. But the integration will take time to complete. Talks are taking place between the Ministry of Agriculture and the Ministry of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development. The merger of the two departments changed Conex to Agritech, the department of Agricultural Technical and Extension Services. It also closed Devag with the exception of certain posts which will now come under the Ministry of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development. New positions were simultaneously created within Agritech to cater for the expanded extension service, the statement said. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 81 p 13]

BLOWN BRIDGES POSE THREAT--Fears are growing that Zimbabwe's economy will be badly hit by the flowing up of bridges over the Pungwe River in Mozambique. All traffic to the Port of Beira has been halted since the South African-backed Mozambique Resistance Movement sabotaged both the road and rail bridges on Thursday. Much of Zimbabwe's tobacco and maize is being routed through Beira. Tobacco is the nation's biggest single foreign currency earner, outstripping any one mineral. The damage the sabotage inflicts on the Zimbabwean economy depends on how quickly the Mozambicans can repair the bridges. The Beira-Umtali pipeline slung under the rail crossing can be repaired in a week. Mr Bert Yarwood president of the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries, said: "The truth must be known--the dissidents in Mozambique are a grave threat to us." He added that there were hopes of Beira becoming the country's major outlet to the sea. "It's the quickest and cheapest way out," he stressed. "We can only hope that the bridges are quickly repaired." [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 1 Nov 81 p 1]

[Interview with Ange Patasse, former prime minister, by J. K.; in Belgium, date not given]

[Text] Ange Patasse, former prime minister of the Central African Republic under Bokassa, then exiled in Paris before the fall of the emperor, is one of the major political leaders of his country and a candidate for president. He came to Belgium to help establish relations between the two countries and to lay the foundations for improved cooperation. His country is now governed by military men who ousted President Dacko a few months ago. The military regime is a provisional one and is to make way for civilians as soon as possible. When will that be?

[Answer] For us, that must be as soon as possible. We are discussing the matter with General Kolingba. We propose that the presidential elections take place at the end of December.

[Question] It has been said that you were Qadhdhafi's man.

[Answer] That is not true. If I asked for asylum in Tripoli after the fall of Bokassa, it was in order to escape the pursuit of Giscard d'Estaing, who wanted to put Dacko in office and who feared that the people might follow me in my opposition. Giscard did not like me because under Bokassa, I often opposed projects that served the economic interests of France or those of the presidential family.

[Question] It was the French military that put Dacko in office. They are still there is large numbers (1,200). What do you think of that presence?

[Answer] It is not normal. I condemn the Barracuda operation, but for the time being, the French contingent can remain insofar as it protects us from an invasion by a neighboring country.

[Question] What country?

[Answer] Zaire. Mobutu dreams of conquering the Central African Republic.

[Question] Perhaps because he fears that Qadhdhafi will intervene?

[Answer] No, because he himself nourishes dreams of conquest.

[Question] Must you beware of Qadhdhafi? Does his presence in Chad worry you?

[Answer] Libya is an African country; you cannot reject it. As for Chad, it is a matter between the government in Ndjamena and that in Tripoli. I have nothing to do with it.

[Question] Qadhdhafi is criticized for wanting to destabilize Africa. He intervened in Uganda in an adventurous operation.

[Answer] The press tells all of that, but I do not know about it. In Uganda, I know that Amin Dada called him for help. It was not an invasion. Nor was it in Chad.

[Question] What do you expect from France now that Mitterrand is in the Elysee?

[Answer] I support the "new France." I hope that cooperation with Paris will develop and I even hope that there will be privileged relations between our two countries, on the condition that our independence is strictly respected. I believe that the "new France" will play an arbiter's role between the great powers. It will appear as the defender of the Third World and human rights. When Mitterrand was elected, the entire Central African population danced with joy because it considered that Giscard's defeat was also the defeat of Dacko, whom he had imposed on the people. Now that Dacko has been forced to resign, the people wait for a return to democracy and elections.

The army took power in concertation with us and its mission will be short-lived. We want all progressive and nationalist parties to come together for elections, which should lead to a government of national reconciliation. At any rate, there can be no question of the military remaining in power. I trust this army, which refused to fire on the crowds after the rigged elections that placed Dacko in the president's office and which did not execute the order given to it to arrest me. I know very well that some bad advisers are suggesting to the military to set up an undemocratic regime, but they will not be heeded. Moreover, the people would not accept such a thing.

BRIEFS

FORMER FOREIGN MINISTER ARRESTED--Moroni, 8 Nov (AFP)--The former Comoran minister of foreign affairs during Ali Soilih's regime, Mouzaqir Abdallah, was arrested in Moroni yesterday after being accused of attacking national security. Mouzaior Abdallah was arrested on his arrival in Moroni from France. According to Comoran authorities, Mr Mouzaoir clandestinely left the country last August on a plane procured for him by foreigners. The authorities also accuse him of engaging in subversive activities and attempting to plan a coup against the regime during his stay abroad, with the help of Yves Lebret, a former French colonist and Ali Soilih's roving ambassador. During this period, messages were sent by Mr Mouzaoir to many personalities to attempt to create a climate of insecurity in the country, the Comoran authorities add. OFFICIAL DISCUSSES SPANISH, SOVIET RELATIONS

Libreville L'UNION in French 13, 14 Oct 81

[Report on interview with Capt Felix Ondo Mba Nchama, commissioner of state for interior, by Obame Emane; date and place not given]

[13 Oct 81 p 5]

[Text] In an exclusive interview granted to the newspaper L'UNION before President Mbazogo made public the announcement of a constitutional referendum in Equatorial Guinea for 1982, Commissioner of State for Interior Ondo Mba Nchama talked of the political, economic and social situation prevailing in his country and of the new foreign policy of Equatorial Guinea.

The commissioner first of all noted that the international press deals with problems of Equatorial Guinea without considering the country's daily situation. He then added that Equatorial Guinean authorities recently held a meeting with the head of a large African periodical in order to clarify matters.

Speaking of the political situation in Equatorial Guinea, Ondo Mba Nchama said that following the "freedom coup" of 3 August 1979, which brought Lt Col Teodoro Obiang Nguema to power, the Supreme Military Council (CMS) had issued an appeal to all sons of the country who had "strayed" and those who had gone into exile under the reign of dictator Macias Nguema, asking them to return to Equatorial Guinea and participate in the national reconstruction task.

"There could be no legitimate opposition when we know that the leaders of the so-called foreign opposition are nothing more than bad Equatorial Guinean citizens motivated by the will to destroy...." In other words, for the CMS, "I do not know of any opposition," despite the failed conspiracy of April, planned by former Minister Moise Mba Ada. According to the commissioner, that abortive coup was the only event to trouble the tranquillity of Equatorial Guineans since the overthrow of the "Tiger" on 3 August 1979. The failure of the April coup, Ondo Mba Nchama continued, was marked by the arrest of nearly 200 persons, including some 40 junior officers and civil servants who were finally by and large released, while the real authors of the plot were sentenced by the courts, some to heavy penalties, others to average penalties of 6 months in prison, depending on the degree of involvement.

Opening and Tolerance

For the commissioner of interior, the statements by Moise Mba, the brains behind the plot, to the effect that his departure from Equatorial Guinea was brought about by his refusal to yield 30 percent of the capital of his import-export company to the son of the chief of state, are totally false. For Ondo Mba Nchama, Moise Mba is nothing but a swindler. He had already embezzled 500 million ekueles from the government when he was, under Macias Nguema, head of the National Solidarity Fund and before he fled to Spain. His return to Malabo, after the events of 3 August 1979, was made possible only thanks to the clemency and spirit of tolerance of the president of the CMS. The commissioner of interior emphasized that President Obiang Nguema has, since his coming to power in August 1979, opened the doors of Equatorial Guinea to all those who would like to work in a peaceful manner for the reconstruction of the country.

This attitude, which Minister Ondo Mba Nchama labels as a "foreign policy open to everyone" without ideological distinction, remains dominated by the resumption of good-neighbor relations between Equatorial Guinea and all bordering countries, particularly Cameroon and Gabon.

[14 Oct 81 p 5]

[Text] Equatorial Guinea first of all owes its new face to Spanish aid, which is manifested in administrative departments and education as well as in the security and organization of economic and commercial structures.

The quoting of the ekuele on the Madrid Stock Exchange, the prospecting for and working of mineral resources and hydrocarbons in particular, and the establishment of two joint ventures: GEPSA and GEMSA [expansions unknown], are concrete steps on the positive side of Spain's ledger.

In this struggle for national reconstruction, the CMS is also counting on the contribution of other countries that are friends of Equatorial Guinea, including the People's Republic of China, whose activities are essentially oriented toward telecommunications.

Concerning Soviet-Guinea relations, now at the lowest level, Ondo Mba Nchama recalled that Equatorial Guinea is open to all those that would like to help the CMS rehabilitate the country's economy, an "after-Macias" economy which, one must admit, will be difficult to restore. Cacao production (40,000 tons before independence) is still around 8,000 tons, although 80 percent of the plantations have returned to the private sector and former owners.

For Ondo Mba Nchama, the Equatorial Guinean economy will not be restored until all the sons of the country still abroad return to the fold, because the country is suffering from a crucial shortage of upper-level personnel and skilled and qualified workers. It will be restored only when the people respond to the appeal made by Colonel Obiang Nguema for the effective resumption of agricultural activities.

For the time being, the Equatorial Guinean military and civilian authorities remain optimistic about the success of their program of action, given the evolution of the new foreign policy and the interest which international organizations such as the IMF and the EEC now have in development problems of Equatorial Guinea.

BELGIAN OFFICIAL VISITS, SIGNS AGREEMENTS

Libreville L'UNION in French 30 Sep 81 p 7

[Excerpts] Responding to an invitation from Georges Rawiri, first vice prime minister and minister of transport and merchant marine of the Gabonese Republic, Robert Urbain, minister of foreign commerce of Belgium, paid an official visit to Gabon from 19 to 23 September 1981.

The Belgian minister of foreign commerce was accompanied by Ambassador Andre Verbisi, director of the African Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Foreign Commerce and Cooperation, Hector George, Belgian ambassador to the Gabonese Republic, and Victor Demeyer, adviser to the minister of foreign commerce.

During his stay, Urban met with El Hadj Omar Bongo, president, chief of state, secretary general and founder of the Gabonese Democratic Party, to whom he transmitted a message from King Baudouin I, king of Belgium.

He also had work sessions with several members of the Gabonese Government, particularly Martin Bongo, minister of foreign affairs and cooperation; Pascal Nze, minister of planning, development and participation; Etienne Moussirou, minister of commerce, industrial development and the promotion of small and medium-size enterprises; Michel Anchouey, minister of agriculture, woods and forests and rural development; Dr Jean-Pierre Okias, minister of higher education, scientific research, the environment and the protection of nature; Isaac Nguema, minister-delegate to the prime minister; Athanase Nzamba, secretary of state to the first vice prime minister; Jean-Emile Mbot, secretary of state to the minister of higher education; and Pierre Mebaley, president of the Chamber of Commerce, Agriculture, Industry and Mines of Gabon.

In the course of meetings held on the occasion, in an atmosphere of friendship and perfect understanding between the two parties which enabled them to proceed to a broad exchange of views on matters of bilateral cooperation in particular, the two delegations, motivated by a determination to give new vigor to relations between the two countries, agreed: to expand areas of cooperation already existing and to find new ways to enrich that cooperation, paying heed to the potential of the country being built, which Gabon is, and to the real possibilities of the industrialized country, which Belgium is.

The support will be concretely expressed by a very long-term Belgian government-to-government loan, whose terms will be established later.

In addition, also for the purpose of intensifying and diversifying trade and promoting investments, the following agreements will soon be negotiated: a general economic, industrial and technological cooperation agreement, to serve as an overall framework for our trade and thereby provide for the establishment of a joint cooperation commission; a merchant marine agreement; a cultural, scientific and technical agreement; an agreement on the promotion and protection of investments; a fiscal agreement; and a commercial agreement.

The two parties also agreed to organize a symposium of economic officials from both countries in Belgium. They noted with satisfaction the negotiations of an agreement between the Chamber of Commerce, Agriculture, Industry and Mines of Gabon.

SAUDI OFFICIAL ESTABLISHES THREE ISLAMIC BANKS

Conakry HOROYA in French 18-24 Oct 81 p 15

[Article by Sekou Fofana: "Proof of Fruitful Friendship"]

[Excerpts] From 11 to 14 October, Prince Mohammad Al Faycal Al Saoud of Saudi Arabia paid a visit of friendship and work to our country.

The visit fits into the context of the establishment of a system of effective and equitable cooperation within the world Islamic community, of which our country is an integral part.

From beginning to end, the stay of the distinguished guest and the large delegation accompanying him was marked by the warm hospitality of the members of the party-government, who were anxious to express their sincere friendship and fervent attachment to the bonds linking Guinea with the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, bonds deeply rooted in history and religion and which the personal action of two great men, President Ahmed Sekou Toure and the late King Faisal elevated to a peak of exemplarity and constancy.

This strategy, which was reaffirmed at the Third World Islamic Conference in Taef, found a new ground for application in Guinea through the signing in Conakry, on 13 October, by Guineans and Saudis, of documents concerning the establishment in Guinea of three Islamic financial institutions: the Islamic Bank of Guinea; the Islamic Investment Company of Guinea; and the Islamic Solidarity Society of Guinea.

The final event of the Guinean visit of Prince Mohammad Al Faycal Al Saoud was the holding of a people's meeting at the People's Palace on the afternoon of 13 October, during which President Ahmed Sekou Toure and his illustrious guest explained the ethics of the new Islamic economic system and the code of operation of the Islamic financial institutions set up in Guinea. In the evening, also as the People's Palace, the chief of state presented the Grand Cross of the National Order to his distinguished guest.

PW BOTHA DISCUSSES ASPECTS OF NAMIBIAN INITIATIVE

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 4 Nov 81 p 2

[Text] Windhoek--The South African Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr Pik Botha, said yesterday there was reason to believe that the Western peace initiative on South West Africa would enter the second phase in due course.

"My impression is that there is a real chance of moving to phase two," Mr Botha said.

He was addressing a news conference in Windhoek after ending a series of meetings with political leaders in the territory to guage their opinion on Western constitutional proposals for independence.

Mr Botha was accompanied by the Defence Minister, General Magnus Malan, and senior officials of the Department of Foreign Affairs.

Consensus

The South African delegation had encountered a considerable measure of consensus among the parties on the constitutional guide plan which forms the first stage of the five nation Western contact group's three-part plan.

The final part comprises implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 435 leading to internationally supervised elections and ultimately to independence for SWA.

"I do believe that a certain momentum has now started and it will be a good thing if this momentum is maintained," Mr Botha said.

"There are some interesting aspects (of the Western constitutional principles) on which just about all parties agree.

"All parties have a real concern with guarantees for constitutional principles."

Analysis

Mr Botha said the parties' responses would be analysed to help South Africa determine its attitude to the latest Western initiative.

"As soon as we have received the views of all the parties, South Africa will determine its attitude to the principles to see whether we can move on to phase two."

Mr Botha said phase two would concentrate on some "very important elements." "There may be stumbling blocks. But we do not proceed from a point of view that there will be stumbling blocks that will make an election impossible."

Elections

South Africa's stance was that it should engage in negotiations and move the SWA issue along "so that certainty can be achieved as far as the status of SWA is concerned.

"Naturally if matters beyond our control should arise, then we will deal with them as they arise."

Mr Botha informed the political delegations that if the current process continued, the logical conclusion would be the holding of UN supervised elections.

"I certainly implied that if we go along with this process then the parties must start thinking and prepare themselves for an election."

Asked if South Africa expected unanimity among the political parties in SWA or would leave some parties behind, Mr Botha said that in the final analysis "the South African Government must make up its mind."

There was only one norm "and that is what is in South Africa's interest."

Difficult

Mr Botha said it was difficult to discuss SWA independence with the Right wing Herstigte Nasionale Party which rejected any form of independence for the territory.

"I do find it rather difficult to discuss matters of this nature with a party which believes a shark is a pet and can do you no harm."--Sapa

POLICE DISPERSE BLACK WORKERS WITH DOGS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 4 Nov 81 p 13

[Article by Tim Clarke]

[Text]

DURBAN. —Police used dogs yesterday to disperse about 1 300 Black workers from the premises of the Defy plant at Jacobs near Durban.

The workers have been on strike since Monday and again assembled near the Defy premises today.

They were warned it was illegal to gather and when the warnings were ignored they were dispersed by the police.

Mr Ron Collis, general manager, of the Defy Major Appliances division, said that the police had shown the greatest restraint in dealing with the workers. He said the workers were warned several times to disperse but remained on and near the premises.

The workers were dismissed at close of shift on Monday after they failed to return to work.

Mr Collis said none of the workers had yet come to take their salaries, accumulated holiday pay and accumulated holiday bonuses which were available at the company's pay office.

The labourers had been told on Monday that they could collect their salaries and other payments.

Mr Collis said if the money was not collected by Tuesday the firm had been advised by the police to send it to the Department of Co-operation and Development.

He said the recruiting offices would be open late Tuesday and priority would be given to reinstating workers who had previous experiences with the company.

The police used loud speakers and loud hailers yesterday when calling on the strikers to disperse. They ignored the instruction and dogs then moved into the crowd.

According to Mr Sam Kihlan, general secretary, of the South African Allied Workers' Union (SAAWU), talks with the Defy management had broken down on Monday when he claimed the management refused to guarantee that workers' pensions fund money would be refunded.

He said the workers would refuse the money due to them until management agreed to their demands. He claimed the pension money was theirs and that they were entitled to it.

TREUERNICHT GIVES CHURCHES WARNING

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 4 Nov 81 pp 1-2

[Article by Jaap Theron: "Dr T Warns Churches"]

[Text]

THE GOVERNMENT was not looking for a clash with the churches, Dr Andries Treurnicht, Minister of State Administration, said in Pretoria last night.

Addressing a public meeting in the city hall on the opening day of the annual congress of the National Party of the Transvaal, Dr Treurnicht, the NP's Transvaal leader, mentioned a "threatening clash between certain churches and the Government," and said churches should not "over-play your ecclesiastical hand."

One church had taken a solemn oath "to bring about a free and just Southern Africa" and had called on all Christians to support it in denouncing apartheid as the sinful work of the devil and to work for the creation of a new community.

"Another church decides to solemnise marriages between Whites and Coloureds in future despite its prohibition through the Prohibition of Mixed Marriages Act," he said.

"Let me immediately say: A confrontation between the Church and the State must be avoided as far as possible. The Government does not seek a clash with churches."

The Government acknowledged and appreciated the calling of the Church to make biblical norms known to all, including government office bearers, and also acknowledged the State as being an equal servant of God.

The State did not arrange the domestic affairs of the Church and was also not subordinate to the Church.

Both the State and the Church were servants of God and had to obey Him and foster the welfare of the people.

Welcome

"It goes without saying that there should be communication and co-operation between the two. The Prime Minister has shown that he welcomes such communication and co-operation.

"We wish to keep the State within the bounds of its powers and purpose and this means, among other things, that we must maintain law and order, combat crime, allow justice to be done and foster an orderly, harmonious society.

"When an official church body accosts or confronts the Government, it should bear in mind that many sincere and active Christians fulfill the task of the Government and that not everyone is an ill-informed layman.

"This means that Christians in the Government have the right to ask a church: On what indisputable biblical authority do you judge our management of affairs?

"The Church also knows that it is not called upon to be co-governor of the country and that its offices were not established for that purpose. Its authority differs substantially from the authority of the Government.

Biblical

"We expect the church to make known the biblical demands for justice, but we do not expect it to stir up civil disobedience or breaches of the law or to become an agitator for specific political interests, or to threaten revolution and violence or actively promote this.

"We ourselves say: The State should not misuse its powers. But we respectfully request: Do not exceed your ecclessiastical [words blurred] hand.

"It is not Christian duty to deny the diversity of nations or to force different nations and cultural groups into uniformity or one common society. It is not Christian duty to destroy nations which originated in history under God's guidance, in the name of Christian unity.

"You know very well that South Africa is not a Nazi Germany. Why do clerical office-bearers preach such [words blurred] victims of a type of Hitler regime?

"As Christian Afrikaaners we have reason to ask: Why do you not allow our people their own freedom and self-determination while you defend the freedom of other nations as a sacred right. It is un-Christian to measure by different standards."

Dr Treurnicht said his people and his political party had done more to give nations freedom, education, work, housing, medical treatment and to increase their standards of living than was acknowledged by many critics.

There was no compelling Christian requirement that all people of all population, language, or cultural groups should be forced into a single society.

Dr Treurnicht told the churches: "Do not confuse the ordinary liberal creed of equality with the Christian doctrine that people will be received into the kingdom without distinction."

He asked how Christian it was to transport people to the Cape Peninsula in a cold, wet winter without ensuring work or [word blurred] simply to challenge the Government.

Immorality

He asked whether independence for homelands was labelled un-Christian simply because it was the positive result of a policy of separate freedoms for different populations within their own separate states.

"Will those who accuse us of immorality tell us if the provision of own residential areas for the community lives of different ethnic groups is un-Christian?"

The Church was not the only party able to pass judgment on mixed marriages. Marriages had social, religious and politico-legal implications and thus also concerned the State, the family circle and the national group.

"And if certain churches did not have such an unbibilical vision and an aversion to nations, they would have spoken more carefully about mixed marriages.

"If a church develops an obsession about mixed marriages and challenges the Government over the issue, a person can ask if the church is purely church, of if it is not moving beyond its power and task by wanting to take over the authorities' functions in certain respects."--Sapa

TREUERNICHT LAMBASTES PFP'S NON-RACIAL SOUTH AFRICA

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 4 Nov 81 p 3

[Text]

A NON-RACIAL South Africa, as desired by the Progressive Federal Party, could be achieved only over the dead bodies of nations, Dr A P Treurnicht, Transvaal leader of the National Party, said in Pretoria last night.

The PFP wanted a non-racial, open society with a federal system of government and universal suffrage on common voters rolls, Dr Treurnicht told a public meeting on the opening day of the NP's Transvaal Congress.

Non-racialism meant there would be no political recognition of nations. "The politics of different peoples and political self-determination of peoples will therefore not be recognised," Dr Treurnicht said.

Even the PFP itself admitted federalism was not a simple type of government to operate and the Transvaal NP leader agreed.

"The political history of Africa has strewn with the debris of at least seven federations and the corpses of millions of people who were forced into political structures of which they wanted no part."

The PFP wanted universal suffrage but also wanted to prevent domination of one group by another, which the NP believed was a contradiction in terms and politically naive.

"Naturally no group will dominate another if you first reduce all the groups (peoples) to a 'non-racial, open society'.

"But if these groups or peoples are worth their salt, if they value self-determination — as has been the case worldwide since the conflict, times — and even in the midst of the American melting pot of forced integration — then a common voters roll and a single political structure will set the scenes for friction, discrimination and a fight for power amongst the peoples and groups."

Dr Treurnicht said that if a nation lost the will to preserve its "distinctiveness" and could not distinguish its own political life, it was no longer really a separate nation "or it is a dying nation".

A dead nation could not govern itself and could not prevent itself being dominated by others.

It was true that the nations and groups of South Africa had much in common, but it was not true that there was no mutual respect, help and co-operation between them.

The PFP was rejected "by a nation, by every nation that refuses to integrate biologically, socially and politically; that refuses to dig its own grave and refuses to give away its political power in the name of co-operation."

Dr Treurnicht also took issue with "parties that make out that they are more 'right' than the NP."

"You are not rightist simply because you say the NP is moving ostensibly left. You are not rightist because you are poison against the NP and its leaders, because then you are just a scandalmonger.

"You are not rightist because you say the Government is doing everything just for the Black people; you are a liar.

"You are not rightist if you promote the interests of only the Afrikaner and the Whites; you are selfish, shortsighted and dangerous for inter-group relations. This conflicts with the spirit of Christianity."

Dr Treurnicht said there were people who had no better principles or policy than the NP should not fabricate differences and drive apart people who belonged together. — Saps.

EDUCATOR URGES WHITE YOUTH PREPARATION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 4 Nov 81 p 14

[Text]

THE White child had to be prepared to maintain his position in the face of overwhelming numbers of Blacks, Professor Hennie Maree, Rector of the Pretoria Teachers' Training College, said in Kimberley on Monday-night.

SABC reports Professor Maree said this should be done in such a way that the survival of Whites as a minority group was not threatened.

Professor Maree, who is also chairman of the Transvaal Onderwyservereniging, was addressing the annual congress of the Motor Industry Employees Union.

He said that, taking into account the social order envisaged for South Africa in the future, there would be no more than six million Blacks in the country within the next 40 years.

He said this subject involved philosophical principles, views on cultural ties and the maintenance of one's own lifestyle and tradition.

"It is an open question whether the White community is clear on the manner in which it wants to prepare the child for the future which awaits him," he told the congress.

Professor Maree said some people advocated a "neutral" education system while others said Whites had the right to a system that would help them maintain their identity as Afrikaners or English-speakers.

"The Transvaal Onderwyservereniging, for example, makes no excuses for the fact that it advocates education for each national group (volksgebonde onderwys)."

Professor Maree suggested that White workers from all sectors who shared similar views about this situation should work together more closely.

He also suggested organised education could work more closely with unions such as the Motor Industry Employees.

"The road ahead for the White South African is full of challenges," the professor said.

"The problems sometimes look so overwhelming that they could tend to kill true idealism in us and that must never happen."

He said his message should not cause despair.

"In all facets of life — whether it be in education or at the workbench — we must present an example of health." — Sapa.

TREUERNICHT ADDRESSES TRANSVAAL NP CONGRESS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 4 Nov 81 p 3

[Text]

THE LEADER of the National Party in Transvaal, Dr Andries Treurnicht, last night denied claims that there were any differences in principles between himself and the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha.

Opening the Transvaal NP congress at a public meeting in the City Hall, he called on delegates to make it a "congress of unification".

"We are not looking for reasons for removal and division," Dr Treurnicht said in the first minutes of his speech before quoting newspaper reports of imminent clashes between himself and the Prime Minister.

Dr Treurnicht also reassured the congress at the outset of his speech that there was nothing ominous or insulting to Transvaal about the fact that Mr Botha was not present at the opening.

"There were tenacious attemps being made to drive a wedge between the party in Transvaal and the Prime Minister by people who wanted to break the National Party.

"Let us not play into their hands," Dr Treurnicht urged the congress.

"One (of them) sees it as an insult that the Prime Minister is not appearing at this public meeting tonight.

"The simple fact is that it had been agreed that the national leader will not have to open all four provincial congresses every year and that he will take turns.

"I can tell you that if he is alive and well, he will be here tomorrow morning and that he has agreed to answer all those resolutions we have presented to him."

Dr Treurnicht went into detail about Press reports predicting rifts and "grillings" for the Prime Minister at "Dr No's" congress. "I know of no such congress," he said.

The reports concerned a clash over a unitary political structure for Whites, Coloureds and Indians, but the reporter should read his Hansard, he said.

Dr Treurnicht then quoted the Prime Minister's remarks in the censure debate on August 3 regarding the Government's future course in which the "creation of vertical structures for different population groups" was set as a guideline.

The election manifesto contained the 12-point plan as the party's action programme and as a second point stated:

"The acceptance of vertical differentiation with the built-in principle of self-determination on as many levels as possible."

This had been explaind as having been the policy devised by Dr Verwoerd 19 years ago and meant separate, but equal, opportunity for each group.

"In other words, that every group realises its full potential along his own route. That is also the meaning of differentation," the manifesto had said.

"Now I ask this congress," Dr Treurnicht continued, "is it wrong of me to say that it is foolish to force together those who are dissimilar? Calvin said that to do so was tyranny.

"I ask: Is it wrong to say that it is foolish to force together people of different nations and communities in a unitary community?"

It was not wrong, it was common sense, he told the meeting.

"Note carefully, though, that it is said in the same breath that it is foolish to pretend that you can exist without neighbours and live without good neighbourliness."

Point four of the 12-point plan proposed a division of power between Whites, Coloureds and Indians in a system of consultation and joint responsibility for matters of common interest.

The manifesto commented that a concept of separate states for these groups was not practical, but that there were deep rooted differences which made it realistic to differentiate in matters that affected them individually and those which affected them jointly.

This brought about the need for self-determination for each group over its own affairs and that all should be involved in communal affairs in a way that did not affect the right to selfdetermination.

"Now I ask again: Is it wrong when I say you cannot deny 2,5-million Coloureds political rights?"

But the National Party also said that it was not realistic, wise or in the best interests of Coloureds or Whites to share a single political structure.

"Is this contrary to the Prime Minister's statement of vertical structures for the different groups? Of course it isn't."

It was also in conflict with a statement by another Cabinet colleague who said that the leader of the Opposition was attempting to create a multiracial Parliament in a unitary state with a guarantee for minority group interests. Such a situation was not achievable in South Africa's situation, his colleague had said.

"I hope it is clear," Dr Treurnicht said, "that there is no question of clashing principles."

Regarding a future constitutional dispensation, he said that it was true that divisions about the future of the Whites could not be taken in total isolation.

"It is equally true that if all decisions on the Whites and their interests had to be joint decisions of all in the Republic, then there can be no claim of self-determination for the White man."

In this regard the Prime Minister had said of the expected recommendations of the President's Council that the proposals would be considered, but that the deciding question would be:

"Does the White man retain his right to self-determination, yes or no?"

"The Whites' right to self-determination was not negotiable," Dr Treurnicht said. — Sapa.

UNIONS COMPLAIN OF FUNDS SQUEEZE

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 4 Nov 81 p 8

[Text]

The amendment to the Fund Raising Act, passed during the last parliamentary session, was a "crude attempt" to stunt the growth of Fosatu unions by starving them of funds, the central committee of the Federation of South African Trade Unions said in a statement released in Johannesburg yesterday.

"By passing an amendment to the Fund Raising Act, which had the specific objective of overturning a surpreme Court judgment that nullified an earlier ban on Fosatu fund raising, the State has once again revealed its contempt for the courts and for the rule of law," said the statement.

Fosatu condemns the crude attempt of the State to stunt the growth of Fosatu unions by starving them of funds."

The statement went on to say the amendment also underlined the hypocrisy of the State's "proclaimed non-interventionist stance on labour relations."

"No prohibition exists on investment by international capitalists, yet a rigid ban has been placed on investment by the international trade union movement in South African labour organisations."

The statement also condemned Dr Lapa Munnik, the Minister who introduced the amendment.

"Fosatu also strongly condemns Minister Munnik's reasoning for imposing the ban. By justifying the amendment to the Fund Raising Act by reference to 'subversives' receiving funding, and then banning Fosatu alone, the Minister is presumably identifying Fosatu as a fitting target for legal and extra legal action.

"Since the new amendment absolves the Minister from giving reasons for imposing such bans, Fosatu invited him to respect his claim outside the protection of parliamentary privilege and have his allegations tested in the courts.

"Fosatu sees the ban on fund raising as merely a part of a wider pattern of repression which makes a mockery of the State's supposed liberlisation of labour relations.

"In recent months, increasing resort has been made to detentions of worker leaders, to archaic laws under which Dorbyl and Toyota workers were charged and, more recently, to blanket bans on gatherings to prevent worker meetings in Springs. —Sapa.

POLICE ROAD BLOCKS FOLLOW DURBAN BLAST

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 4 Nov 81 pp 1-2

[Article by Tim Clarke: "Road Blocks After Durban Blast"]

[Text]

DURBAN. — Police set up road blocks at strategic points throughout Durban yesterday after a bomb caused fairly extensive damage to a Government building on the Esplanade.

Several cars were stopped and searched in case the explosion and the ensuing delay in the peak-hour traffic were a ...

The bomb was placed on a ledge of the Government building on the corner of Stanger Street and the Esplanade early yesterday and went off about 5.12 am. It caused fairly extensive damage to the building, blowing out windows and wrecking doors.

The building houses offices of the Department of Interior and the Department of Indian Affairs and the bomb blast is obviously linked with the South African Indian Council elections, which are being held in the Republic today.

The full extent of the damage is still not known. Within an hour or two of the blast municipal squads were busy cleaning up the broken glass.

Injured

Constable D J Gleeson, of the Railway Police, who arrived on the scene shortly before the bomb went off, was slightly injured by flying glass. He was treated at Addington Hospital and discharged.

An African nightwatchman, Mr Hangwan Gumede, who discovered the bomb, was also slightly injured by the blast. Two other Railway policemen, Constable J J Smart and Constable Barthes, who were called to the scene, escaped injury.

Mr Gumede said he was doing his rounds before going off duty. He did the first round at 4 am but did not see anything suspicious. About an hour later he saw a plastic shopping bag on the ground floor ledge of the building.

He became suspicious and ran to the nearby Cato Creek Railway Police station to report. The policemen came back with him and as they were approaching the building the bomb went off.

At this stage it is not known what explosives were used in the bomb, which also ripped out chunks of the marble and concrete ledge of the building.

The explosion was heard as far away as Umhlanga Rocks and on the Berea.

It was the tenth bomb attack in Durban this year in which about six people have been injured.

The other bomb attacks have been on the Durban cenotaph, the Defence Force recruiting offices in the Trust Bank centre, on two show-rooms in Smith and Stanger streets belonging to McCarthy Rodway motor group, and on a municipal electrical sub-station near the African township of Lamontville, on the South Coast.

Black Victims

Another explosion occurred near the offices of the Daily News in Field Street. Two Black passers-by were fairly seriously injured by flying glass when a bomb which had been concealed in a refuse bin exploded.

Earlier this month there was an explosion at the offices of the Department of Community Development and Welfare in Stanger Street. Four Black passers-by were injured by flying glass. Three of them were admitted to hospital with fairly extensive injuries.

In Pretoria the Minister of Police, Mr Louis le Grange, said that the latest bomb blast was obviously linked to the Indian Council elections. He appealed to the Indian community not to be intimidated by acts of violence.

WEST GERMANS MIGRATE INTO SOUTH AFRICA

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 2 Nov 81 p 11

[Article by Aida Parker: "More W. Germans Look to SA as a New Home"]

[Text]

IN the event of another war would South Africa be a safer bet than western Europe? Many top-rate Germans — professionals, technicians, entrepreneurs — clearly believe so.

The official 1981 immigration figures from West Germany to the RSA are likely to show a dramatic 100 percent jump over the 1980 intake.

Residence

Last year 800 West German immigrants were officially approved by the South African Consulate in Munich. The true figure was probably around 1 000, as many applied for residence visas once they were actually in the country.

This year's total West German intake could hit the 2 000 mark.

According to the Los Angeles Times West German migrants are mostly attracted to English-speaking areas, notably North America, Australia and South Africa.

In the year ending last June Australia accepted 2 422 West German immigrants. The number is expected to rise to more than 4 000 by next June.

Canada, which accepted fewer than 2 000 West Germans last year, is now receiving 5 000 to 6 000 inquiries a month.

America accepts about 5 000 West Germans a year. Many more would choose the United States were it not for the restrictive US immigration laws.

Powder keg

Why do these people wish to leave a highly prosperous and stable country with a standard of living and social benefits regarded as the best in the world?

The main reason, according to research undertaken by the Los Angeles Times, is that most upper-bracket West Germans fear that their country is "sitting on a powder keg", that war could turn Germany into Europe's main battleground.

Apart from war fears there is growing concern about the slipping economy and increasing violence growing out of the squatter movement.

Another complaint is "lack of elbow room", with Germans both young and old saying they see in South Africa, Australia and North America a spaciousness that is today lacking in the small over-crowded European countries.

Attractive

"Large countries such as Australia, Canada and South Africa, which are still being developed, are especially attractive to would-be entrepreneurs, individuals who feel that they cannot succeed under what they see as rigidities of the West German economy."

"Of course there was freedom of conscience and of religion but that won't neutralise our Christian national-based education," he added. He further emphasised that mother tongue education--a principle that was acknowledged worldwide--would remain and that the principle of own schools for the various communities would remain. TIB CLIENTS' SEMINAR MAKES PROPOSALS TO REVERSE ECONOMIC TRENDS

[Article by Wence Mushi]

[Text]

A DELICATE mix of frugal fiscal policy, slightly loosened monetary restraint and allocation of foreign exchange to favour productive enterprises has been proposed to improve the national economy and lead to growth.

Enterprises have further been urged to seriously work out annual plans to help the Government and banks allocate credit and foreign exchange with a view to maximising on production.

Such plans and related past and current year accounts would guide overall parastatal financing, foreign exchange and price management at micro and public enterprise level.

The proposals aimed at reversing the current economic crisis through proper handling of taxation, credit, interest rates, pricing and foreign exchange policies, were made here yesterday as the Tanzania Invesment Bank (TIB) clients seminar entered its third day of deliberations.

Professor Kami Rwegasira of the Institute of Finance Management (IFM) reacting to the paper presented by Professor Reginald Green argued that the solution to our current problems was not tight money policies.

This would only stop growth, giving hardship to the small businesses generally serving the rural masses and affect such strategic corporations as the National Milling Corporation (NMC).

It would escalate interest rates or lead to acute capital funds rationing, resulting in declining output and rising bankrupticies and defaults, he said.

However, the delicate mix, if implemented successfully would work towards smaller government deficits and thus release more funds to be invested in directly productive enterprise.

In his paper, Professor Green reviewed the "Budgetary and Monetary Policies" of the country and coutioned that credit and foreign exchange could not be rationally allocated for maximum benefit in the absence of data collected for and by the enterprise and well worked out annual plans.

He observed that presently the law requiring enterprises to prepare and submit such plans was widely ignored. "In many cases because enterprises cannot, or cannot be bothered to budget for the coming year".

Professor Green also proposed that the Bank of Tanzania should use the Tanzania Industrial Studies and Consulting Organisation (TISCO) as its agent to provide expert review and advice on the allocation requests for spares and machinery if possible after inspecting the enterprise.

But participants argued that TISCO lacked technically competent personnel to carry out such a task given the varied nature of plants.

TISCO representative assured the participants that his firm would happily undertake such an assignment.

TAFICO-AFC INVESTIGATIONS FINALIZED

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 22 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE Customs and Excise Department has finalised its independent investigations on the Tanzania Fisheries Corporation (TAFICO) and the Greek Atlantic Fishing Company (AFC) contract and will issue a full statement next week.

Authoritative customs sources have said in Dar es Salaam that the department was "tallying up a few facts and we have already established what happened". They did not give further details.

The department's investigations on the exports under the controversial TAFICO-AFC fishing contract covered several parties both within and outside the country.

Official sources said last month that the department had established through internal investigations that consignments of fish exported under the deal, were undervalued while others were suspected to have been shipped away uncustomed.

The TAFICO-AFC deal signed in July last year was rescinded by the Government early this month because it was contrary to established procedures. It is understood that the customs department was directed to take further measures deemed necessary.

In a statement, the Ministry of Natural Resources and Tourism had said the contract was not fully scrutinised by the TAFICO Board of Directors and that it was not approved by relevant government institutions.

Nullification of the contract followed a report by a team appointed by the Ministry to probe Daily News investigative reports that the Government could have lost millions of shillings in foreign exchange under the unconsionable agreement.

MSUYA URGES MEASURES TO PROTECT FOOD SUPPLIES

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 22 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Isaac Mruma]

[Excerpt]

THE Prime Minister, Ndugu Cleopa Msuya, yesterday directed that the produce lying uncollected in farms should be properly stored and that no food should find its way out of the country through smuggling.

Winding up business in the House before it adjourned until next January 26, Ndugu Msuya said all possible measure should be taken to curb smuggling of crops across the border.

He said it was unwise for the country to produce more crops only to find the same being sold beyond the borders by a greedy few.

"Allowing food crops illegally out of the country at a time when it was in short supply, was like filling water in a leaking bucket — it will never be full", he pointed out.

Stressing the need for careful handling of harvests, Ndugu Msuya said in areas where crops are not collected, authorities should ensure that they were properly stored.

He said the harvested crops should not be wasted, urging regional authorities to work closer with the National Milling Corporation (NMC) towards this end.

He appealed to peasants in areas where short rains had started to prepare for farming.

Authorities should ensure that essential inputs like fertiliser, seeds and other implements reached the peasants in time, he stressed.

Ndugu Msuya asked villagers to repay the loans provided by the Tanzania Rural Development Bank (TRDB) for farm inputs to enable the bank to effectively serve rural population.

Emphasising that honouring loans was one of the corner stones of socialist discipline, Ndugu Msuya said the repayment was essential because money was the TRDB's wherewithall.

It was not enough, he added, for villages which had failed to repay the loans for no reason at all to just sit and complain that they were not getting vital inputs like fertiliser.

The Prime Minister said the government would ensure that fertiliser was available in the regions and that those who could buy it in cash could do so.

He said that peasants should also be advised and encouraged to grow crops which suited the ecological and climatic conditions in their respective areas.

He urged the MPs to work with regional authorities and people in their constituencies in a bid to step up national efforts for increased production.

GOVERNMENT LAUNCHES CRASH MINE TECHNICIAN TRAINING PROGRAM

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 23 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Simeon Ileta]

[Text]

THE government has launched a crash programme to train skilled manpower for the mining industry and enable the sector contribute effectively to the national economy.

Sources close to the Ministry of Minerals, told the Daily News yesterday that Tanzania must have 2,400 skilled technicians for her mining industry by the year 1990 if the mining sector is to be revamped.

The mining industry which in 1960 contributed 10 per cent of the country's Gross National Product (GNP), last year (1960) contributed only one per cent to Tanzania's GNP.

This slump, the sources said, was due to, among other factors, the lack of well-trained manpower to man the sector.

The sources revealed that at present, Tanzania has only 140 technicians in several fields of the mining industry.

These include technicians in salt technology, geology, mining, mineral processing, drilling and electrical technicians. It has no mine technicians.

According to the sources the crush programme would involve the training of assistant technicians at the minerals training camp in Dodoma.

The programme is expected to have an intake of 50 students — form four leavers, and this would expand to 100 next financial year and 150 in 1983/84 and 1984/85.

It has been estimated that the courses — to last one year — would cost shs 1,480,970/- this financial year, shs 3m/- next financial year and shs 4,480,000/- for 1983/84 and 1984/85.

The source further said that with the creation of the ministry late last year, there were plans to open as many zonal mines offices as possible which would assist to accelerate the mining activities.

WORK ON MBEYA POWER STATION IN FINAL STAGES

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 23 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Mkumbwa Ally]

[Text]

CIVIL works at the new 110million/- Mbeya power station are in the final stages and erection of generators in the thermal station to have an installed capacity of 16 megawatts has started.

The Tanzania Electric Supply Company (TANESCO) said in a statement in Dar es Salaam yesterday that one of the four 2.5-megawatt machines being installed at the station would be commissioned at the end of this year.

The other machines were expected to be commissioned in April, next year. The station would have two other machines generating three megawatts each and would be completed next July, the statement said.

The new power station is expected to activate industrial activity in Mbeya region where at least three national industrial projects lie idle for lack of power. They include the 620million/- cement factory completed late last year.

Others are the 435million/- Mbeya Textile Mill and the farm implements factory. The cement factory with an installed capacity to produce 250,000 tonnes per year would consume between eight and ten megawatts of power.

When fully operational, the plant would combine with the Wazo Hill and Tanga factories to produce a total of 1.3 million tonnes of cement surpassing the estimated domestic consumption of one million tonnes annually.

The statement said the power station would consume 700,000 litres of heavy fuel per month on full capacity operation. It would be the main source of power in the region until a 220-kilovolt is extended from Mufindi to carry in hydro power from Kidatu.

The project is being handled by an Italian firm, SAE, which would also construct a sub-station in Mbeya in addition to the 240-kilometre transmission line.

A Yugoslav firm — Energo-Invest — has been awarded a contract to construct another 220-kilovolt transmission line from Kidatu to Iringa and Mufindi. Siemens of West Germany will construct 220-kilovolt sub-stations at Kidatu, Iringa and Mufindi.

The Kidatu-Iringa-Mfindi extension is scheduled for completion next June to feed power to the multi-million/- Southern Pulp and Paper Mill at Mufindi. The contracts to extend Kidatu power to Iringa and Mbeya regions costing a total of 440million/- were concluded between TANESCO and the three firms in September, last year.

TANESCO has plans to construct two more new stations in Dodoma (7.5 megawatts) and Tabora (10.5 megawatts).

TIRE SHORTAGE DELAYS BUILDING OF TRUCK BODIES

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 22 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

NON-AVAILABILITY of tyres and tubes in the country has forced a Dar es Salaam-based body builders' firm, K.J. Motors Ltd., to delay body building of about 100 lorries, including 70 lorries ordered by ujamaa villages.

Disclosing this to Shihata on Tuesday the Assistant Division Manager of K.J. Motors' Isuzu and Honda Department, Ndugu Nasser Haji, said the company could not undertake any body building work because of tubes and tyres shortage.

He was commenting on complaints made by the Chairman of Muhukulu Barabarani Ujamaa Village in Songea, Ruvuma Region, Ndugu Salamani Rashidi, that K.J. Motors had delayed to deliver a lorry to the village despite an advance payment of Shs. 76,900/-.

Ndugu Haji said his company did not get the tyres and tubes from the Arusha-based General Tyre factory the sole manufacturer and distributor of the products in the country.

He claimed that the Prime Minister's Office was aware of the problems which K.J. Motors was facing and at one time intervened and asked General Tyre to send a consignment of some 140 to 150 tyres to the firm.

Ndugu Haji said with the present in-flow of tubes and tyres, K.J. Motors could not meet its target of building some 30 vehicles bodies a week.

On the lorry ordered by Muhukulu Barabani in Songea, Ndugu Haji explained that the village was about the last in queue of about 100 outstanding orders, out of which some 60 to 70 orders were from ujamaa villages.

He pointed out that the Prime Minister's Office has requested his firm to give priority to lorries ordered by ujamaa villages in Lindi region where the rainy season which is now approaching and would turn the roads in the area impassable".

REGIONAL LEADERS TO ATTEND LAKE FUEL DISTRIBUTION MEETING

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 23 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Isaac Mruma]

[Text] Regional leaders from Mwanza, Mara, Kagera and Shinyanga regions will meet in Mwanza very soon to discuss ways of equitably distributing fuel in the Lake Victoria zone.

The leaders' meeting follows a high level consultation here yesterday morning initiated by the Prime Minister, Ndugu Cleopa Msuya, and involving regional commissioners from all over the Mainland as well as five cabinet ministers.

All of them were here for the National Assembly session which adjourned on Wednesday. The problems of fuel distribution in the country were among issues discussed.

No date for the Mwanza meeting was fixed, but a spokesman said later that the Deputy Minister for Water and Energy, Ndugu Edgar Maokola-Majogo would also attend.

Shortage of fuel in the Lake Victoria zone, which had led to halting production in key industries, including the Musoma Textile Mill (MUTEX), has been exacerbated by shortage of facilities with which to transport oil from Dar es Salaam.

The Tanzania Petroleum Development Corporation (TPDC) recently submitted to the Prime Minister's Office a report on the problem of distributing of fuel in the lake zone regions.

Fuel is mainly hauled by rail but the Central Line has limited tanker facilities and those available need urgent repair. The spokesman said the Mwanza meeting would look at alternative means with which to transport more fuel from Dar es Salaam.

The spokesman said that at the meeting here yesterday, it was pointed out that although there was a reduction of fuel quotas throughout the country, even the little that was available should be equitably distributed.

The ministers who attended yesterday's closed-door meeting, lasting for about three hours, were the Minister for Communications and Transport, Ndugu Ibrahim Kaduma, the Minister for Water and Energy, Ndugu Al Noor Kassum and the Minister for Home Affairs, Ndugu Muhidini Kimaryo.

The Minister for Agriculture, Ndugu Joseph Mungai, and the Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office, Ndugu Jackson Makweta, also attended.

CAUSES OF TEXTILE MILL LOSSES--Power and water interruption in the textile mills in the country led to an overall loss of 138 million/- in 1979, according to a report tabled before the National Assembly here on Tuesday. The annual report on the accounts of the National Textiles Corporation (TEXCO) for 1979, tabled by the Ndugu Basil Mramba, said the interruptions were particularly serious to the Mwanza Textile Mills (MWATEX). About 11 million metres of textiles were not produced because of the interruption, the report said. In 1979, all textile mills produced a total of 81,654 million metres of finished cloth compared with 71,659 million metres in 1978. Other factors behind the dismal performance were the lack of foreign exchange and the fast deteriorating conditions of the pre-second world war weaving machines at the Kilimanjaro Textile Mills (KILTEX) in Dar es Salaam. BOAT REGISTRATION TO CURB SMUGGLING--The government intends to register all thows and boats together with their sailing timetables in a bid to curb smuggling, the Minister of Home Affairs Ndugu Muhidin Kimaryo told National Assembly here yesterday. Answering a question in the house from Ndugu L.A. Semindu (Bagamoyo) Ndugu Kimaryo said it was quite possible that part of the increase in smuggling activities was a result of failure to trade the whereabouts of some vessels. The government, he said, was stepping up patrols along the coast and borders in an effort to stamp out smuggling and other illegal activities. But along with patrols, there was need for the people to be more vigilant and not to hide smugglers. Smuggling was a kind of colonialism which had to be fought at all costs, he said. In most cases, he said, smuggled items passed overland first and it was inconceivable that a few individuals managed to escape from the good organisation system by both the Party and the people. BANK OF ZAMBIA NOTES POOR FIRST QUARTER ECONOMIC PERFORMANCE

[Text]

THE performance of the economy during the first quarter of the year was poor, the Bank of Zambia quarterly statistical review says in its latest issue.

This is in contrast with the first quarter of the preceding year when a substantial improvement was recorded.

The turnabout has been caused by a substantial increase in expenditures which has outstripped the level of revenue receipts over this period.

In this respect the external payments positions deteriorated considerably with payments arrears maintaining an upward trend.

Domestic price developments revealed that there were mounting inflationary pressures during the period.

Consumer price index for the high income group went up by five per cent and ten per cent for the low income group.

The Government's overdraw's position with the central bank deteriorated from K150 million in December 1980 to K270 million during the quarter under review.

Such heavy reliance on the central bank finance is highly inflationary and should be resisted by raising funds from other sources, the review says.

Total foreign liabilities which amounted to K502 million during the previous quarter declined to K485.5 million. Bank of Zambia foreign liabilities were also reduced by K37 million during this period and part of this decline is attributed to the repurchases made amounting to K11 million in respect of previous IMF facilities.

Balance of payments remained in deficit for the fourth successive quarter. A deficit of K82 million was recorded in the quarter under review compared to a surplus of K7.8 million in the corresponding quarter of the previous year.

ROKANA MINE MANAGER SAYS MUZ NOT TO BLAME FOR STRIKES

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 27 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE Mineworkers Union of Zambia is not to blame for miners' strikes on the Copperbelt in January and June this year, Rokana division acting general manager Mr William Pyle said in Kitwe yesterday.

He informed a civic delegation from Lilongwe in Malawi that the strikes were caused by some workers who did not understand the differences in pay between them and expatriate staff doing the same job.

MUZ was an essential part of the mining industry and had contributed greatly to the high production being maintained at the Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines divisions.

Mr Pyle was answering questions from the councillors before they visited the division's plant area and the South Ore Body shaft where they were shown the training school underground.

The councillors, who are guests of the Lusaka district council and are being led by mayor of Lilongwe Mr Chiudza Banda, were accompanied by acting governor for Kitwe Mrs Betty Chimfwembe, executive secretary Mr Gilbert Zimba and Mr Robert Kamuhuza, director of housing and social services for Lusaka.

Mr Pyle said: "The union is an important body within the mining industry. It is a necessity and has helped us communicate well with workers. The union officials are very understanding and are not only concerned with the well-being of their members, but that of the industry as well."

The division enjoyed good relations with the union which had helped to maintain high standard of production and industrial peace.

It was difficult for some workers to understand the difference between their salaries and those of expatriates doing the same jobs.

The situation was such that the company had to help expatriates remit some money back to their homes and this involved having to pay them allowances in order to retain them.

The industry would still require the services of expatriates for some time until experienced Zambians were available to fill the remaining posts being held by foreigners.

"The industry as a whole has a vigorous Zambianisation programme."

SHAPI WARNS ANOTHER ROUND OF INDUSTRIAL UNREST MAY OCCUR

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

ZAMBIA may face another round of industrial unrest if the Party and its Government mishandles the labour movement, Copperbelt Central Committee Member Mr Alex Shapi warned in Ndola yesterday.

Mr Shapi said in an interview that Zambia might enter 1982 with serious industrial problems if relations between the labour movement and the Party and its Government were not harmonised.

"I am suspicious the labour movement is planning something before the end of the year if its leaders are not satisfied with the way their complaints are going to be handled. I can see signs."

He feared the labour movement might use the proposed amendments to the Industrial Relations Act, the teachers' housing problem and the detention of union leaders as reasons for strike action.

The proposed amendments seek to give the minister of Labour and Social Services powers to sack labour leaders and dissolve unions which in his opinion were not performing their duties properly.

The Zambia Congress of Trade Unions has already indicated it would oppose the amendments.

Mr Shapi said he thought the issue should have been discussed fully by the Party before throwing it to the ZCTU because it was a serious matter.

Everything must be done to ensure strikes did not erupt on the Copperbelt because the consequences on the economy would be grave and might affect other sectors.

"We must avoid any provocation of either party by working together."

The ZCTU was still negotiating with the Party and its Government for the release of detained labour leaders, he said.

Minister of Labour and Social Services Mr Basil Kabwe could not be reached last night for a comment because he was reportedly on the Copperbelt attending a funeral.

THREE FRG PROTOCOLS PROVIDING LOANS, GRANT SIGNED

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt] Zambia will receive K13 million in loans and a grant from the Federal Republic of Germany for the provision of locomotives for Tazara consultancy studies and industrial equipment.

This was disclosed yesterday at a ceremony at which three protocols were signed by Finance Minister Mr Kebby Musokotwane and West German Ambassador to Zambia Mr Gunter Wasserberg, in Lusaka.

Mr Musokotwane, who said the loans would go a long way in strengthening the economy of the country, explained that the first loan of K6.5 million will be used for the purchase of seven locomotives and spare parts for Tazara.

Another K5.2 million loan will be used to buy industrial equipment, machinery, spare parts and services, the minister said.

He also disclosed that a grant of K1.3 million would be received for undertaking various consultancy studies.

Mr Musokotwane explained that both loans, which will be concluded between the German Development Corporation and Zambia would be repayed in 30 years with a ten year grace period and a two percent annual interest.

"The present decade has witnessed significant increase in the commitment of development aid from the Federal Republic of Germany to Zambia.

"The funds committed between 1980/81 in fact exceed the total of about K54.2 million for the preceding two decades, the minister said.

He told the German envoy that Zambia was grateful at the continued assistance by his country and was convinced that such co-operation would be stepped up in future.

Ambassador Wasserberg told the minister that the loans and grant were a reflection of West German's commitment to the strengthening of Zambia and other developing countries' economies so that they can be independent of the West.

He said the loan to Tazara was another reflection of his country's commitment to one of the priorities of aid in Zambia in the field of transport.

West Germany believes that Tazara was an outstanding example of regional co-operation by the Frontline States, who must free themselves from economic and communication dependence on South Africa.

Mr Wasserberg said the second commodity loan had come at a time when Zambia was facing difficulties and he was sure that the country would make good use of it.

The grant, the envoy said, was equally important as it would finance studies on future co-operation between the two countries so that German assistance was of optimum use to Zambia.

Mr Wasserberg hoped that the signing of the protocols will go a long way in strengthening the good bilateral relations that exist between the two countries.

LUSAKA HIGH COURT JUDGE FREES ZCTU CHAIRMAN CHILUBA

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Miriam Chikoti]

[Text]

A LUSAKA High Court judge yesterday set free Zambia Congress of Trade Unions chairman Mr Frederick Chiluba because his detention was illegal.

There was drama immediately Mr Justice Mannival Moodley of Ndola passed the ruling as Mr Chiluba's supporters wildly cheered, scuffled with security officers outside the court and later whisked him away to an unknown destination.

Mr Justice Moodley had to clear the court before he awarded costs to Mr Chiluba after the uncontrollable supporters hailed, cheered and surged forward to hug their chairman.

Mr Justice Moodley warned the people their behaviour was disgraceful and could not be tolerated in court.

"I warn you. Any such behaviour could not be excused. It is not consistent with the dignity of the courts. Beware you might face disastrous consequences."

When Mr Chiluba emerged from the courtroom his wife Vera and a relative kissed him.

The scuffle was between prison and paramilitary officers and Mr Chiluba's supporters when the security officers tried to take the union leader to the Lusaka Central prison to formally free him.

There were shouts "where do you want to take him? He is free" before one man lifted him and said "I am taking him. If you want kill me now".

He was carried shoulder high by chanting supporters mainly ZCTU leaders and members who halted traffic at the High Court round-about.

Mr Chiluba was driven away in a white Peugeot 504 leaving the security officers helpless. One paramilitary officer remarked: "There would have been a riot if the application was dismissed."

In his lengthy judgment, Mr Justice Moodley said Mr Chiluba's detention on seven grounds was invalid.

On the first ground the judge said the State in a defective affidavit filed by Superintendent Barnabas Chilila had not given a sufficient answer to Mr Chiluba's challenge.

The State alleged that on August 11, 1980, at Atlas Copco where he works while commenting on the crime rate in the country, Mr Chiluba in his capacity as ZCTU chairman had said President Kaunda would be lucky if he was not toppled in the next five years.

Mr Chiluba denying the allegations said the words complained of did not in any way constitute a danger to public security and his detention was an infringement of his constitutional rights to freedom of expression.

On the allegation that he told labour leaders at a seminar in Kabwe that since Independence the Government had been running on an experimental basis and had achieved nothing, the court ruled that reading the speech Mr Chiluba read, he could not find any direct reference to the words complained of.

Mr Justice Moodley said there was nowhere in the speech any reference to the allegation that people could not have confidence in a Government which trots from one country to another begging for loans.

He said there was no doubt Mr Chiluba made no effort to shield his opposition to the policy of decentralisation.

"Nowhere in his speech does Mr Chiluba urge the participants at the seminar to incite the workers to go on a countrywide industrial unrest to force the Party and its Government to meet workers' demands."

Mr Chiluba's speech at Kabwe could only be described as robust, aggressive in tone, provocative, and to some it might even sound offensive, but if one reads the speech as a whole and applies an objective assessment, it could not be argued that a reasonable man could understand the address to mean what the State alleges.

On the ground that on March 13, at the offices of the ZCTU in Nchelenge, Mr Chiluba allegedly told the union that there was need to change the Government, Mr Justice Moodley said there was nothing secret about the meeting.

He believed Mr Chiluba's evidence when he said there were no ZCTU offices in Nchelenge. He did in fact meet ZCTU officials and discussed trade union matters and how the congress had accepted decentralisation.

On Mr Chiluba's address at a Labour Day rally in Mufulira where he allegedly said labour leaders and workers had lost confidence in the Party and its Government, Mr Justice Moodley said the speech appeared to be sober and far from being provocative, "one might even say conciliatory."

He held that the sixth ground of detention which stated that miners on the Copperbelt went on illegal strikes and resorted to violence and intimidation which resulted in the loss of human life and damage to property as well as disruption of law and order, was vague.

Intimidation

The court had not been told the number of strikes that had occurred and in what towns of the Copperbelt. There was no information on the nature of the violence and intimidation, and the circumstances of the loss of human life.

He rejected Mr Chiluba's contention that the State did not furnish him with all grounds of detention because they do not contain what President Kaunda said in his address to the nation on July 27.

The judge also threw out the State's allegation that between July 5 and 17 Mr Chiluba allegedly conspired with ZCTU general secretary Mr Newstead Zimba and other persons unknown to condemn, humiliate and show disrespect to Minister of Labour and Social Services Mr Basil Kabwe who was touring the Copperbelt.

Mr Chiluba contended that he was not aware of Mr Kabwe's visit and the strikes were caused by graduates and artisans who were demanding equal pay for equal work.

Mr Chiluba's lawyer Mr Levy Mwanawasa argued that the seventh ground was vague because the exact date of the conspiracy was not given and the method used.

On Mr Mwanawasa's submission that there was an infringement of Mr Chiluba's constitutional right to freedom of expression, the judge said any discussion of the topic merely became an academic exercise.

DETAINED ATTORNEY ALLEGES 'INHUMAN TREATMENT'

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

DETAINED Ndola lawyer Mr Nkaka-Puta alleged in Lusaka High Court yesterday that he was punched, kicked and verbally assaulted by interrogating Government officers who were trying to extract information from him about fellow detainees.

He was forced to do press-ups and threatened he would die from stroke like his late father Mr Robinson Puta and the late leader of the banned United Progressive Party Mr Simon Kapwepwe if he did not cooperate.

Mr Puta was allegedly stripped naked and one of the officers hit him on the head repeatedly.

He told Mr Justice Ernest Sakala he was made to go round and round and whipped on the back with a stick.

The officers allegedly decided to torture him because he did not give them satisfactory answers on information about detained former Bank of Zambia governor Mr Valentine Musakanya, former Home Affairs Minister Mr Aaron Milner, detained Chingola resident Mr Johannes Pretorious and suspended Zambia Air Force commander Major-General Christopher Kabwe.

Mr Puta was giving evidence in a petition in which he is urging the court to declare his detention unlawful and order his release.

He is asking the court to award him damages for inhuman treatment and compensation for wrongful arrest and detention.

He said on July 2, several police officers went to his office with a search warrant. During the search they collected two files related to the cases of Mr Musakanya and Zimco executive director for energy and transport Mr Patrick Chisanga.

The officers also searched his flat where they were particularly interested in a chapter from a manuscript of a book he was writing on constitutional law and politics in Zambia.

Mr Puta said the chapter related to the Presidential and General Elections of 1978. The officers took away copies of a London magazine Africa Confidential.

One officer went through his diary and was interested on the entries Mr Puta made on May 22.

Mr Puta said he understood why the entry interested the officer because one of the grounds for his detention was that he told Mr Pretorious about the proposal to exchange Zambian currency with US dollars abroad.

The money was allegedly to be used in rescuing Mr Musakanya and former High Court commissioner and Lusaka lawyer Mr Edward Shamwana, charged with involvement in last October's coup plot.

MAN ARRESTED FOR SPEARHEADING ANC'S REVIVAL

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

A CAMPAIGN to revive the defunct African National Congress in Southern Province has been uncovered and a man has been arrested by Monze police for spearheading the revival.

Provincial Member of the Central Committee Mr Mungoni Liso said in Livingstone yesterday he had alerted Party militants to look out for people organising the ANC.

Mr Liso informed a two-day Party meeting at Maramba welfare hall that the arrested man was allegedly found with old ANC receipts which he used to obtain money from the public and he was expected to appear in court soon.

Southern Province police chief Mr Basil Chibula declined to comment on the matter, saying it was political.

Pressed further, Mr Chibula said: "Just quote Mr Liso. He knows better".

Mr Liso would not say whether the man was acting on his own or if some people were working with him.

Appealing to people to be on the lookout, Mr Liso said: Anyone with information on the revival of the ANC should contact the police who should make arrests after investigations."

Mr Liso, who was flanked by provincial political secretary Mr Franklin Malawo, Livingstone governor Mr Mukazo Vunda and other top Party and Government leaders, said:

"We are aware of people who have been telephoning Lusaka telling Freedom House a lot of lies and accusing innocent people. This kind of thing must stop.

"Anyone with information in connection with the revival of ANC should report to the police for action and not to Lusaka.

"Do not be told by people in Lusaka what to report to them. If you are used in this way you are also working against the State because what you want is disunity in the nation."

He urged Party leaders to ensure that all their wards, branches and sections had security committees to monitor the activities of criminals.

EEC TO CONSTRUCT FIVE ADDITIONAL HEALTH CENTERS

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 28 Oct 81 p 7

[Excerpt]

FIVE HEALTH centres are to be constructed at a cost of K2 million by the European Economic Community (EEC). The centres are in addition to the five which had been put up by the EEC at various centres, mostly in rural areas, EEC chief representative to Zambia Mr Hugh Swift said in Lusaka yesterday.

He added that the K2m given to Zambia to be spent on the construction of rural health centres was part of the K85 million announced by the EEC in Brussels last Thursday in aid grant to African countries.

Last year, EEC technical adviser, to Zambia, Mr Jorgen Sonderberg said original plans were to build 10 health centres but that the number was cut down to five because of escalating costs of building materials. The EEC spent K1.5 million to build the first five centres in Eastern, Lusaka, Copperbelt, Central and Southern provinces.

Mr Swift said the centres would be built at Sikongo in Mongu, Nkulwashi in Kabompo, Mukumashi in Kasempa, Mano in Manza and Chilubi Island. He said work to construct the centres would start as soon as tenders are awarded.

YUGOSLAVIA TO INVEST IN AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY, TOURISM

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 27 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Happy Siwale]

[Text] Yugoslavia intends to invest in Zambia's agricultural industry and tourism in order to boost economic co-operation between the two countries.

Head of the Zambia Department on the Yugoslav Chamber of Economy, Mr Zarko Arsic said in an interview here that feasibility studies into the two projects would start soon.

He said besides establishing joint firms with their Zambian counterparts, Yugoslav firms intend to import oil producing crops like cotton seed, sunflower, groundnuts and soya beans from Zambia.

"In the tourism area we want to go into hotel business and arrange charters from here for Yugoslavs intending to go to Zambia for summer holidays," he said.

Mr Arsic, however, noted that while relations between Zambia and Yugoslavia were very good on the political side, this was not the case on the economic level.

"Trade has been declining over the past few years because it has always been lopsided. While this year we imported goods worth about K54 million, Zambia only imported commodities worth about K5 million," he said.

Yugoslavia imports copper and zinc from Zambia and exports finished commodities like machines for road construction, textile prints and other products.

"This is unfair. While we also buy copper on cash basis, Zambian firms get commodities on credit from Yugoslavia. Currently Yugoslavia firms are owed about K5 million," Mr Arsic said.

He said in order to avoid this imbalance in trade, the two countries should embark on a barter system of trade instead of cash.

Meanwhile, regional director of Energoinvest in Yugoslavia, Mr Milasinovic Tomislav said in Sarajevo that the company's projects in Zambia were being delayed due to lack of foreign exchange.

He said one of the plans, which has been shelved was that of linking all Zambia's neighbouring countries to one electric supply in Zambia and earn the country foreign exchange.

He said his company was currently owed about K15 million by Zambia because of lack of foreign exchange in the country.

LIVINGSTONE TO HAVE SECOND BLANKET FACTORY

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 27 Oct 81 p 7

[Text] Continental Textile Company is to set up a K2 million blanket factory in Livingstone, a company spokesman disclosed yesterday.

The company has already been granted a manufacturing licence and foreign exchange for the purchase of machinery.

Initially the company will have a labour force of about 100 workers. Production of blankets is expected to start early next year.

Continental Textile Company will become the second manufacturer of blankets in the country. Zambia Textile Limited is currently the sole manufacturer of blankets.

Blankets have remained a rare commodity for some time and as a result there is a flourishing black market in most urban areas on both locally manufactured and imported blankets.

In Lusaka for example, blankets valued at about K18 in retail shops, are sold by black marketeers at K30 while those valued at K30 are sold at K60 and more.

It is hoped that with the opening of the new factory, the shortage could be eased and the black market may be reduced.

Continental Textile Company is a sister company of the Livingstone Cycle and Sport Specialists.

TANZANIAN, ZAMBIAN CLAIMS ON DAR ES SALAAM PORT TRAFFIC NOTED

'Claims Highly Exaggerated'

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

DAR ES SALAAM, Tuesday. TANZANIA has dismissed as "highly exaggerated" claims that millions of Kwacha worth of Zambia-bound goods were damaged and pilfered at the port of Dar es Salaam within two years.

But it is reliably understood that a special committee of senior government and port officials has been formed by the Tanzania Harbour Authority (THA) to probe the claims by the Zambian Government.

The composition of the committee or when it was formed could not be established immediately.

Three months ago, Zambia claimed that it had lost almost K1 billion worth of foreign exchange through damages and pilferage of its goods within two years at the Dar port.

It said about K985,037,525 was wasted through damages and K1,948,917 worth of goods were stolen between 1978 and last year.

Deprived

The charge by Zambia was raised in the Zambian Parliament on August 14 when Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office Mr Fitzpatrick Chusia was replying to a question by Kafue MP Mrs Bathsheba Ng'andu.

The minister said Zambia had been deprived of about K1 billion worth of foreign exchange through damages and pilferage at the Tanzanian sea-port.

But general manager of the Tanzanian Harbours Authority Peter Bakilana described the Zambian claims as "highly exaggerated" and "beyond all bounds of reason".

Mr Bakilana said that at the height of congestion at the port of Dar, a lot of goods were lying about the port area and it was therefore difficult to locate certain goods.

Mr Bakilana said that some of the cargo had been sent to Zambia but might not have reached the owners.

"But we are certain that there was no cargo lost at the port. Some of the cargo is still lying at the port because the owners have either not shown up or have not been traced while other goods are scattered at various stations en route to Zambia," he said.

Infighting Affects TAZARA

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Oct 81 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE port of Dar es Salaam has yet again become the flashpoint endangering not only the Siamese-twin political relationship between Zambia and Tanzania, but also the future of their economic umbilical cord —Tazara.

There have been numerous rumblings of discontent from Zambian importers about the efficacy of that port: the general but pathetic lackadaisical attitude of the workers there: and, worse still, the unchecked pilfering of Zambian imports at the port and on Tazara.

Coupled with these are the complaints against prohibitively high demurrage costs and other unnecessary port charges on Zambian-bound cargo.

Hence many Zambian importers are shunning the use of the port of Dar es Salaam and prefer, instead, the longer albeit expensive southern route for their imports and exports.

Justifying this trend, Zincom's chief executive Mr Humphrey Samuchapi only last Wednesday said "gross inefficiency" at the port had forced Zambian importers to shun it.

But equally the Tanzanian port authorities have had their own grouses against Zambian importers, mainly for late payments of port charges and delays in claiming imports.

So naturally too they have been forced to institute punitive measures, at times without notice, against Zambian importers.

While this in-fighting goes on it is the jointly-owned Tanzania-Zambia Railway — Tazara — which suffers.

People need to be constantly reminded that Tazara is Zambia's lifeline. Nothing should be done to turn it into a white elephant. Nor should it be a curse like the albatross was to the ancient mariner.

Zambian importers and Tanzanian port workers alike should tirelessly work for its vitality.

If they cannot do this on their own free will then other methods, like the withdrawal of import licences, or the outright dismissal of lax port workers, should be applied very rigidly.

Forgoing Tazara because of its present problems and using the southern route instead is like running away from feeding one's own child because of its "teething problems" and spending one's energies feeding somebody else's grown up child.

Both Zambia and Tanzania shoulder grave responsibilities for the future success of Tazara as a viable economic entity. So both should stop the current dangerous and destructive invectives.

Lest we forget: the K450 million loan Zambia and Tanzania got from China to finance the construction of Tazara has to be repaid from the revenues that Tazara earns.

Worse still the servicing of that massive loan will begin in 1983. That is too close for comfort considering the economic and financial strains both Zambia and Tanzania are now in.

Where is the revenue to service that loan going to come from if Tazara becomes a white elephant for lack of profitable dual cargo cargo traffic?

Tanzanian Claims Against Zambia

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 27 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt] Zambia will not be allowed to move its goods out of Dar es Salaam until she clears outstanding port charges amounting to millions of Kwacha dating back to 1979.

Among the cargo estimated at 17,700 tonnes affected by the newly-introduced ban include the badly-needed oil and other petroleum products which pass through the Tazama pipeline from the Tanzanian sea-port for refinery in Ndola.

General manager of the Tanzania Harbours Authority Mr Peter Bakilana, confirming the measures said the action was not directed against Zambia alone but against all users of the port. He emphasised that Zambia was the biggest culprit in back-log payments.

Mr Bakilana said Zambia had not paid its port charges since 1979 which had amounted to K8.38 million.

"We have resorted to these measures to help the port authority recover dues and charges which are outstanding with our clients."

But Zambian Government officials are not aware of payments arrears.

Director of contingency planning Mr Nedson Nyoni said in Lusaka yesterday that Zambia cleared freight arrears in South Africa and Dar es Salaam in May after the International Monetary Fund released the first drawing of K120 million from the K1 billion loan clinched early this year.

Mr Nyoni said: "We know nothing about that (arrears payment). It was only in May when we paid after the IMF drawing," he said.

Unless the Tanzanian authorities indicated which arrears they meant and against what items, the Zambian Government was not aware of what they were talking about..

"If they have fresh details let them tell us about these so we can compare notes, otherwise we have paid," Mr Nyoni said.

The measures by the Tanzania Harbours Authority were taken after port users had reportedly ignored a notice last month asking them to clear their outstanding bills within two weeks.

The notice, according to Mr Bakilana, was issued on September 27 with a warning that the harbours authority would stop releasing cargo to importers if the outstanding accounts were not settled within the stipulated period.

Informed sources explained to the Times correspondent that the port users had been abusing the credit facilities offered to them in the past and this had resulted in the massive outstanding payments.

"Other ports around the world are insisting on payment before delivery of the goods. Unfortunately, we have to follow this system too to cut down on accumulations of outstanding payment," the sources added.

COPPERBELT PROVINCE CRIME RATE DROPS ESPECIALLY IN NDOLA

Mundia Commends Copperbelt Residents

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Oct 81 p 5

[Excerpt]

PRIME Minister Mundia yesterday commended Copperbelt residents for helping to reduce crime in the area.

Mr Mundia said he was pleased to note that the wave of crime which had hit the province, especially Ndola, in the past few months has subsided.

Mr Mundia said this when he addressed a huge gathering which welcomed him at Ndola airport.

He urged Party militants to work hand in hand with security forces to fight crime.

He paid tribute to the security forces for keeping peace during the 17th independence anniversary celebrations.

President Kaunda had praised them for keeping peace during the celebrations, he said.

Campaign To Equip Vigilantes

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

NDOLA businessmen have launched a campaign to raise K120,000 to buy three patrol vehicles to equip a volunteer "vigilante" group to help police fight crime.

The campaign is spearheaded by the Ndola and district chamber of commerce and industry whose spokesman said yesterday that already the first of the three vehicles had been bought.

The patrol vehicle is fitted with a radio linking patrolmen with the police.

Businessmen have been providing two vehicles and drivers at weekends to beef up police patrols in industrial and residential areas since April, but recently some companies found it difficult to continue with the practice.

"With immediate effect, between 17.00 and 07.00 hours the term 'sorry we have no transport' has been removed from the Ndola policeman's handbook.

"There is still a long way to go. We need more funds, equipment and company vehicles to cover the high risk times at weekends and public holidays," the spokesman said.

The volunteers needed more duty liaison officers to keep the programme running efficiently and counter the current spate of crime in the city.

In addition to its primary function of providing increased mobility to police, the security committee of the organisation planned to approach Ndola district council and police on the erection of street barriers.

Officer commanding for Ndola Urban, Mr Bradley Muntemba said yesterday that the group had not approached him on the campaign, but he was aware of its help in providing vehicles in the past.

"We welcome the idea of buying new vehicles, the erection of street barriers and the improvement of telephone facilities but they have not been to us to discuss these matters yet."

PLANT'S COMPLETION ENSURES NITROUS OXIDE SELF-SUFFICIENCY

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

ZAMBIA will become self-sufficient in nitrous oxide a vital medical gas — because of the completion of a K250,000 Zamox plant, Prime Minister Mundia announced in Ndola yesterday.

Speaking at the commissioning of the plant at Zamox factory, Mr Mundia who was accompanied by Minister of State for Commerce and Industry Mr Leonard Subulwa and Zimco director-general Mr James Mapoma, told a small gathering that the plant would save the country K200,000 in foreign exchange a year.

"Financial advantages secured by the installation of the plant are sound. The price of the product on the market will be reduced and the company will earn K200,000 in foreign exchange."

He said the plant was a good example of import substitution industries the Party and its Government had been urging the business community to set up.

The plant's major raw material will be ammonium nitrate produced locally by Nitrogen Chemicals in Kafue and handigas from Indeni petroleum refinery.

In the past nitrous oxide was imported and a lot of money had been spent to ensure all medical institutions were supplied with this type of anaesthetic.

He commended Zamox, Indeco and British Oxygen for setting up the plant and described it as a far-sighted decision.

MINISTER SAYS USE OF COAL FOR COOKING UNDER CONSIDERATION

Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 28 Oct 81 p 7

[Excerpt]

ZAMBIA is considering the use of coal for domestic purposes in view of the high cost of electricity and deforestation through charcoal burning.

Mines Minister Mr Mufaya Mumbuna disclosed this in Lusaka yesterday and said the Government had started negotiations with West German and French firms to carry out feasibility studies of large scale coal production and the provision of a cheap stove to be used for coal.

The Minister was speaking at a press briefing he held after a six-week visit to Europe.

He attended the International Atomic Energy Agency conference in Vienna last month, and later the copper inter-governmental Council of Copper Exporting Countries (CIPEC) meeting in Paris.

Mr Mumbuna told the briefing attended by officials of the mining companies and some foreign embassy staff that the Government had been greatly disturbed by the extensive deforestation because of indiscriminate cutting of trees.

"The President, fearing that extensive and indiscriminate cutting of timber would lead to desertification of the country, directed the Prime Minister to look into the issue of alternative sources of fuel while at the same time bearing in mind the need for inexpensive and readily available fuel for the people", he explained.

The Minister said following directives from the Prime Minister, his delegation made enquiries in Europe on the acquisition of a cooker which could burn Zambian coal.

The delegation visited and held discussions on the matter with a German company, Buderus Aktiengesellschaft, a manufacturer of ovens and stoves.

Mr Mumbuna said the company would be sending a representative in December to assess the possibility of modifying a "Folkuoven", a cheap type of stove that could be readily available to the average Zambian.

The German company of Saarberg and the French Coal Development Group had shown interest in briquetting Zambian coal for domestic purposes.

Mr Mumbuna explained that briquetting was the process used to remove carbon dioxide from coal.

The President said the freedom to hold independent opinions was vital in today's troubled world. Dr Kaunda was speaking at State House when he was presented with an Aro jeep by the charge d'affaires at the Romanian embassy in Lusaka Mr Gheorghe Lupes. He said Zambia admired the Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu because he had strived to keep Romania truly independent. The gift of a jeep was appropriate as it would contribute towards the Zambian revolution. The jeep would be useful in his extensive tours of the country. The President thanked the Romanian government for providing technicians to train Zambians to maintain the Aro jeeps. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Oct 81 p 1]

ZAMBEZI RIVER EXPLORATION--The exploration and navigation of the Zambezi River from the Victoria Falls to the Kariba by an American adventure group called Sobek Expedition, got underway yesterday. Leader of the expedition, Mr Richard Bangs and his team started the 80 kilometre journey in inflatable boats known as raft floats from the boiling point at 10.30 hours. The navigation of the river impeded by cataracts and rocks will take the 27-man crew almost two weeks to complete. While Dr David Livingstone and many others have navigated the Zambezi River above the falls, no one has attempted a trip downstream from the falls until yesterday. Dr Livingstone abandoned the navigation of the river when he reached "the largest curtain of falling water in the world--the Victoria Falls" and entered it in his diary: "It was the most wonderful sight I had witnessed in Africa, with scenes so lovely they must have been graced upon by angels in their flight." CAUSE OF POWER DISRUPTIONS--Current disruptions in power supplies to Lusaka, Kafue and Mazabuka residents are likely to continue until at least the end of the week, ZESCO General Manager Mr Roy Miti said yesterday. Mr Miti said that the blackouts and low currency supplies that the three areas have been experiencing in the past week are due to a damaged cable at Lusaka's Leopards Hill sub-station. The cable was damaged last week by a worker while work to boost power supplies to the towns was being carried out, he explained. The Leopards Hill power is run by the Central African Power Corporation (CAPC), which in turn supplies ZESCO for distribution to consumers. The general manager said that the damaged cable is still to be repaired by an expert but the installation of the new transformers to meet growing demand in Lusaka, Kafue and Mazabuka to be completed at the Leopards Hill station shortly should ensure that the supply situation is normalised soon.— Zana [Text] [Lusaka DAILY MAIL in English 28 Oct 81 p 3]

ZVOBGO: PARTY, STATE UNITY 'OUR OBJECTIVE'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 2 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

ZANU (PF) is aiming at a situation where there is no separation between party and state, according to Dr Eddison Zvobgo, the party's acting publicity secretary.

In an interview with the Mozambique news agency, AIM, the text of which was released last week, Dr Zvobgo who is also Minister of Local Government and Housing, said the intention was to eliminate all other parties from the ground.

"We are convinced," he said, "that before the middle or the end of next year we will have so reorganised the party that it will be impossible for any other party to operate on the ground.

"They can remain in their offices in town but they will not be able to go out there to face the people."

Dr Zvobgo said the multi-party system was divisive and more than foolish. Time was spent in quarrelling with other parties for nothing.

"You know the line but you find impediments being put in your way," he said.

He said a committee of seven within ZANU (PF) was working out a strategy for neutralising other parties.

A consensus of the people would bring about a one-party state. "You agree on definite goals, definite programmes, a definite vision of the future. Once the people agree on these basics, then you have brought about a one-party state, regardless of what the leadership thinks."

Dr Zvobgo said he was quite sure there would be many in Dr Joshua Nkomo's PF party who would share this viewpoint.

He said that as ZANU (PF) became stronger it became more capable of neutralising the traps which had been built into the Lancaster House constitution.

"Under the constitution it was said we must buy land in order to give it to the peasants. But we do not have the money to buy all the land that is needed.

"We cannot nationalise it. We can take it, but pay for it.

"Meanwhile, the peasants have moved on to the land and the farmers come screaming to us in tears.

"They go to the police and the police say the Government does not want them to arrest the peasants. So they come to the Government and we say we are sorry about it. It is not right that the peasants should do that. "But we do nothing about it.

"So," said Dr Zvobgo, "slowly we have been able to neutralise some of the provisions of the constitution."

In another revealing response, Dr Zvobgo spoke about plans to transform ZANU (PF) into a vanguard party.

At this stage, he said, they were building a mass base throughout the country. This was necessary because they had not been able to operate legally for 18 years and the people had not received enough ideological instruction.

The second stage would be to transform the party into a vanguard party whose conditions of membership would be difficult to satisfy.

Not everyone in the mass party would be able to join the transformed party automatically.

People would have to learn to understand party history, the history of the war, the decisions of the first congress and so on.

A booklet was being prepared which would contain 52 lectures so that every week people everywhere would be studying the same thing.

When a person was able to understand the whole history of the struggle, he would have to give evidence of putting into practice what he had learnt in the community before acquiring membership at a higher level.

The second congress of the party would not take place this year or next year.

"By the time we have the second congress we will have a nucleus, a sizeable vanguard within ZANU (PF)," he said.

On white attitudes, Dr Zvobgo said very few understood the party's fundamental anti-racist policy.

It was taking time, but new class alliances were being formed across the colour line. In another year there would be a much larger segment of workers, as workers, were identifying with the party.

Dr Zvobgo accused the Republican Front party of Mr Ian Smith of adopting a negative approach.

He said both the RF and Bishop Muzorewa's UANC were bent on destabilisation and subversion.

"We have taken note of each and every move they make and we are sure that at the appropriate time they will be paying more respect for the law than they are doing now."

PROBLEMS CAUSED BY ZANU-PF SPLIT EXAMINED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Oct 81 p 4

[Article from "Focus" column: "Zimbabwe Strikes...Mugabe's Problems Have Only Just Begun"]

[Text]

IN ZIMBABWE the honeymoon is apparently over and workers are demanding hard things from the new government: higher salaries, in the case of the nurses, an increase by 200 per cent.

Prime Minister Robert Mugabe has been quick to act. He threatens to bundle them off to the bush for two or three months so that they would have an experience of the liberation struggle.

Is it by sheer coincidence that the strikes and demands for salary rises are occurring shortly after the dismissal of the controversial and perhaps ultravires minister of health, Herbert Ushewokunze?

Ushewokunze, like the equally fiery and now dismissed minister of manpower planning and development, Edgar Tekere, not only riled whites. He frightened them.

The continuing strikes in Zimbabwe should be seen within the political context of the new nation. The alliance with Joshua Nkomo's patriotic front is as tenuous as ever, if not more.

Perhaps the biggest score on the credit card of the country's politicians, notably Nkomo and Mugabe, is that most observers had predicted civil war after independence, but they have worked out peace.

That, however, is not to say that difficulties do not exist. The dismissals of both Tekere and Ushewokunze are indicative enough of what problems Prime Minister Mugabe is facing.

At this point it becomes important to identify the specific problems in the politics of Zimbabwe.

There are problems within ZANU-PF, the dominant partner in the ruling coalition; within Nkomo's Patriotic Front; within the coalition itself and at the same time the vanquished parties of Ndabaningi Sithole and Abel Muzorewa are waiting on the "touch line" to exploit any false move.

The major split within ZANU-PF is between the supporters of Mugabe's "progressive gradualists", and those radicals like Tekere and Ushewokunze who constitute "super-ZANU" and call for immediate outright revolutionary changes.

Since the beginning of last year super-ZANU has been demanding for a party conference at which the leadership was to be put to vote.

The strategy was fed on the expectation that super-ZANU candidates would dominate the new leadership, including even possibly replacing Mr Mugabe.

The congress has not been held, and it is unlikely that it ever will.

At the same time there are still thousands of freedom fighters still at assembly points, 22 months after they emerged from the bush.

Some of these men still place a lot of hopes on Tekere.

It is understood that a good number of them are already camped at Tekere's house in Salisbury.

The existence of such radicalism, directly challenging the slow progressive gradualism has meant that Prime Minister Mugabe must for the most part rely on an army, and civil service which is still white-dominated.

This has created the impression of a dream shattered. Super-ZANU is exploiting this, and the Sithole and Muzorewa camps are saying: "He is doing exactly what we did".

At the same time the threat from super-ZANU can only be effectively countered by maintaining white confidence, with more reliance on white-dominated machinery of statecraft and disciplining any minister or politician who "frightens" whites. Mugabe's is a real problem.

Within the coalition, it is evident that those in the minority partner, Patriotic Front, still feel they are getting less than they deserve.

At the same time, ZANU-PF is highly suspicious of some of the schemes of the Patriotic Front.

For instance, they are not satisfied that former freedom fighter commander Dumiso Dabengwa, promoted to major-general by Mugabe, has genuinely gone farming.

On the contrary, they feel he is subtly taking charge of the Patriotic Front's co-operative schemes which are being organised all over the country. And that these are, in fact, political units.

What is more, only a few months ago the government is reported to have found a large cache of ammunition buried near Gwai river, where some of the Patriotic Front men were assembled during the ceasefire period.

The internal fighting within the Patriotic Front is not yet serious. Nkomo continues to be firmly in charge without any opposition.

But the death of the PF's key man, George Silundika has left a vacuum which many are now fighting to fill.

Silundika, who was the party's secretary for foreign affairs and the government minister of posts and telecommunications died of a stroke few months ago.

He was considered most respected, after Nkomo.

There are reports that Edward Ndhlovu, an MP in Bulawayo and a freedom fighter who was based in Zambia, and Carlistus Ndhlovu, an MP for the Midlands, are putting up spirited fights for the party leadership with the latter coming up a hot favourite to become number two to Nkomo.

However, the PF's position is helped by the fact that they feel they have a common purpose yet to be accomplished.

And that is to take over the leadership of the country.

When strikes start off differences within the ZANU-PF take serious dimensions, the Muzorewa and Sithole men will provide auxiliary destabilisation.

Prime Minister Mugabe's problems have only just begun.

SA BLAMED FOR INKOMO, PUNGWE RIVER BRIDGES BLASTS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, alleged yesterday that South African agents were responsible for the series of explosions which destroyed $36 million worth of ammunition at Inkomo Barracks near Salisbury in August.

He told mass rallies at Mubayira, Mhondoro, and at Hartley that there were dissident elements in the national army and among ordinary people plotting to subvert the Government.

On the Inkomo explosions he said: "This was South African agents. They did not occur accidentally — it was a planned thing.

"We lost bullets, hand grenades and landmines. They thought we would be left with no weapons but they were mistaken," he said.

"Those were not the only weapons we had. We have enough weapons to fight those who want to destroy the Government."

It is understood that the report of the board of inquiry, under the chairmanship of Major-General Javed Maseko, into the cause and circumstances surrounding the explosions has not yet been submitted to the Prime Minister.

He told about 12 000 people in Hartley that some members of the UANC, backed by South Africa, intend to commit acts of sabotage to retard the economic development of the country and create discontent.

The Government would soon expose subversive activities of dissidents who had recently been arrested, he said.

The Government's policy of reconciliation had never been fully reciprocated by its main beneficiaries, Mr Ian Smith and Bishop Abel Muzorewa.

"We did not arrest Muzorewa and Smith because this would have caused unnecessary upheavals. But if they continue to plot against the Government they will realise that reconciliation does not mean we cannot arrest them or hit them very hard."

The Prime Minister, who is on a four-day "meet the people" tour of Mashonaland West assured people in Mhondoro and Hartley that the Government was aware of their grievances and was in the process of redressing them.

There was a likelihood of minimum wages being raised this month for workers in all sectors of the economy. "But at the same time we expect discipline and hard work in return."

He expressed concern at reports he had received in Ntabazinduna, Gwanda and Plumtree that people had been made to pay $150 by party officials who told them that the money was to buy land.

"The Government will give land to the people free of charge. All that will be required is gradual payment for improvements such as tractors and ploughs which the Government will sell to the people."

Mr Mugabe told about 600 students at Molelli Secondary School, Musengezi, that all children in the country should receive a minimum of four years' secondary education.

A child who had not gone beyond Grade Seven was not "an asset to his parents, himself and the State".

He called for greater co-operation between parents, pupils and the Government to ensure the advancement of educational standards.

He appealed to big companies to build schools and clinics and so contribute to the national effort to make available more vital institutions.

Mr Mugabe continues his tour today by visiting the Tilcor plant at Sanyati and addressing rallies at Nyimo, Sanyati and Murombedzi in the Zvimba communal area.

He winds up the tour on Saturday with a fund-raising dinner and dance at the Gatooma Motel.

SOUTH AFRICAN agents were responsible for sabotaging the Pungwe River rail and road bridges last Thursday, the Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office, Mr Emmerson Munangagwa, said.

In an interview in Salisbury the minister said: "This sabotage was committed by South African agents. We know that it was indirectly directed at Zimbabwe rather than Mozambique."

Mr Munangagwa said South Africa "would not be happy" to see stability in Zimbabwe.

"South Africa is fully aware that we use both the road and rail bridges for our imports and exports and that completion of the pipeline would improve the supply of oil and fuel to this country," he said.

The blasted bridges are about 50 km from Beira and carry the rail and road links from Zimbabwe.

Asked if the South African-backed Mozambique National Resistance terrorists had crossed into Zimbabwe, Mr Munangagwa said some had "but it has become known among their leadership that they are unsafe in this country".

"We capture them, arrest them, and send them back," he said.

On the question of security force auxiliaries of the former government of Bishop Abel Muzorewa now allegedly receiving training in South Africa, Mr Munangagwa said an official statement on the matter would be issued soon.

The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, has repeatedly said there were 5 000 supporters of Bishop Muzorewa in South Africa where they were being trained to carry out sabotage in Zimbabwe.

"We will soon be able to release evidence justifying the statements of the Prime Minister," said Mr Munangagwa.

PRESENCE OF N. KOREAN MILITARY ADVISERS PROVOKES SPECULATION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 2 Nov 81 p 11

[Article by Aida Parker: "A Curtain Over Mysterious North Koreans in Zimbabwe"]

[Text]

THE following ordnance will be delivered as part of the training programme agreed to between North Korea and Zimbabwe.

Ten T-44 tanks; 4 500 AK rifles with ammunition; B-10 anti-tank guns; 76 mm field anti-tank guns; 107 mm recoilless anti-tanks; 120 mm recoilless anti-tank guns; 14,7 mm anti-aircraft machine guns; 122 mm Stalin Organs; light and heavy vehicles; armoured personnel carriers; scout cars; rifles and auxiliary equipment; uniforms.

It is understood that 15 trainloads of ordnance will be moved from Beira to Umtali between now and December.

The scale and type of equipment being provided is indicative of a balanced conventional force in the form of a mechanised brigade.

It is stated that 3 000 Zanla personnel have already been assembled at Inyanga for training. The balance will probably be drawn from the 45,46 and 47 Battalions in Gwelo, all of these being predominantly Zanla.

Reports indicate that Brigadier Sheba Gava (Commander, Third Brigade) is directly involved in the formation of the 5 000-strong Fifth Brigade.

The North Korean officer element has been allocated accommodation in Baines Avenue, Salisbury. Although hardline Communists, they appear to have very capitalist ideas, demanding top-rate accommodation, lots of Scotch and perks like free haircuts at Meikle's Hotel.

It is further reported that anti-aircraft positions have been prepared and guns deployed. From whom an attack is expected, is not known.

OBVIOUSLY jittery about possibly adverse impact on the SWA negotiations, British and Salisbury authorities have clamped down hard on all information about the North Korean military presence in Zimbabwe.

Investigation by The Citizen indicates that the whole North Korean operation in Zimbabwe is webbed about by skilful deception.

Evidence of this is an unusual paucity of official statements. Surprisingly, no communique was issued after the recent low-key, week-long visit to Zimbabwe by a high-ranking North Korean delegation led by the North Korean Prime Minister, Mr Li Jong Ok. Official reason for no communique: Disagreement over the wording.

Alarmed

White staff officers serving in Joint High Command and at National Army Headquarters do not appear to be in the picture, nor are key personnel at Central Intelligence.

Reliable Zimbabwean sources state that British, US and Red Chinese representatives in Salisbury all expressed alarm at the Mugabe Government's decision to accept the North Korean offer of military advisers and equipment.

However, it now seems there has been some joint agreement to play down the issue, both to re-assure potential investors and to maintain an untarnished British image over the new Marxist State. It is not secret that Western nations are doing their utmost to present Zimbabwe as a political and economic success, to help pressure South Africa into relinquishing SWA.

The biggest mystery of all, however, is just how many North Koreans are actually in Zimbabwe, who is paying for the equipment they are providing and what their true function is.

At no cost

In Salisbury it was understood that when the Koreans came, they would bring around R15-million worth of hardware with them. Initially it was stated that, with the exception of administrative support (barrack accommodation and rations) the assistance would be provided at no cost to Zimbabwe.

Now private British sources state that the North Koreans say this is not so, that everything must be paid for.

Indications are that there could be considerably more North Koreans in Zimbabwe than has been disclosed. Official reports place the figure at 106. Of these, it is known that only six speak passable English.

A brief Press statement confirmed that the "official" complement of North Koreans arrived in a Russian-built Antonov in a pre-dawn flight which landed at Salisbury on August 8.

But, according to reliable Mozambique sources, between 150 and 154 North Korean military personnel were scheduled to arrive in Beira by ship during late July or early August. This unit, it was stated, would accompany the promised ordinance.

Speculation

On August 10, a North Korean TU-154 aircraft sought permission to overfly Mozambique's Gaza Province. Speculation is that this aircraft airlanded another (third) company of North Koreans.

On August 16, permission was sought for the landing of a North Korean TU-143 aircraft at Salisbury, coming in from Zambia. Did this carry another (fourth) company of North Koreans?

It is also known that seven separate North Korean passenger aircraft landed at Salisbury Airport between June 17 and August 25.

What is the true role of the North Koreans in Zimbabwe? Only Mr Mugabe's Zanla-PF Central Committee could answer that. What is known is that the Central Committee's decision to accept President Kim Il-Sung's offer of military training facilities was made against professional advice.

Mr Mugabe was urged to reject the offer because the West, particularly the US, is extremely wary of the hard-line Kim Government and this could jeopardise economic investment. That proved sound advice.

The Kuwaiti Government had promised the Mugabe Government financial assistance, but on hearing of the arrival of the North Koreans, Kuwait cancelled its proposed gift.

Certainly Zipra's Mr Joshua Nkomo does not know why the North Koreans are there. His theory is that they will be used to help Mr Mugabe declare a one-party State.

Most experts believe that the North Koreans will serve a dual role, much as the Cubans do in Angola. On the one side they will officer a brigade which can be deployed into Mozambique to help protect the rail and pipeline feeding from Beira into Umtali.

On the other??, they will probably combine with President Samora Machel's FAPLA forces to fight the increasingly successful strike forces of the Mozambique's National Resistance. North Korea already is believed to have sent combat troops or military advisers to Mozambique to help fight the MNR.

Mr Mugabe paid his first official visit to Pyongyang last October. In June, at a banquet to welcome the North Korean official party to Salisbury, Mr Mugabe spoke of the "immense inspiration" he had derived from the North Koreans.

SUCCESS OF ZX-CADRE PEACE FORCE REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 31 Oct 81 p 7

[Text] The 100 former guerillas trained and deployed recently with the Salisbury municipal security unit have been a great success and are ensuring the city remains peaceful and clean, says the city's chief security officer, Mr Roger Turner.

In an interview yesterday he said the first two courses had been completely integrated into the security unit and the expanding force would take on more duties.

Until recently the unit, then just over 200 strong, was simply responsible for guarding municipal installations and property.

But in the middle of the year the city council voted to employ about 750 ex-combatants, allowing the force to take a more active role.

Security men, both uniformed and plainclothed, had been deployed in the Harare Musika, Warren Park and Dzivarasekwa areas, checking for by-law offences and helping the police by simply extending coverage.

No member of the unit had any special power of arrest, just the normal powers of a citizen. "But their presence alone cuts down crime. Someone seeing a uniformed man around will think twice before doing anything.

"Of course, if they saw a theft or an assault they could intervene as could any citizen. On the minor side we use politeness.

"If we see someone throwing litter in the street they will walk up and ask, very politely, if that person could pick it up. There is no demand or anything like that and the system seems to work."

Centres

Although only three areas of the city were patrolled, more coverage would be given as the unit expanded. "I certainly want to cover all shopping centres and the city centre--places needing the most attention," said Mr Turner.

The improvement at the Musika had already been dramatic. The area was much cleaner and pirate taxis were keeping clear of the bus terminus.

Plainclothes men at Warren Park were keeping guard on council houses recently handed over by the contractors and ensuring no one stole fittings.

"We publicise the fact that we are watching the area, for we believe prevention is the best. It seems to work."

Mr Turner thought it would take at least 7 and 1/2 months to train all the planned 750 extra men. Each intake brings in 50 recruits, all carefully selected.

Qualities

"We select very carefully indeed, straight from the camps. Most of this work is done by my deputy for operations, Mr Richard Chinengundu. He is a former combatant and so has a very good idea of the qualities of the applicants.

The unit used similar criteria as the police. Recruits had to be at least 18, and have at least two years of secondary education, although more schooling was an advantage.

"We are getting very good quality recruits; very reliable men."

About half the training staff came from the ZRP but two inspectors from the unit were going on a police course and it was hoped this would make the municipality more self-reliant.

Selection

Recruits underwent a two-week course after selection but Mr Turner wanted to bring them back sometime for in-service courses.

Already 20 of the first 100 recruits were on a special fire-fighting course to supplement what they learnt in training.

"I want all the men in the unit to be trained in fire-fighting partly as a back-up to the brigade but also to deal with bush fires which the brigade, with its responsibility for life and property, cannot always attend."

Training

The expanded unit would take over many of the functions that used to be done voluntarily by the civil defence and all men received training in first aid.

Mr Turner recently returned from a conference in the United States where he picked up many ideas on equipment, techniques and functions. "We are looking at the possibility of patrolling road crossings outside schools; this sort of thing."

He was also negotiating for more powers for his men so they could handle small offences like ticketing people who had no car or bicycle licence, or who littered streets after being asked not to.

PM ATTACKS UNDISCIPLINED MILITARY, CALLS FOR LOYALTY

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 31 Oct 81 pp 1, 3

[Text]

THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, yesterday launched a scathing attack against undisciplined soldiers and threatened them with dismissal.

MT DARWIN

Addressing a rally at Marymount mission a few kilometres from the Mozambican border, Mr Mugabe said he would not tolerate indiscipline of any form in the national army.

The Prime Minister, replying to complaints raised by villagers at the mission, said: "I will fire any soldier who is undisciplined."

The villagers complained that they were "terrorised" by some soldiers stationed at Rushinga mission 65 km from Marymount.

Mr Mugabe, who is also Minister of Defence, expressed shock at the complaints and said the duty of the national army was to protect people and not to cause trouble.

The Prime Minister assured the villagers that the reports would be investigated and action taken against those found guilty.

He told the villagers to get the names of the soldiers terrorising them and report them to the authorities for immediate action.

The Prime Minister deplored the attitude of parents who stopped their daughters going to school just because they wanted them to get married.

BAD SYSTEM

"This is a very bad system because it retards the development of the country," he said.

He said Zimbabwe was badly in need of manpower and it could not afford the luxury of stopping children going to school.

"We need nurses, technicians, engineers and teachers, but we cannot be self-reliant if some people are being stopped from going to school," he said.

At another rally at Mukumbura, on the border with Mozambique, the Prime Minister said consumer co-operatives should be set up so peasants and workers could pay lower prices.

He urged people to help build schools and clinics by making bricks.

"There are few builders contracted to the Government and that is why we call for some self-reliance."

Mr Mugabe noted the shortage of buses in many districts owing to limited foreign currency reserves.

Increased productivity and more exports would enable the Government to allocate more foreign currency to buy buses and tractors.

The Prime Minister is on a tour of Mashonaland Central province which ends today in Bindura where he will meet district councillors and party leaders and address a rally.

Loyalty Is All, PM Tells Army

LOYALTY to the Government and State is a fundamental requirement from soldiers, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said in Salisbury yesterday.

He urged members of 1 (Zimbabwe) Commando Battalion on their first birthday parade to bear in mind that service to the nation, the Government and the country came before individual considerations.

If this was done the "Government and country will always respect and cherish you".

The battalion yesterday became the first Zimbabwe regiment to receive its colours.

The colours were presented after a solemn ceremony during which they were consecrated by battalion chaplain, Captain the Rev. Alec Smith and 2nd Brigade chaplain, Captain the Rev. Cuthbert Mavudzi.

The Prime Minister praised the battalion for its hard work over the past year.

He said that in November last year the first 118 members arrived from all former factions to undergo commando selection and training. Only 52 managed to qualify.

"The major task of re-establishing an effective commando battalion fell on the shoulders of 52 officers, senior NCOs and junior NCOs plus elements of the former commando unit.

"Between February and June this year you successfully selected and trained some 400 men."

The exercise ended successfully in July, enabling the soldiers "quite rightfully" to wear the coveted silver dagger and green beret symbolising qualified commandos.

He congratulated the commandos on achieving a high standard of training, not only in normal infantry skills but in rock climbing and abseiling, demolition, watermanship, helicopter operations and scuba diving.

"Perfect and improve your skills and always strive for higher standards in training and discipline than the already high standard you set for yourself and achieved," Mr Mugabe urged.

The commanding officer, Lieut-Col. Ian Buttershaw, led the parade of about 600 commandos, including 27 officers.

During the two-hour parade by the four companies, music was provided by the Zimbabwe Corps of Signals Band directed by Major Frank Hayes.

The colours were presented to ensigns Lieut S. Matava and Lieut F. Mzungwa.

MUGABE: STATE DOES NOT INTEND TO TAKE OVER INDUSTRY

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 2 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, has said Zimbabwe does not intend to nationalise any industry, despite being a socialist state.

Addressing representatives of commerce and industry in Bindura over the weekend, Mr Mugabe assured them that, although Zimbabwe had chosen socialism as its ideology, it would not nationalise any industry.

He explained that Zimbabwe had inherited an economy which was privately controlled and that it was not the intention of the State to move in and control industries.

"We found this economic system and we would like to carry on with the same system," he said.

IMPROVE

But the Prime Minister said the Government would improve this economic system along socialist lines, adding that industrialists would have a vital role to play in this system.

He assured them that there was no need to fear, as the Government had their interests at heart.

"We can assure you that there is no need to fear. We will keep your industries private as long as you conform with Government policy," he said.

On the question of foreign exchange, Mr Mugabe said industries would continue to face a shortage until the situation improved.

He explained that at the moment there was a lot of coal being stockpiled, due to lack of transport.

"Other products are suffering too, due to lack of reliable transport, and these are the products which earn us foreign exchange," he said.

He said the Government would continue making allocations to industries, using the same criteria it was using at the moment, and hoped that industries would accept the situation. —Ziana.

ZCTU CHIEF URGES WORKERS NOT TO STRIKE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 31 Oct 81 p 7

[Article by Elton Mutasa]

[Text]

THE president of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, Mr Alfred Makwarimba, yesterday appealed to workers not to resort to strike action as the only means of solving their grievances.

The ZCTU would not sympathise with workers who involve themselves in illegal strikes.

"There are channels which have been laid down and explained to the workers in regard to solving grievances. But we are surprised some workers are not following these regulations and are bent on causing industrial unrest," he said.

"This must be stopped for the good of the country and its people. We want to see a labour system where everyone works in harmony irrespective of colour or race," he said in an interview.

Mr Makwarimba made a blistering attack on workers who defied standing regulations and said those who did so should not seek help from the ZCTU if fired.

"It is imperative for all workers throughout the country to follow proper channels that have been laid down and not put the Government and the trade union movement to ridicule by taking strike action to solve problems.

"This country needs a disciplined workforce which has the interest to develop it for the benefit of its future generations. We are not going to achieve anything by going on strike, no matter how g[illegible]e our grievances are.

"Strikes only ruin our economy and our country. So let's follow proper channels."

Mr Makwarimba reiterated his organisation's stand that the Industrial Conciliation Act must be scrapped and replaced with one that was not discriminatory.

"There is no doubt that the present Act, which was promulgated by the previous racial Parliament, is inhibiting us from achieving our desired goals and we want it changed as soon as possible.

"There is no way we can be expected to put up with anything that divides the people of this country according to the colour of their skin."

The trade union movement in Zimbabwe had a tough time ahead in its bid to improve the workers' lot and "we will not achieve our aims if the present Act continues to exist".

He warned rival unions to "unite now" or they would soon be forgotten. It was vital to have unity in the labour movement in Zimbabwe to champion the workers' interests more effectively.

"The continued bickering by some unions must stop now in line with the Government's policy of one union to each industry."

A CUT in foreign exchange for raw materials will mean fewer fridges, cookers, televisions, radios and hi-fi sets in 1982.

BULAWAYO

The currency allocation reduction for the last quarter of 1981 will also affect jobs — but not dramatically — according to a spokesman for the manufacturers yesterday.

A spokesman for the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries said certain manufacturers had indicated they were thinking of retrenching labour because of the cut in production.

"Overall, the cut in import allocation will make only a small impression on the number of people employed in manufacturing industries," he said.

There had been a 12 percent increase in the numbers employed between March 1980 (149 200) and March 1981 (166 900).

There was constant discussion between the CZI and Government on the situation, he said.

The Supersonic Radio Company here announced it would carry the extra cost of surplus employees resulting from the 21 percent exchange allocation cut to electrical goods manufacturers.

General manager Mr Stuart Goakes said the company's production of radios for both local and export markets was entirely dependent on the foreign exchange allocation.

The cut would represent about a 14 percent reduction in finished radios off the production lines and could mean laying off 125 employees.

"Initially we considered laying off 75 people. However the company, in making representation to the Government for additional allocation, is making every effort to find additional export markets, and, meanwhile, will carry the extra cost of surplus employees," said Mr Goakes.

The situation has been discussed with the works council at Supersonic, which represents about 1 500 employees on two sites, and with the Ministry of Labour.

WANKIE EXPANSION DECISIONS FORTHCOMING

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 4

[From the "Investment Review" section]

[Text]

WORK is going ahead on schedule on the huge opencast expansion project at Wankie, according to the company's latest annual report.

But vital decisions are needed now otherwise delays may cause financial problems for the colliery company and power shortages and so hinder national development.

Decision one: Although the main dragline (to remove overburden at the new opencast mine) is on order and should arrive by the end of 1982, no decision has been made by the authorities on the size of the new national power station and until that happens Wankie Colliery cannot order the other necessary equipment.

The deadline fixed by the colliery company's technical advisers for this decision is January 1982. If delayed the coal needs of stage one of the power station will not be met.

Decision two: Government and company have still to conclude a new coal price agreement.

The one, suspended by government last May, forms part of the terms under which $87 million was lent to Wankie by various international agencies and banks.

These lenders must agree to any new agreement. If not they may withdraw from the contracts.

So funds could be held back until a decision, satisfactory to all — company, lenders and government — is made. This cash starvation would harm Wankie and slow down the commissioning of the new power station.

The formulation of a new price agreement is not an easy task.

Under the old agreement Wankie was entitled to raise coal prices to recover any shortfall in earnings which resulted in the return on capital employed being below 12,5 percent.

By last August the accumulated deficit recoverable under the agreement was $7,2 million, compared with an aggregate of $1,2 million a year earlier.

The sharp rise in the deficit was caused by coal tonnage sales in 1980/81 being at their lowest for 27 years, in addition there were large increases during the year in the wage bill and other costs.

It is understandable why government dislikes the suspended coal price agreement. It was too open ended.

In 1980/81 the net trading profit earned was only $58 000 on shareholders' capital of over $40 million — far short of the minimum return specified in the agreement.

But should coal prices move up in 1981/82 because exceptional events (labour disputes and transport difficulties, both causing production to be unusually low) all occurred in the same trading year and thus depleted that year's (and not necessarily future years') earnings?

What would the profit have been if production had reached the planned forecasts?

Would it not be more satisfactory to base any future coal price agreement on normal budgeted output, income and expenses?

As a suggestion, if these indicated a shortfall in returns on capital employed and this deficit should not be due to unusual circumstances but to exceptional and not short-term price changes (such as increased pay rates and inflated cost of shares), then a coal price rise would be permitted.

Nevertheless, even when Wankie has concluded a satisfactory coal price agreement, it will have yet to solve a few more problems.

Under the $87 million loan agreements Wankie is obliged to increase the amount of its issued share capital by not less than $9,12 million before the end of December. Current events make a public issue a non starter.

One way to solve the difficulty would be for the major shareholders to step forward and pick up the tab. Hardly a happy situation to be placed in!

A more serious, short-term problem is revealed by the technical advisers. They say "the colliery continues to experience a severe and increasing shortage of skilled manpower" and the timely completion of the opencast expansion project is essential if the expected future demand for coal is to be met.

But the "ability to attract and retain qualified and experienced staff to bring this major engineering undertaking to fruition is a matter of increasing concern."

One set of conditions under the loan agreements revealed in the annual report which should surely have been publicised earlier by Wankie is its agreement "not to pay any dividend if, until an agreed project completion date, it exceeds 12 cents per share on an aggregate annual basis."

The matter is perhaps now only of academic interest but may have been of vital concern to investors in February this year when the expansion programme details were released.

Any restriction on dividends should have been revealed immediately to the stock exchanges and shareholders.

ARMY TO FIX BEACONS FOR AIR SURVEY

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 11

[Text]

THE Surveyor-General's Department, faced with the task of maintaining some 2'500 trigonometrical beacons scattered around the country, has called in the army to assist with the work.

"Trig" beacons are fixed topographical reference points and are used by the Surveyor-General's Department in the production of maps. Many of them are in remote areas and as a result of the war or through the ravages of time, have become dilapidated and overgrown.

A spokesman for the Surveyor-General's Department told the Zimbabwe Information Service yesterday:

"We haven't got enough staff to go around and clear these beacons of secondary growth. That's why we suggested the army help us, because they have many people. They have agreed to help."

The beacons will be repainted with whitewash. An airmark, a big white painted cross will be laid out on the ground. The department will provide the whitewash and ropes for painting and setting up the beacons.

After all the beacons have been inspected, the entire country will be photographed from the air. If the job is perfectly done, all airmarks should be visible on the photographs, and they will enable accurate maps to be produced. The exercise is likely to last until April next year.

"We will be able to use these beacons, not only in development work when surveyors want to subdivide farms for resettlement schemes," he said, "but they will also serve as observation points.

VEHICLES

"We don't know how the army is going to tackle this," he added, "but they are using army vehicles and are supplied with camping equipment." The army sends a "stick" of six men out into the field for 14 days at a time.

The spokesman said the department was capable of building 20 beacons a month in good areas but could only manage five a month in bad areas. All beacons in the large centres had already been repaired and the army would concentrate on those in rural areas. The army would complete forms giving a detailed report of each beacon.

The report would be sent to the department by the Zimbabwe Intelligence Corps and specialist constructors from the department would rebuild each beacon. The spokesman said the army would consider this exercise part of their training in map reading.

"It will also be their duty to tell the people in rural areas not to destroy the beacons and to explain their importance," he said.

CROP PRICES TO BE ANNOUNCED IN FEBRUARY

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] Pre-planting prices for major controlled crops will be replaced in December by a comprehensive all-commodities annual price review, the Minister of Agriculture, Senator Denis Norman, said yesterday.

Senator Norman was speaking at the opening of a four-day rural data workshop in Salisbury, which is being sponsored by his ministry and the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organisation.

He said that to maximise agricultural production potential; and to encourage further growth the country must introduce appropriate pricing mechanisms to achieve the objective of food self-sufficiency.

Increased agricultural production and the strengthening of the role of agriculture as an important foreign exchange earner was another objective of an appropriate pricing mechanism.

Senator Norman said the price review would be followed by an announcement of the producer prices covering cattle, whole milk, maize, sorghum, soyabeans, groundnuts, seed cotton and wheat. The announcement for crops planted last month and this month was likely to be made in February.

He said the introduction of the FAO farm management data analysis package (Farmap) would be of enormous benefit in the fields of monitoring, recording and training and would assist the Government in implementing its policies.

IMPLICATIONS

The implications of the system were numerous:

- Its use by members of Agritex as an extension tool would help the farmer to learn basic record keeping.
- Economic data on the communal lands was limited and Farmap could help alleviate this.
- Monitoring of resettlement schemes by such a method was vital to ensure the successful implementation of the schemes.
- Nationwide surveillance of the agricultural sector coupled with the rapid retrieval and presentation of relevant statistics would be of great assistance to planners and policy-makers.

STAFF CRISIS SLOWS MINISTRY'S WORK

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 81 p 5

[Text]

A SERIOUS shortage of skilled personnel is restricting the work of the Ministry of Roads and Road Traffic, Posts and Telecommunications, its secretary, Mr Percy Mainwaring, says in his 1980 report.

The report says the change from war to peace, the replacement of staff, and changes in Government policy led to a shortage of experienced staff.

Many of the workers replacing people who had left were academically well qualified, but lacked experience.

"Exceptional staff losses occurred throughout the ministry so that there is now a serious shortage of experienced men. Fortunately the ministry's training programme has effectively made up numbers in most areas and disciplines but there is a preponderance of inexperienced personnel."

The areas of greatest concern were civil engineers and vehicle inspectors where special qualifications were needed.

There were 20 vacant posts for civil engineers, six vacancies for vehicle examiners, three for senior clerks in the central registry, and 20 vacancies in the vehicle inspectorate.

The staff position for the finance and accounts section was, however, adequate. But, Mr Mainwaring added:

"A new problem being faced in the provincial accounts offices is that, at present, there are no promotion prospects for clerical staff, and the undesirable position has been reached where this ministry is recruiting and training staff only to lose them on promotion to other ministries. It is hoped that during 1981/1982 it will be possible to obtain additional posts of senior clerk in each provincial office."

Mr Mainwaring said lack of money and computer facilities had prevented the development of computer registration of drivers' licences.

The ministry built 240 km of roads and designed 134 km. Five hundred kilometres of road were resealed, and 1 082 new traffic signs were made by the ministry's sign shop. A number of second-hand signs were reconditioned.

Rural bus operators were lent $2,5 million to rebuild their businesses. The money is payable over five years at 2,5 percent interest.

STATE SEEKS TO ATTRACT PRIVATE INVESTMENT IN MINING

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 81 p 3

[Text]

THE Government is striving to create conditions to encourage private investment in Zimbabwe's mining industry, the Minister of Mines, Mr Maurice Nyagumbo, said yesterday.

He was addressing over 50 guests of the Zimbabwe Promotion Council at a luncheon in Salisbury.

"There must exist between the Government and private investors, the kind of mutual confidence necessary to maximise benefits to be gained from mining the varied mineral resources of Zimbabwe," he said.

New capital and reinvested funds were needed to expand the mining industry

"My ministry and the Government is persistently striving to establish conditions conducive to private investment in mining," the minister said.

However, investors should be prepared for "highly capital intensive" ventures and have determination and foresight and "the long-term future of the country at heart".

He told the guests that a draft Bill on the Mineral Marketing Corporation would be tabled before Parliament when it sits early next year.

"The Act will provide machinery for the Government to market all metals and minerals produced in Zimbabwe."

He assured members that the corporation's staff would be well-qualified and have the knowledge needed to market the country's minerals.

"Nevertheless, it will be essential for the corporation to proceed carefully and in co-operation with the present producing companies so that the country can build up expertise over the years."

In time it would find the best markets ensuring higher returns for both the Government and the producing organisations.

"Let us co-operate as companies in Zimbabwe to produce the kind of trust and results which can be the envy of the world," the minister said.

On the prospecting being done at present, he said that the search for uranium was in "full swing" and first results should be known next year.

Much work was being done on the nature and extent of coal reserves, he said, as several companies had exclusive prospecting orders.

A few gold mines were currently being developed and would be commissioned at the beginning of next year.

DECISION ON ZINCA PLANT DUE NEXT YEAR

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

A DECISION on whether to expand the $2 million Zinca pilot platinum plant near Hartley will be taken next year.

Mr Andrew Ledingham, a director of Rio Tinto Mining (Zimbabwe) Ltd, said yesterday that the pilot plant, which came into operation in August, was built to test different mining methods and treatment processes.

"A decision to develop the mine will be taken in 1982 and if we go ahead, it will take another two to two and a half years to complete," said Mr Ledingham.

The decision would be influenced by a number of factors, not just world prices for platinum, metallurgy and mining extraction, but also the proposed Mineral Marketing Agency and Government.

RTMZ decided to go ahead with the pilot plant, which was designed, engineered and erected by the company's own personnel, after its parent company injected £5 million ($3,7m) of cash last year, followed by a rights issue.

Mr Ledingham stressed that RTMZ was not breaking any new ground as Union Carbide had been there before.

The American-owned company ran a pilot mine at Makwiro from 1968 to 1972 when it was closed because of acute mining problems.

The pilot plant, according to Union Carbide's managing director in Zimbabwe, Mr Lee Kimble, was moved to its Mimosa mine near Shabani in 1974.

GOLD

"Drilling tests had shown deposits of copper, nickel, platinum, palladium and gold, but none in sufficient quantities. We did however, sink a pilot shaft at the Mimosa after those borehole tests," said Mr Kimble.

Depressed world prices after 1976 forced the company to put the project on ice although the mine is still run on a care and maintenance basis in the hope of better days to come.

"The cost of fully developing the mine in 1975 was $25 million; however, to be viable we needed to produce 2 000 tonnes a day.

"We are now looking at over twice that price, but what is needed is a return to higher prices," added Mr Kimble.

"They have been so low for so long that there is understandably a world surplus."

DDF OFFICIALS VISIT JAPANESE MOTOR COMPANIES

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

TWO officials from the District Development Fund recently visited Japanese motor companies to discuss future design requirements, spares backup and training facilities.

Among the companies visited by Mr John Saunders and Mr Green Chilongo, both assistant directors of the DDF, were Nissan Diesel, Nissan Motor Company, Komatsu, Yamaha and Hino Motors.

Charged with reconstruction and general development in the communal lands, the fund is replacing its older vehicles to make its transport system more efficient. It is also acquiring earth moving machinery to improve roads and communication networks.

Making up part of Japan's initial 1,4 billion yen ($4,9 million) grant to Zimbabwe, 33 Komatsu vehicles are waiting to be shipped out for the DDF.

It already has about 500 Datsun cars and light trucks in its vehicle fleet.

Datsun Zimbabwe, local agents for both Nissan Diesel and Nissan Motor Company, provides comprehensive back-up and will soon be opening a training school for maintenance personnel.

Komatsu has also run training courses on its earth-moving vehicles for both operators and maintenance staff.

Two provincial mechanical advisers from the DDF recently attended a six-week course run by Nissan Diesel, both achieving high marks. Another artisan will go to Japan next year.

'ETHNIC-DUALITY' CONCEPT CHALLENGED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 6

[Article by Jonathan Moyo: "Another Look at the Nation's Economy"]

[Text]

ADDRESSING the recent Zimbabwe Business Conference in London, the chief economist in the Ministry of Economic Planning and Development, Dr Timothy Mutsonde, said Zimbabwe's full economic potential will be realised only after the elimination of what he called "its ethnic duality". (Herald, October 13).

It is my contention that Dr Mutsonde is fundamentally mistaken. The Zimbabwean economy, like those of many other countries, is not dual, rather, it is multiple and as such has far reaching governmental policy implications.

Explaining his conception of ethnic-duality, Dr Mutsonde said Zimbabwe has "a very advanced and sophisticated modern agricultural, commercial and industrial sector" coexisting with "an impoverished rural communal sector".

The average per capita income of the former, according to Dr Mutsonde, is at least 20 times that of the latter. As a solution to this highly inequitable income distribution, the chief economist proposed the full integration of the two sectors which would result in the elimination of the duality.

In other words, Dr Mutsonde would like to see the communal sector modernised. And yet, the experience of economic development in the so-called Third World countries has shown that uncritical modernisation of the communal sector leads to a number of counter-productive structural problems in the economy.

In the early 1960s Western economists and social scientists in general developed all sorts of "theories" which they imagined would complement the process of decolonisation by providing the newly-independent nations with blueprints for economic development. These theories were largely based on the economic experience of the West, and in particular on the Marshall Plan designed by the United States to recharge the economies of Western Europe which had been shattered by the Second World War and to combat what the Americans perceived as communist infiltration of that region.

The notion of the dual-economy featured very prominently as one of the fantastic theories of economy development. In the case of post-war Europe, the Marshall Plan miserably failed in Spain, Portugal, Italy and Greece because, it was claimed among other things, these countries had deep-rooted traditions which made it impossible to eliminate their dual-ethnicity for the purpose of modernisation.

Thereafter, the parlance of conventional economics was dominated by the dual-economy phenomenon so much that it became the framework of teaching economics of development.

Liberal Western economists were not alone in propounding the thesis of the dual-economy. Marxian economists thought likewise. In an essay on British rule in India, Karl Marx himself welcomed the destruction of the Indian cottage industry by the British East India Company as a blessing in disguise. This is because Marx explained away hub-economies or communal sectors as being essentially "pre-capitalist formations".

It is in this context that Marxian thought regards capitalism as a necessary stage of economic development, although it is true that Marxist-Leninists and Maoists would, because of their radical belief in crude nationalism, disagree.

What, then, is faulty with the dual-economy thesis? First, it should be noted that there is no nation in the "Third World" which has been able to attain meaningful economic development along the lines of the thesis. To make matters worse no sound alternative has ever been articulated.

The policy implications of the dual-economy phenomenon have been politically, socially and culturally disastrous. The integration of the communal sector has, more often than not meant haphazard destruction of the indigenous value system and its replacement by the ethos of the market economy.

This has resulted in untold political and socio-economic instabilities, a situation which is immediately apparent in most, if not all, "Third World" countries. Most regimes in these countries have resorted to repressive forms of authority such as those existing in Iran, the Philippines, Uganda, Liberia, Bolivia to name only a few.

Second, and more importantly, the thesis is spurious on economic grounds. The alleged duality does not constitute an abnormal economic situation. In fact there is no dual sector, but there is a multiplicity of sectors.

In a book that has not been given its due recognition by conventional economists, The Great Transformation, Karl Polanyi has shown that rather than having just one economy, most societies have several systems of exchange and economic organisation. He calls them "multi-centric economies" which are constituted by separate economies for different classes of goods and pursuits.

Examples of separate economies include the market economy as conceptualised by Adam Smith in his classical text The Wealth of Nations; and redistributive and reciprocative economies which have been meticulously documented by the eminent anthropologist Bronislaw Malinowski in his book Argonauts of the Western Pacific: An Account of Native Enterprise in the Archipelagoes of Melanesian New Guinea.

Each of the mentioned economies has a system of exchange which is distinct and self-contained. Each economy has its own rules, its own morality and more importantly, its own language consisting of symbols which are appropriate only to transactional modes in that specific economy.

ANALYSIS

In this sense, to talk of one mode of transaction predominating all others is a fallacy. Most recently, John Davies, an English social scientist, has shown how this is a fallacy through an analysis of the present British economy.

In his illuminating studies, Davies says that Britain has at least four subeconomies, each distinguishable by the rules which govern transactions within it. These are (1) the market economy, (2) the redistributive economy, (3) the domestic economy and (4) the gift economy.

The market economy is governed by laws of commercial trading, employment and labour relations. The redistributive economy is governed by laws of taxation, welfare and state expenditure. The domestic economy is governed by customs and expectations concerning the relationship between family members. It also includes all productive activities which are not mediated by the market economy, such as food processing and repairs of household appliances.

The gift economy is governed by rules of reciprocity and includes all those transactions which we call giving a present or making a gift.

The existence of variegated economies in Britain does not imply government recognition thereof. To the contrary, the British Government acts as if the market economy exists all by itself. Thus the other mentioned economies are treated as though they operate with the same motives, rules, language symbols and transactional modes as the market economy. It is, perhaps, not surprising that the British Government is finding it almost impossible to disentangle itself from the bewildering sky-high unemployment and inflation rates.

This is true not only of British but of many other countries although with differing levels.

Fragmental studies which show the existence of multi-centric economies in Zimbabwe have been undertaken over the last five years. Unfortunately, these studies have been without a comprehensive theoretical framework.

Under the auspices of the Catholic Institute for International Relations, Roger Riddell did a very insightful study on the informal sector in Zimbabwe, but failed to recognise that the sector should be analysed in terms other than those of the market economy.

It is this same failure which characteristically dominates the assumptions of the report of the Commission of Inquiry into Income Prices and Conditions of Service chaired by Mr Riddell. Zimbabwe needs an imaginative economic policy which should systematically recognise the multiplicity of the sectors if the country is to escape the pitfalls of economic development.

True enough, there is a great need to fully develop the market economy, but this does not mean that the market should be used as an all-inclusive policy tool. The communal sector should not be viewed as an abnormal situation. Rather it should be understood in terms of its own intrinsic transactional requirements.

National goals can easily be displaced when criteria for advancing a nation are the same as those of the market economy.

BRIEFS

STOLEN PLANE RETURNED--The Air Force of Zimbabwe Cessna 337 light aircraft stolen in August by Senior Aircraftsman Mark Jeffreys has been released by the South African government and was flown back to Zimbabwe on Saturday. A spokesman for the Ministry of Defence said yesterday that the plane was back in service with the AFZ. The aircraft, also known as a Lynx, was stolen by Jeffreys from Thornhill air force base on Sunday, August 16 and flown to Messina, a few kilometres inside the South African border. Jeffreys asked for political asylum when he landed. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 81 p 1]

SPY ARRESTED--An officer of the Zimbabwe National Army has been arrested in Bulawayo on an allegation of spying for South Africa. It is understood the allegations are being investigated by a board of officers. It is believed the officer, a white man was arrested about two weeks ago by the military police. HONORIFIC DROPPED--Mr Ian Smith and other members of the old RF cabinet are no longer "Honourable" men, according to a presidential warrant gazetted yesterday. The warrant, signed by President Banana on October 16, restricts the number of people entitled to use the title "Honourable." As in the past, the President, all Government ministers, Supreme and High Court judges, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Assembly are entitled to do so. But after leaving office only retired Presidents and judges can continue to use the title and then they must have served for at least three years, although not continuously. The 1978 regulations allowed all retired Presidents and Prime Ministers of Rhodesia to use the title if they had served one year and the President could allow judges, ministers and members of the legislature to retain the title if they had served at least three years. The President could allow former Prime Ministers of Southern Rhodesia who had served at least one year to use the title plus all former judges and ministers so long as they had served three years. A special section allowed the President to confer the title on someone who had served less than the required time but had "rendered exceptional service." Under yesterday's regulations judges can count service before independence as part of the three years they need to retain the title after retiring. AUGUST TOURISM--Tourists leaving Zimbabwe in August spent more than $3.28 million in the country and the number arriving was the second highest this year despite fewer South Africans. The latest figures from the Central Statistical Office show tourists in August spent an average of 10.9 nights in Zimbabwe, excluding those who stayed less than one night. A total of 38 006 entered the country, but 6 735 did not spend a night. Zambia is now easily the largest source of tourists, 16 008 coming in August but 4 953 did not stay the night. South Africans were the second, with 11 467 tourists coming from there, Botswana, Swaziland and Lesotho. Almost all stayed at least one night. People from Britain and Ireland were the third largest group, 2 459 tourists, but more than 480 of them stayed for less than a night. In the first eight months of this year a total of 183 839 tourists left the country after staying more than a night and spending $21,71 million. The figures indicate that last year's total of $24,2 million will be exceeded. In August, 1 602 people emigrated, mostly to South Africa, and 489 people immigrated, mainly British and Zimbabwean citizens. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 3]

CHEMICAL PLANT BREAKDOWNS--Que Que--It is understood the Sable Chemical Industries Ltd plant here, the sole makers of nitrogenous fertiliser in Zimbabwe, went out of production several days ago when one of their two boilers broke down. The other boiler was undergoing repair in Salisbury. Although the plant is shut down, gas is still being supplied to Zisco because the air separation plant is not dependent on the boiler. It is expected that the plant will be back in full production soon. A spokesman for the company declined to comment but said a statement would be issued by the Ministry of Trade and Commerce through the Ministry of Information. A Ministry of Information spokesman said yesterday there would be no statement at least until today. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 3]

TOP SOVIET FILMS--A festival of 10 top-ranking Soviet films is coming to Zimbabwe. The films cover such spectacles as the Bolshoi Ballet and the Moscow State Circus (a troupe of which visited Zimbabwe earlier this year) as well as fairy tales, melodramas, war epics and gypsies. They will run at the 7 Arts Theatre in Salisbury from November 21-24, and in Bulawayo from November 25-28. A gala premier of The Gypsy Camp Vanishes into the Blue will be held on November 14. The film is part of a whole string of plays and features on gypsy life in the Soviet Union and filmed at the Gypsy Theatre. Based on the stories of Maxim Gorky and directed by Emil Lotyanu, it was awarded the Golden Shell Grand Prix at the San Sebastian Film Festival in 1976. Ballet films feature some of the world's best dancers. There are also three films on war exploits during World War II and the civil war. Mrs Jean Brickhill, the public relations agent for Soviexport Film Productions which is bringing the festival to Zimbabwe, said all the films had been on world circuits and had drawn considerable acclaim. "This is also the start of our offer of feature films to this market from Sovexport." The Soviet film industry, up to now a mystery to Zimbabweans, would be available to audiences in Zimbabwe, she said. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 6]

MUGABE ON E. EUROPE TOUR--The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, leaves Zimbabwe next week for a tour of Yugoslavia, Romania and Bulgaria, a spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs announced yesterday. Earlier this year Mr Mugabe toured China, Japan, India and Pakistan, and recently visited Scandinavia before going to the Commonwealth conferences in Melbourne, Australia. MINING INDEX DOWN--The mining index was marginally lower this week, while the industrial index continued to show gains. Mining was 0.84 points lower at 72,45. EXPORTER'S PROBLEMS--A Zimbabwean firm has established contact with the Middle East for the export of market garden products but is finding difficulty in securing supplies. Director of Zimbabwe-Arab Trade Promotion Mr Ambrose Chikukwa said the company is unable to get supplies from most farmers as they already have established markets for their produce. The company is now trying to encourage rural farmers to sell fruit and vegetables to them as individuals or on a co-operative basis. There is a possibility that the company may develop its own farms to grow these products and it is looking for finance to do this or to make it a joint venture with other investors, both local and foreign. Mr Chikukwa said the Middle East market was a lucrative one with much opportunity for Zimbabweans as the Arab world imports most of its food. He gave an example of Kenya which he said was way up in its exports of fruit and vegetable products and where there is a parastatal body which looks into the export of these products. Although the company was called the Zimbabwe-Arab Promotion it does not mean it is restricted to the Middle East but can export local goods anywhere they are required. As soon as suppliers are found, shipment to the Middle East will begin. Mr Chikukwa said the Arabs were sceptical about Zimbabwe's ability to supply them with food as they believed that because of the country's isolation for 15 years it was run down. Zimbabwe, however, could easily satisfy their needs. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Nov 81 p 1]

MINISTER LIKES FRENCH GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE--Salisbury, 9 Nov (AFP)--The Zimbabwean representative at last week's Franco-African summit said in an interview with AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE that France now has a good attitude toward Zimbabwe, and there is no hindrance to his government's setting up an embassy in Paris. Zimbabwe has had diplomatic relati-ns with France since shortly after independence in April 1980, and Paris has an embassy here, but many Zimbabwe ministers who fought the old white regime resented the help given that regime as well as South Africa by French companies. For this reason France was not among the first countries where Zimbabwe established diplomatic missions, but Labour Minister Kumbirai Kangai told AFP he was impressed by the whole attitude of France's socialist administration towards Zimbabwe since meeting President Francois Mitterrand and Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson in Paris last week. The French side showed willingness to go into detail in terms of discussion of assistance to Zimbabwe, Mr Kangai said. Mr Mitterrand, who in May defeated incumbent Valery Giscard-d'Estaing in the presidential election, acknowledged that we have to start from scratch with Zimbabwe. PROTEST EXPRESSED AGAINST GROWING CRIME WAVE

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 27 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Ocirema: "Crime in Luanda"]

[Text] During the last consultative council at the Ministry of Interior, Minister Alexandre Rodrigues "Kito" referred to certain anti-social activities that are worrying everyone. Rodrigues Kito affirmed that a series of armed aggressions is taking place without any of the criminals being tracked down and reached by the arm of justice.

While the minister of interior's speech has not been sufficiently publicized, the truth is that it is right on the mark, touching on a wound half-covered by a scab of seeming recovery, when truth and reality tell us otherwise.

Here, in Luanda, people have become alarmed at a stream of news that can make the heart of the quietest citizen beat faster. Armed aggressions, kidnappings, theft of equipment, television sets, furniture, break-ins of commercial establishments and schools, rapes, automobile thefts, in sum, a long series of crimes which, in the very words of the minister of interior, remain, for the most part, unpunished.

In that same speech, Rodrigues Kito demanded more promptness and improved operations by the people's police forces, while simultaneously criticizing the corruption, liberalism and sabotage practiced by many members of the security forces.

While some members of the people's police force have been recently purged and we have witnessed an improvement in the police's technical ability, crime has not abated and tends to be on the increase.

The question is, what to do about it?

How should the honest and law-abiding citizen act when confronted with a gun pointed at him upon entering his home? How should he act, when what he has been able to purchase after months of saving disappears into a thief's bag, as if by magic? What to do when papers speak daily of automobile thefts? What to do when schools, state and private warehouses are broken into and pillaged by a group of "maffiosi" who are beginning to emerge like mushrooms after a rain?

It is indeed enough to worry all of us.

Yes, sir! It is time to take this seriously. Yes, sir! It is time to demand more vigilance from the police and other security organisms.

Yes, sir! This is necessary because the situation is becoming untenable. Thieves and criminals are becoming more and more audacious. They are using new techniques and maneuver with ability during the dark hours of the curfew.

Unfortunately, we have an excess of crime, which is reaching heretofore unknown levels. We believe that the public should know about the most serious crimes occurring in the capital and the rest of the country, as well as about the successes achieved by police against the gangs of "maffiosi."

As for you, dear reader, while the thief is looking on in surprise, start locking up, start installing bells and alarm systems, start barricading yourself.

POPULAR CONCERN OVER DISAPPEARANCE OF FISH IN MARKETS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 24 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Joao Serra: "Interview With a 'Carapau'"]

[Text] I decided yesterday to interview a small "carapau" [cheap variety of fish], the thin and not highly considered son of the sea bottom, with whom I have had the opportunity to familiarize myself in recent years because of the innumerable times he has visited my table.

To enlighten the reader, I may add that he is a little animal that, despite everything, is quite sociable and frequents all kinds of people, among whom he makes friends easily. He goes everywhere without prejudice and would give his shirt to a friend to ease his hunger, if necessary.

There is only one difficulty: whenever he visits me, he is always accompanied by rice and is not concerned about this aspect. But in certain other houses, he appears usually with potatoes, lettuce, fresh salads, good wines, etc.

But I do not resent him, because I know that he belongs to one of the most disadvantaged species in Angola. This is the subject of the interview he nervously granted me yesterday.

["Carapau"] Do you know that we are the most disadvantaged living beings in Angola?

[Reporter] (...)

["Carapau"] Indeed! We are segregated even in the price paid for us. Angola has set prices for all kinds of fish that abound in our waters. Any one of us, the mullet, the maigre, the whiting, all have a list-price even before they get caught in the net, but we are the worst-paid ones.

[Reporter] Yes, you are right, the "carapau" is the lowliest fish, and still, the one that has mostly contributed in recent years toward feeding the people. I agree, an injustice is being committed....

["Carapau"] I also have a few more complaints. Our biological balance is threatened, because, even with so much fish to be caught, we are the only ones to be captured.

I think it is high time for us to get a rest. After all, we have given enough proof of our willingness to cooperate with the food needs of the people in the country....

[Reporter] And how about the black market prices you command in certain establishments?

["Carapau"] That was to be expected. If industrial fishing boats bring in small catches and distribution organisms do not function efficiently, of course that makes of us a rare product, and black marketeers take advantage of this situation.

[Reporter] What do you think of other kinds of fish that have disappeared in Luanda?

["Carapau"] Biologically, we are related. They are perhaps more clever, because they don't let themselves be caught so easily, but they also fall into the net quite frequently.

[Reporter] But they have not been seen in Luanda for a long time....

["Carapau"] I don't know about this. Go ask the Ministry of Fisheries!

Indeed, I do believe that this is the best solution and I may do that some day; however, I am still convinced that my friend the "carapau" is kidding me when he tells me that these other types of fish are being caught regularly. If it were true, they would appear in fish markets.

Note: For those readers who think that I interviewed this "carapau" in my dreams, I say that they are wrong. I was sitting at the table and he was on my dish.

BRIEFS

ZHIVKOV MESSAGE--The president of the council of state of the People's Republic of Bulgaria and secretary general of the Bulgarian Communist Party, Todor Zhivkov, recently addressed a message to the president of the MPLA-Labor Party and of the People's Republic of Angola, in which he returns the congratulations sent by the Angolan chief of state on the occasion of Bulgaria's national celebration. "On behalf of the Bulgarian Communist Party's Central Committee, of the council of state and of the Government of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, of the Bulgarian people and of myself, I sincerely thank you for your warm fraternal greetings and your wishes," Todor Zhivkov's message stresses. "I take this opportunity to reiterate our deep certainty that the sincere friendship and cooperation between our two countries will be broadened and become even stronger, for the welfare of the Bulgarian and Angolan peoples and in the interests of the struggle against imperialism, colonialism, neo-colonialism, racism and apartheid, for the triumph of peace and socialism in the world." [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 22 Oct 81 p 1]

CROWDED LUANDA BAY--The bay of Luanda these days looks more like a shipyard than a commercial port through which pass all the exports and imports of the country. While the ships' holds are full of all the products needed by the Angolan people to feed and dress themselves and also intended for the support of the various economic activities, the ships anchored off the port of Luanda are like a stone in the country's shoe. Until when?... [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 22 Oct 81 p 2]

MESSAGE TO KIM IL-SONG--Upon leaving the capital of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea on Monday, the president of the MPLA-Labor Party and of the People's Republic of Angola, Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, addressed a message to Kim Il-song, secretary general of the Workers' Party of Korea and president of the DPRK. In his message, the Angolan chief of state offered his thanks for the warm welcome afforded him and his delegation during his first visit to the DPRK. President Jose Eduardo dos Santos also addressed to the Korean president his best wishes for the success of the peaceful reunification of Korea, for good health for Kim Il-song and prosperity for the Korean people. NEW OFFICERS--In a ceremony presided over by the commanding general of the FAPA/DAA [Angolan Air Force], Lt Col Ciel da Conceicao (Gato) held yesterday afternoon in the command installations of this branch of the service, a number of new officers were commissioned and promoted. A total of 14 captains, 19 first lieutenants, 11 second lieutenants and 5 sargeants were commissioned during the ceremony. Lt Col Ciel da Conceicao stressed that the new commissions mean an increase of responsibilities for each officer, because they will "lead the men who are responsible for the country." [Excerpts JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 30 Oct 81 p 4]

PORTUGUESE TRADE UNION ASSISTANCE--The Portuguese press is continuing to publish daily first-page articles on expressions of solidarity with the Angolan people, most of which are motions approved in the course of municipal and trade union assemblies. Thus the commerce trade union is conducting a campaign of voluntary work, manufacturing canned food to be sent to the People's Republic of Angola. In addition, workers in the metallurgy sector will contribute an ambulance and those in the industry sector will donate a large number of blankets. [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 25 Oct 81 p 2]

BREAD SHORTAGE EXPLAINED--The EPAN, the provincial bread-making company, issued yesterday a communique in which it explains the reasons for the shortage of bread affecting Luanda. The communique states that shortages are caused by the lack of wheat flour intended for the capital's bakeries. As is known, the local milling industry does not function efficiently and as a result, our country continues to feed itself on the basis of imported flour, with all the disadvantages deriving therefrom, such as delays in the arrival of supplies, the unavailability of foreign exchange, etc. Luanda will be without bread for a few days and the old problem presents itself again. When will the problem of bread supplies be definitely solved, considering that it is a vital product? [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 28 Oct 81 p 2]

HUAMBO FISH SHORTAGE--The shortage of fish in the Province of Huambo has caused a great deal of concern among the population, since it is one of its basic staples. Added to the fact that the deficient transportation system must cover long distances to reach the central plateau, the problem of supply of fish is aggravated by the distribution system, which tends to be a heavy burden. Indeed, the EDIPESCA [expansion unknown] provincial warehouse which receives the fish cannot market it, and must consign it to the provincial domestic trade delegation where plans are drawn, with distribution to hospitals, bars, restaurants, hotels, etc. following. The EREMISTA [expansion unknown] company, which is in charge of marketing and distributing fish to state and private fish stores, owns a warehouse. To complicate the distribution system still further, the EREMISTA must deliver fish upon authorized requests that usually end up in "schemes" that irremediably affect the poor supplies intended for fish markets where people purchase the product. [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 30 Oct 81 p 4]

PORTUGUESE AID COMMISSION--Lisbon--Following the racist South African aggression against our country, a commission has been set up in Portugal, in charge of shipping to our country all donations for the victims of this aggression, with the major emphasis on the Province of Cunene. The coordinator for this commission is Antonio Fuka, second secretary of the Angolan Embassy in Lisbon. [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 25 Oct 81 p 2]

CANCUN SEEN AS FAILURE--The Cancun conference on development and international cooperation ended on Friday without an agreement having been reached. According to statements by the Canadian prime minister and co-chairman of the conference, Pierre Trudeau, the reopening of negotiations between the industrialized capitalist countries and the underdeveloped nations, as well as the establishment of a bank to finance the exploitation of the riches in the Third World are the problems that remain unresolved. The failure of this conference, which brought together the representatives of 22 industrialized capitalist countries and underdeveloped nations, was mainly due to the U.S. President's refusal to have the negotiations initiated within the UN General Assembly, where Third World countries hold an "automatic majority." According to the final communique, the participants in the conference assumed "different attitudes toward the solution of the problems with which they are confronted," and formulated "different criteria" on the issues discussed. PARTIAL WATER SUPPLY IMPROVEMENT--Benguela--The supply of water to the cities of Benguela and Baia Farta has significantly improved with the start of operations of the new water treatment plant, which can treat 510 cubic meters per hours. Meanwhile, sources close to the national water and sanitation company have stated that, despite the opening of new wells and the operation of the new treatment station, the problem of the water shortage in the city of Benguela will only be overcome when about 40 kms of pipes, now stopped up and obstructed, will be replaced. The same sources said that this is a long-term project, given the fact that no human resources are available at this time for such an undertaking. USSR EXHIBITION--The Soviet Embassy in the People's Republic of Angola inaugurated on Wednesday in Luanda an exhibition of technical-professional training in the Soviet Union, from 1821 to date. The exhibition also includes technical-professional training in Angola with the cooperation of the USSR in the fields of fishing, agriculture, energy and transportation, and civil and industrial construction. This training takes place mainly in the professional centers of Malanje, Lubango, Lobito and at the Ho Chi Minh industrial training institute in Huambo. HOUSING, CONSTRUCTION TALKS--Officials talks opened yesterday in Luanda between Angola and Mozambique in the field of housing and construction. The delegations are headed by Minister of Construction Manuel Mangueira and Mozambican Minister of Public Works and Housing Julio Carrilho. At the opening session, Manuel Mangueira affirmed that the meeting between the two delegations is taking place within the framework of the contacts initiated in Maputo and is a result of the need to exchange experiences and points of view between the two countries in the fields of housing and construction. The Mozambican minister expressed his satisfaction for being in Angola and stated that there is a vast field for cooperation between the two countries. [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 23 Oct 81 p 1]

CUBAN MINISTER SPEAKS ON COOPERATION--Cuban Minister of Overseas Construction Levi Farah, who recently visited the People's Republic of Angola, granted an interview to the PRENSA LATINA, the Cuban information agency, in which he stressed the fact that cooperation plans between Cuba and Angola are already set up for 1982 and for long-term joint enterprises. In the interview, Levi Farah emphasized that among the most important results of this cooperation are the construction of more than 2,000 housing units in the Angolan capital of Lunda, 50 bridges that will permit communication between the country's most important cities and the construction of installations for aqueducts and schools, as well as the training of Angolan technicians in various branches of the construction industry. Levi Farah added that Cuban construction workers are presently engaged in building infrastructures for the port of Luanda, in constructing another 2,000 housing units in 6 Angolan provinces and hydroelectric dams such as the one in Lucapa, the capital of Lunda-Norte. In conclusion, Levi Farah stressed that cooperation between Cuba and the People's Republic of Angola, especially in construction, has developed significantly in recent years: a mixed Angolan-Cuban firm, the "Tecnogiron," was recently established, devoting itself almost exclusively, in this first phase, to the construction of school buildings. KEREKOU RETURNS, COMMENTS ON SUMMIT, TROOPS

[Text] Our great comrade in arms, President Mathieu Kerekou, arrived in Cotonou this afternoon from Paris where he had led the Beninese delegation to the Franco-African conference. He was received at the Cotonou international airport by members of the Central Committee, the Beninese People's Revolutionary Party, the National Executive Council, the diplomatic corps, the cadres present in Cotonou and a large crowd of militants chanting in honor of the achievements of our revolution, dancing to the drumbeat of the various folk dances of the Cotonou people. The presidential aircraft touched down at 1630. After inspecting the honor gruard, President Kerekou went toward the crowd shouting welcome to him and member of his delegation. He answered questions put to him in the VIP lounge by our TV colleague Henri Johnson. The head of state first mapped out the framework of the deliberations in Paris before he mentioned the issues of the Saharan people's self-determination, Namibia's independence and the stabilization of raw material prices and several other current issues.

[Begin recording] [Question] Comrade president, one will recall that last (?Wednesday) you expressed the hope that the slogan "Africa for Africans" should become a tangible and living reality with the holding in Paris of the conference of the heads of state of France and Africa. Have your expectations been met following that conference?

[Answer] A priori, yes. Yes, because this was the first time the heads of state of France and Africa have met in Paris under the auspices of a socialist government. We can thus say favorable conditions were created to make the slogan "Africa for Responsible Africans" a concrete reality.

Meanwhile, instead of engaging in a long dialogue with you who promote the consciousness of our people through revolutionary information and patriotic education, we will briefly describe the atmosphere that prevailed over our deliberations from 3 to 4 November 1981 in Paris.

We can affirm that the conference, which took place in an atmosphere of mutual trust, was marked by direct and frank dialogue. This must be noted. We have henceforth inaugurated a new style of consultations between African and French leaders. We have above all noted with a great interest Mr Mitterrand's determination to rise above phony declarations of intention and to implement a coherent policy of assistance to developing countries within the framework of active solidarity with the Third World.

This does not mean that we should continue to stretch out our hands for assistance from developed countries. Instead, we should make up our minds to free ourselves from foreign domination by making efforts every day to step up production. At all events, the conference took notice of this new trend in the French socialist government, which we believe is perfectly consistent with the expectations of the people of Third World as expressed by their representatives.

The Paris conference was a forum, a framework of informal consultations which make it possible for all participants to extensively and beneficially exchange views on all major political and economic problems facing the world.

In the political field, there were follow-up talks on the situation in Chad, Western Sahara and Namibia. What does this mean? Chad has now reached a reconstruction phase. The Chadian people must henceforth be helped to resolutely launch the struggle for production and national construction. This also means that the OAU resolution adopted in Nairobi on the holding of a self-determination and independence referendum in Western Sahara must be implemented with consistency. Finally, this means that Namibia must become an independent state. In this regard, French President Mitterrand, whose country belongs to the five "contact group" countries, did not mince words and he told us that Namibia must really become a sovereign state in 1982.

In the economic field, we examined the worrying situation in African countries and laid special emphasis on the absolute need to stabilize the prices of agricultural and mineral products. The Paris conference came out with appeals, in particular to the international community, for assistance to Chad, a friendly and brotherly country which must be reconstructed.

In another development, the conference enabled us to realize that the French socialist government is willing to support developing countries. This does not mean that the people of Africa should go to bed, on grounds that the government of an industrialized country is determined to help us. This is why we want to take this opportunity to reiterate our satisfaction to French President Mitterrand, his government and the French people for the warm and attentive reception reserved the Beninese delegation. We are very grateful for this as we thank them on behalf of our people and out revolutionary state.

Finally, we want to tell the militants of the Beninese Democratic and Popular Revolution that we have returned from Paris more convinced than ever that salvation will come from no other country but from our people themselves. "Power to the people and all the power to the people," which implies these truths: production, national construction. This is why we urge all Beninese people to resolutely set to work, which alone promotes production and liberation, to become everyday more aware of their patriotic obligation to unite and to foster their action and their revolutionary thinking, the only guarantee for the consolidation of national independence and solidarity as well as for the harmonious development of our dear, beautiful country, the People's Republic of Benin.

That is, in a nut-shell, the specific atmosphere in which our deliberations were carried out in Paris. [End recording]

Replying to another question, on the possible participation of Benin's troops in the peace-keeping force to be sent to Chad, President Kerekou stressed the Lagos accords and recalled the countries chosen at the Lagos conference to provide troops. The head of state stated: Our country's participation in such a force is not a novelty. The problem, he said, is that of logistical means.

[Begin recording] We have just come back from Paris where we attended the conference behind the same conference table with Chadian President Goukouni Oueddei. He was asked about the withdrawal of Libyan troops in progress and whether he had information about countries willing to provide troops for the pan-African neutral force. With regard to Benin, the choice is not a novelty for our country had already been chosen, at the Lagos conference on warring factions, as a country likely to ensure security and to maintain order without partisanship. Before we left Cotonou for Paris, we received a special envoy from OAU chairman Arap Moi to whom we said that Benin was willing to provide troops under the condition that the troops be provided with modern logistic equipment. When the issue of the peace-keeping force came up again at the Paris conference, we said yes, but under the only condition mentioned. [End recording]

FRENCH MINISTER SAYS SITUATION DEVELOPING NORMALLY

Paris AFRICA AFP in English 20 Oct 81 p 24

[Article: "Cot Urges Confidence"]

[Text] Bangui, 18 Oct--The situation is developing normally in the Central African Republic since General Andre Kolingba took over as head of state from David Dacko on September 1, French Cooperation Minister Jean-Pierre Cot said here today.

The future of relations between France and Centrafrica could be viewed with optimism, but both countries, along with major international financial organisations, must work together to put the Centrafrican economy back on its feet and restore the democratic process, Mr Cot added.

The French Minister, who was making a stopover in Bangui on his way home from the Congo, said a climate of confidence must be re-established to relaunch economic activity for which Centrafrica had such enormous natural potential.

It was important that all internal forces in Centrafrica should come together for national reconstruction, Mr Cot added. Under Mr Dacko--installed with the aid of the former French administration of Valery Giscard d'Estaing--internal divisions had blocked progress, he said.

French aid to Centrafrica was the main item on the agenda of talks scheduled today in Libreville between General Kolingba, Gabonese President Omar Bongo and French President Francois Mitterrand's adviser on African affairs, Guy Penne. General Kolingba, whose trip to Libreville was his first outside Centrafrica since he took over as head of state, would be in Paris for the summit of France and its former African colonies from November 3 to 5, Mr Cot said.

The French Minister also expressed Paris' determination not to neglect its engagements towards it African partners "as long as Africa is unable to find the means of ensuring its own security."

The accumulation of arsenals of sophisticated weaponry and pressure by the superpowers of their intermediaries posed "serious problems," Mr Cot said. But he claimed that other African states, particularly Nigeria, now recognised the need for French troops to be stationed in Africa. "On my last visit to Lagos, I was struck by the fact that this is no longer disputed, either by the authorities or the press," he said. (AFP)

UN OFFICIAL ASSESSES NEEDED RECONSTRUCTION

AB051649 Paris AFP in English 1626 GMT 5 Nov 81

[Text] Ndjamena, 5 Nov (AFP)--The United Nations believes the reconstruction of Chad could be achieved in two or three years, Assistant UN Secretary-General Iqbal Akhund said here today.

Mr Akhund, who is leading a UN mission to Ndjamena, told AFP that reconstruction work could begin in six months, and that a team of UN experts could be in the Chadian capital for this purpose in a month.

The current mission led by Mr Akhund, who is from Pakistan, is in Chad to assess reconstruction and development needs.

The team, on its second visit to Chad in six months, will present some 50 or 60 projects for the country embracing all economic and social spheres of activity to the UN General Assembly next month.

Mr Akhund declined to put a figure on the total cost of these projects, but described them as coherent and realistic.

He said the cost of the individual projects was between 200,000 and 35 million dollars, and that each formed part of a pragmatic programme which takes into account the difficult Chadian reality.

Mr Akhund added that the priority of priorities should be given to restoring administration, which implied refurbishing or rebuilding ministerial and public buildings and the regular payment of civil servants. (Civil servants in Chad have received no salaries for the last six months).

The assistant secretary general also said that after talks with Chadian officials, he was convinced that the government of President Goukouni Oueddei was conscious of the need for a reorientation of the Chadian administration.

Mr Akhund described the present administration as over-abundant.

As a result of persistent drought in recent years in Chad, he said, its agriculture remained one of the most worrying aspects of the economy.

The UN's proposed projects also notably aimed at restoration of transport links in order to bring Chad out of isolation, improving its health and education services and to boost industry.

There remained much to do in Chad, said Mr Akhund.

The UN projects could be financed separately by interested countries after the signing of bilateral agreements with the authorities here, or through a meeting of aid donor organisations and private companies, he said.

Mr Akhund, who is due to leave Chad on Sunday, is to take part next week in a meeting for the reconstruction of Chad in Paris organised by France in which, he said, several international organisations would participate.

FRANCO-GABONESE RELATIONS SEEN ON UPSWING

Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Pierre Biarnes]

[Excerpts] President Bongo left Libreville on Monday 26 October for Luxembourg and Belgium, from where he will travel to Paris to participate in the Franco-African summit on 3 and 4 November.

Libreville--How are Franco-Gabonese relations? By getting ready to participate in the Paris Franco-African summit, President Bongo is once again providing proof that those who have recently been reporting that his relations with the French socialist leaders are worsening are wrong. The former French ambassador to Libreville, who was recalled at the end of the summer, had been the very mouthpiece for this opinion when, even before leaving the country, he had written in PARIS-MATCH that Mitterrand and his entourage "do not know anything about Africa and do not like it." However, it would serve no purpose to deny that a number of misunderstandings between the two countries surely have had to be cleared in recent times.

Indeed, it seems that in certain French financial and police circles in the Gabonese capital closely connected with the former majority, a systematic attempt had been made in recent months to foment trouble between Paris and Libreville, in an attack to preserve personal positions that are in serious jeopardy--at least at a future time--by the progressive application of France's new African policy.

Following Mitterrand's victory, the members of this small group undertook to foment unrest by presenting press excerpts to President Bongo or by reporting to him various rumors that would make him believe that some French authorities were seriously considering "destabilizing" his regime in favor of an opposition which, indeed, one is hard put to pinpoint. The authors of these maneuvers intended to induce Gabon to distance itself from the former metropolis, now governed by the socialists, while bringing about a rapprochement with other Western powers, notably the United States, a country which is indeed watching out for such opportunities all over black Francophone Africa since the 10th of May.

On the occasion of a press conference at the end of September, the Gabonese chief of state, who had been made to believe in the existence of a "campaign of calumnies," had denounced it, considering that it was targeted against "himself, his wife and his country." He had threatened to review his relations, and especially his economic and trade ties, with the former metropolis.

Since a break in relations would serve no one's interests, a number of telephone conversations between the two presidents, followed by Guy Penne's visit to Libreville, have rapidly diminished tensions, and in the best-informed sources in the Gabonese capital, assurances are now given that the members of this small group could well become the main victims of their vain maneuvers in the months to come. Ten or so of these very special "cooperants" will not have their contracts renewed when they expire in a few months, while many large Franco-Gabonese firms and some chairman of the board and director positions will be Africanized a little sooner than expected.

The head of state, after welcoming the parliamentarians back from their recess and congratulating them for the work they have so far done, urges them to continue with the spirit of flexibility and cooperation so necessary for representative parliamentary practice. After expressing his deep appreciation for the great assistance the Council of State is giving him in his talks, the president says: Our 5-year development program contains the framework of our economic recovery. The 2-year agricultural program I have launched to ensure increased food production has aroused support throughout Ghana. During the year under review, we have had bumper harvests. The president listed a number of food crops whose production this year was much more than last year. "Despite the measures we have taken, the economy is still plagued with low productivity in all sectors," the president says. "The resources available to government to tackle the country's problems have dwindled," he adds.

AB061102 [Editorial Report] Accra Domestic Service in English at 1044 GMT on 6 November continues to relay President Limann's address to parliament. The president says: "I wish to assure you that whatever the outcome of the delicate negotiations we are now pursuing, the country's interests will be saved." The president also announces that he has increased the producer price of coffee from 210 cedis to 500 cedis per load of 63 kilos. He expresses the hope that these increases will result in increased production. After announcing that cuts will be made in the budgets of all departments including his own office, the president says: Periodic checks will be made by the Finance Ministry and appropriate measures taken to avoid malpractices. "We have decided to monitor very closely recruitment into the public service. This decision applies to all government agencies without exception."

LIMANN STATES ECONOMIC IMPROVEMENT--The president, Dr Limann, has observed that business activities in the country have increased. The exploration of oil and other minerals have also increased, which indicates that things have improved from what they used to be. In an interview published in the current edition of the AFRICA NOW magazine, Dr Limann rejected suggestions that the investment code is a sell-out which has flung open the country for capitalism. He explained that there is no country which practices real capitalism or socialism. President Limann said he has his own views and plans about the CEDI, which he will disclose at the appropriate time. He noted that the present low-level production of 10 percent is reflected in the currency. The president said although the government has been cutting down on public expenditure, its effect has not been felt because it is still marginal to the problem. Asked if he was satisfied with the conduct of parliament so far, he replied that given the constraint the country has managed to keep well. He, however, urged MP's to introduce private bills in the house apart from government bills. He explained that some of the best legislations in the world are originated from private members' bills. On his relations with the Libyan leader, Dr Limann said he had no real differences with Libya apart from what he called that country's belief it has a mission to spread religious conflicts and revolution. VIEIRA GIVES REPORT AT FIRST PAIGC

[Text] Bissau, 9 Nov (AFP)--Nonalignment, national revolutionary democracy and the setting up of an independent economy will probably be the main features of Guinea-Bissau's policy.

These political lines were in fact reaffirmed by Brig Gen Joao Bernado Vieira, chairman of the Guinea-Bissau Revolutionary Council and chairman of the African Independence Party of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde [PAIGC] in a report presented on Sunday at the first extraordinary congress of that party in Bissau. According to observers, there is no doubt that the congress will ratify these choices.

The PAIGC led the war for the independence (1962-1974) in Guinea-Bissau and the political struggle in Cape Verde and it has ruled the two countries since independence.

Following the overthrow of former President Luis Cabral by the Revolutionary Council on 14 November 1980, Cape Verde decided however to found its own party--the African Independence Party of Cape Verde [words indistinct]. This led Guinea-Bissau to renovate its political structure by holding a congress of its sole party.

In his report, General Vieira expressed the hope that normal state-to-state relations will be restored with Cape Verde.

He spoke against any alignment based on blocs and supported any policy that is committed to the emancipation of the people. In this connection, General Vieira mentioned particularly the struggle by SWAPO in Namibia and of the ANC [words indistinct], the Revolutionary Front for East Timor Independence in Timor, the PLO and the SDAR. The chairman of the Revolutionary Council stressed that his country wants to strengthen its relations with those organizations.

General Vieira, who also expressed his support for the cause for the reunification of Korea, declared further that he wants to strengthen the traditionally good relations between Guinea-Bissau and its neighbors--Senegal and Guinea. From this perspective, he believed that it is particularly important to define fair and equitable maritime borders through a constructive dialogue. President Vieira expressed his desire to maintain relations of friendship and cooperation with Portugal and the democratic forces of that country. Finally, General Vieira expressed support for an open and frank dialogue between the Third World and the developed countries.

OAU TROOPS TO CHAD--Nairobi, 6 Nov (AFP)--The withdrawal of Libyan troops from Chad makes it imperative to deploy quickly an inter-African peace-keeping force in that country, Kenyan Foreign Minister Robert Ouko said today. Following the decision of Libya to pull out of Chad within a few days, it has become imperative for a pan-African peace-keeping force to go to Chad immediately, Mr Ouko said after arriving back from the just-ended Franco-African summit in Paris. His statement was Kenya's first official comment on the troop withdrawal, now in its fourth day. Kenyan President Daniel Arap Moi is this year's chairman of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), which is to organize the force. Mr Ouko said that he discussed the matter in Paris with presidents of Chad, Zaire, Togo and France. We have agreed on certain proposals which I must report to President Moi first about getting a pan-African peace-keeping force into that country. An OAU official said earlier in the week that it would take at least four to six weeks before an OAU force would be ready to be deployed. Zaire, Benin, Gabon, Nigeria and Senegal have all said that they would provide troops for a peace contingent. Asked if his country would send troops, Mr Ouko said that Kenya is chairman of the OAU and coordinates the efforts of African countries in that respect. The Sudanese News Agency SUNA, has reported that Mr Moi would go to Nigeria and Chad personally to oversee the organizing of the peace-keeping force. GUINEAN NATIONALS REFUTE NEWSPAPER STORY

AB052051 Monrovia Radio ELWA in English 1900 GMT 5 Nov 81

[Text] The friendly association of Guinean nationals residing in Liberia has issued a statement in Monrovia today denouncing the DAILY OBSERVER newspaper article yesterday calling for dissolution of the one-party system in Guinea.

The DAILY OBSERVER yesterday carried a front-page story captioned "Abolish One-Party System Guineans Tell Toure". It quoted a grup calling itself concerned citizens of Guinea accusing President Ahmed Sekou Toure of [word indistinct] nepotism and widespread human rights violation.

The statement, signed by the chairman of the association, Mohamed F. Ba and (?press secretary) to the Guinean ambassador to Liberia, M. Cisse, condemned and denounced the author of the article which he said was a mere fabrication attributed to Guineans residing in Liberia to create confusion between the neighboring brotherly peoples of Liberia and Guinea. The Guinean nationals said there is no group calling itself concerned citizens of Guinea existing in Liberia. It described Mohamed Kone, the author of yesterday's article in the OBSERVER newspaper, as an irresponsible individual, whom they said, has been living out of Guinea for several years now and had lost contact with the existing realities of the country. The Guinea national said, before he left his country, Mr Kone, who was a teacher, was known to have embezzled a huge sum of public funds in the school where he was teaching. The statement said it was absolutely absurd for Mr Kone to have advocated for a change in the one-party system of Guinea, a party which it said, adheres to the democratic principles and its leadership striving to bring about social, political, cultural as well as economic development.

The statement said [words indistinct] enjoyed total freedom of speech and they were (?constantly) urged to freely participate in decisions affecting their national life.

The association recounted the numerous contributions President Sekou Toure made to his country in the [words indistinct] and reaffirmed their total and indefectible support for the one-party system of Guinea under the leadership of President Toure. The Guinean nationals expressed appreciation and gratitude to the head of state and CIC Samuel K. Doe, and members of the People's Redemption Council as well as the people of Liberia for the great hospitality Guineans have been enjoying in Liberia. They expressed the hope that perhaps, historical and geographical paths binding Guinea and Liberia would motivate the brotherly peoples of the two countries to work hand in hand for the realization of their common goal.

PORTUGUESE PRESIDENT'S VISIT ANNOUNCED FOR END OF NOVEMBER

Official Announcement

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 30 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] The president of Portugal, Ramalho Eanes, will visit the People's Republic of Mozambique from 24 to 29 November. According to official sources, Ramalho Eanes will stop over in Cape Verde during the course of his visit to the countries of Southern Africa. While in that country, he will meet with Cape Verdian officials.

The Portuguese chief of state's visit to Mozambique comes after the visit to Portugal by the Mozambican minister of foreign affairs at the end of March.

This is the first visit by a Portuguese chief of state to Mozambique following the defeat of colonialism and the overthrow of fascism in Portugal.

The first contact between Ramalho Eanes and the Mozambican president, Marshal Samora Machel was of an informal nature in 1979, during the funeral of Angolan President Agostinho Neto.

Portuguese government officials are already in Maputo to prepare for the visit of the chief of state.

Ramalho Eanes will subsequently visit Zambia and Tanzania.

Comments on Eanes' Visit

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 30 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpts] The president of the Portuguese Republic will come to Mozambique on an official visit.

The news had already circulated for some time in certain cirlces. With the official communique, all doubts have vanished....

Presidential visits usually mean progress in the relations between two countries. Mozambique has been visited especially by chiefs of state and government from those countries that were able to understand the aspirations of the Mozambican people during the armed struggle for national liberation.

But Portugal was the colonial power.

In the eyes of the Mozambican people, the name of this country is indissolubly tied with oppression: In Mozambique there was the whip, there was forced agricultural labor, there was a violent process of exploitation, and Mozambique was that because they wanted it to be Portugal.

Independence did not automatically destroy this image. But, as is obvious, both Portugal and Mozambique, just like other countries, are not a uniform mass of people, they are not a static reality.

For the majority of the Mozambican people, Portugal had connotations of colonialism, but there were Portuguese who struggled against colonialism, as there were Mozambicans who supported colonialism.

But why speak of colonialism when relations between the two countries have now attained a level of mutual respect and when cooperation ties are being established that are advantageous to both parties? Why speak of this past that leaders of both countries have succeeded in overcoming?

It is necessary to speak of this because President Ramalho Eanes' visit to Mozambique is, above all, an act of anti-colonialism. It goes beyond the limits of the complementary economic interests of two countries, because it defeats the wishes of those forces whose interests are expressed in the need for Mozambique to be dependent on Portugal. And these wishes, it should be noted, are found among both Portuguese and Mozambican citizens.

President Ramalho Eanes' visit to Mozambique is also an act of cultural liberation. Among both colonizers and colonized, domination implies cultural patterns in both societies whose break-up is only possible when a new relation is created among individuals in the daily life of the two peoples. The fact that Ramalho Eanes will visit the People's Republic of Mozambique and not the place that used to be called the "overseas province" means that the Portuguese chief of state had become convinced of the need for the break-up.

NRM-CAUSED DEFICIT CASHEW MARKETING--The poor participation of the entities involved in cashew marketing in the provinces of Manica and Sofala has considerably affected this sector, and, as a result, established goals will not be met. The marketing of cashew in these provinces is viewed as critical, considering that out of the 7,000 tons mentioned in the plan, only 1,500 tons had been marketed until the end of September. Among the factors contributing to this situation is the apathy demonstrated by most of the entities involved in this issue, as well as the fact that armed groups of criminals are active in these two provinces, which produce most of the cashew crop. Still another factor is the lack of basic consumer items to stimulate marketing and the poor condition of access roads to cashew marketing centers. IMF ECONOMIC LOAN--[Communique from the Ministry of Economy and Finance issued in Dakar--no date given]--The IMF has approved an agreement authorizing Senegal to carry out purchases worth up to 63 million special drawing rights within a period of 12 months ending in September 1982. This accord will help the Senegalese Government in its economic stabilization program. The fund also approved purchases up to 42 million special drawing rights for the compensatory financing machinery due to the Senegal's export deficit recorded during a period of 12 months, which ended last June. This deficit is totally attributed to the 300 percent fall in export revenues from peanut products, which was caused by severe drought that has hit the country for many years now. Under this agreement, the IMF puts at Senegal's disposal a total of 105 special drawing rights equivalent to 35 billion CFA francs within the next 12 months. This important loan will be used for financing the country's economic and financial recovery program approved by the IMF. It will especially be used in paying off Senegal's internal and external debts, and in boosting the national economy. [Text] [AB031042 Dakar Domestic Service in French 2000 GMT 2 Nov 81]

CASHEW PRODUCTION CAMPAIGN--Dar es Salaam, 17 Oct--The roasting and selling of cashew nuts have been banned in the Southern Tanzanian region of Mtwara as part of an official campaign to boost national production of the nuts this year, official sources said. They said cashew production had declined from 145,000 tons in 1974 to an all-time low of 41,000 tons last year, adversely affecting the country's foreign exchange earnings. Cashew nut producers have blamed the Government for the decrease, saying that prices for the crop have not kept pace with increased production costs. DEMONSTRATORS OPPOSE NAMIBIA CONTACT GROUP--Dar es Salaam, 5 Nov (AFP)--A group of 300 angry demonstrators tried to confront delegates from the five-nation Western contact group on Namibia as they flew in here Wednesday night from Zambia for talks today with Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere. Police whisked away the envoys, from Britain, the United States, Canada, France and West Germany, as demonstrators chanted anti-Western slogans and displayed signs reading "gang of five, go home," "down with imperialism" and "SWAPO (The South-West African Peoples Organization) shall win." In a brief statement at the airport, Canadian envoy Eric Bergbusch said the Western mission is to carry out consultations with nations involved in the Namibian issue, with a view to implementing United Nations Security Council resolution 435 on a peaceful settlement to Namibian independence. The group is to fly to Nairobi later today to meet with Kenyan President Daniel Arap Moi, the current chairman of the Organization of African Unity. The mission, which is on a 10-country tour to explain the contact group's latest proposals for a settlement in Namibia, has already visited Nigeria, South Africa, Namibia and several of the African frontline states. NO SUMMIT ON NAMIBIA PLANNED--Dar es Salaam, 9 Nov (AFP)--Tanzanian Government officials today denied knowledge of plans to hold a summit meeting of the six southern African frontline states to discuss the future of Namibia. Their denial followed reports from Western diplomatic sources quoting Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere as having told envoys of the five-nation Western contact group during their visit to Tanzania last week that he would be getting in touch with other frontline member-states to discuss the proposed constitutional guidelines to Namibian independence. President Nyerere is the chairman of the frontline states, comprising Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe. [Text] [AB091530 Paris AFP in English 1522 GMT 9 Nov 81]

PRIME MINISTER ON FOOD PRODUCTION--When he was celebrating "World Food Day" yesterday in the city of Dar es Salaam, Prime Minister Cleopa Msuya mentioned important matters to stress in the future to increase the production of food crops in the country in order to become self-sufficient in food. He said that it is necessary to improve the distribution of seed to farmers, loan services, the distribution of implements, the collection and storage of crops and agricultural projects by the provision of irrigation. He said: "We are confronted by an emergency responsibility to increase the production of food in villages." He added that under usual conditions, when there is not excessive rainfall causing floods or when drought conditions do not exist, Tanzania can increase crop production to become self-sufficient in food. However, he went on to say in 1981-1982 the requirements for grain are estimated to be 660,000 tons and there is an estimated shortage of 270,000 tons valued at 700 million shillings for the period ending in June 1982. He stressed that these statistics show that Tanzania is not self-sufficient in food at this time and must import it. [Text] [Dar es Salaam UHURU in Swahili 17 Oct 81 p 1]

According to the SDAR minister of health, the message concerned relations between the SDAR and Togo and the development of the current situation in Northwest Africa. The SDAR minister said the Togolese head of state is an African leader known for his wisdom and kindness and he should therefore be informed of Africa's problems. CHAD PEACE FORCE PARTICIPATION--Paris, 6 Nov (AFP)--A contingent of Togolese troops will participate in the inter-African force for the maintenance of peace in Chad, it was learned Thursday night from sources close to the Togolese president in Paris. This decision was made at the request of Goukouni Oueddei, president of the transitional national union government of Chad, whom President Gnassingbe Eyadema, Togolese head of state, received on Wednesday for lunch, the source added. The Togolese president, who attended the conference of heads of state of France and Africa, is currently residing in Paris. [as received] A few days ago President Eyadema also had contacts with an envoy of the current chairman of the OAU, Daniel Arap Moi, Kenyan head of state, about the inter-African force, the same sources state. ZERBO RETURNS FROM PARIS, COMMENTS ON ISSUES

AB081026 Ouagadougou Domestic Service in French 0730 GMT 8 Nov 81

[Excerpts] Col Saye Zerbo, chairman of the Military Committee of Redress for National Progress [CMRPN] and head of state, returned to Ouagadougou yesterday afternoon from Paris. In the French capital, he participated in the eighth Franco-African summit. On his arrival, he head of state and the important delegation that accompanied him were welcomed by senior government officials in the capital, including the chairmen of institutions, members of the CMRPN steering committee and members of the government. After the military honors and an exchange of greetings, Colonel Zerbo met the press in the VIP lounge of the airport.

[Begin recording] [Question] Mr President, on behalf of the various news organizations represented here, please allow me first of all to welcome you back home. This time it seems that a new approach to cooperation has been tackled in Paris. Mr President, did this eighth summit fully meet your expectations and if not, what were the fields in which it failed?

[Answer] First of all, I must take this opportunity to thank President Mitterrand, his government, the people of Paris and through them the entire French people, for the warm welcome given us during our 1 week official visit and during the conference. Concerning the conference itself, as you have just said, I can say it was [words indistinct] a very particular summit meeting. In fact, right from the start, there was no agenda. The heads of state, on the spot, freely elaborated an agenda. On this agenda, proposed by the heads of state themselves, were economic and political issues, of course.

Concerning the economic field, discussions were freely held on topics that are of interest to each participant. In fact, each head of state was allowed to express his view on the areas that were of interest to him. As for Upper Volta, I spoke about agriculture, of course, because our target is self-sufficiency in food. Other countries spoke about raw materials such as cocoa and so on, because their prices are dropping daily, so, to sum up, the world should be made to realize the importance of the issue of prices of raw materials. You know that at Cancun, President Mitterrand defended the interest of all raw materials-producing states in Africa. So, everyone had to express freely and frankly his difficulties concerning these prices.

Then in the political field, we held talks over hot issues such as the Western Sahara, Namibia and Chad, of course. Although the discussions were frank and (?objective) at no time did the heads of state try to act on behalf of the OAU while debating these problems. We only exchanged views on them. I had the opportunity to meet several African heads of state and we discussed several bilateral issues, of course. Concerning Chad for example, I met President Goukouni. (?No one) doubts Upper Volta's willingness to come to his aid within the limits of its resources.

[Question] Mr President, you spoke about Franco-Upper Voltan bilateral relations with the French head of state, Mr Francois Mitterrand, apart from the matters related to the Paris conference. Can you tell us the main points of your discussions?

[Answer] The issues we discussed are mainly economic. First of all, I briefed President Mitterrand on the present economic situation in Upper Volta, with all its difficulties. It seems to me that he understands very well. Possible solutions were suggested. Now I hope that there will be a favorable follow up.

[Question] Mr President, before your departure for France, you made an important decision concerning trade unions activities, for reasons of security peace in our country. Also, in your policy statement on 1 May, you (?called for) working together in the national development process. Mr President, can you tell us how you made such a decision, bearing in mind the need for dialogue in the national development process?

[Answer] Certainly, for a constructive dialogue, social peace is needed. Our emphasis on working together will be useless [words indistinct]. The social order which we suggested in the policy statement is, above all, based on dialogue. But then dialogue entails mutual confidence first of all and willingness. We now notice a change in this course. We then chose to prevent rather than to cure.

[Question] Mr President, do you mean that you are ready to meet the trade unions? If you are, in which framework will these renegotiations be carried out, so to say?

[Answer] Absolutely. It is certain I must meet them.

P.W. BOTHA'S VIEW OF REFORM SCRUTINIZED

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 12 Oct 81 p 9

[Article by Hermann Giliomee in column "The Pattern of Politics": "How PW Sees Reform"]

[Text]

A DEEP political gloom has descended upon the business community, including prominent Afrikaans business leaders.

Business is now more worried about the prospects for political stability and economic growth than at any time since 1976.

There is growing disenchantment with the Botha Cabinet, which is seen as having failed to deliver on the promise of reform.

In a real sense the political gloom of October, 1981, is intimately linked to the euphoria of two years ago when Mr P W Botha faced down rightwing opposition at congresses, visited Soweto and called blacks South Africans, and met the business leaders at the Carlton conference.

Expectations

Because South Africa is presently in such a state of flux, politics more than ever before turns on psychology and specifically on the way in which leaders assuage the hopes and fears of all the people of this beloved country.

The great danger of Mr P W Botha's courageous performances in 1979 was that public expectations would be raised too high.

A statement such as the one by Mr Botha in 1979 at the Natal National Party congress that "apartheid was a recipe for permanent conflict" and that change was "the only alternative to revolution" lent itself to all kinds of interpretations, of which some were far removed from what Mr Botha had in mind.

To use the terms in which Felix Rotahyn judged President Jimmy Carter: Mr Botha aroused a wave of belief that he was promising a great deal; that was his chance of success as well as his greatest danger.

It allowed Mr Botha to build a broad base of support across ethnic lines in 1979 and the first half of 1980. But at the first sign of faltering the over-expectation was replaced by over-condemnation.

This may be cruel. But politics, like life, was never meant to be fair. All one can do is to record that history has a way of brutally dispensing with leaders such as Jimmy Carter and Nikita Khruschev, who had talked about reform in an undefined and upsetting way and then failed to follow through.

Lost

At this stage it is premature to depict Mr Botha as a Carter or a Khruschev. For one thing, he knows the realities of power well.

In this session Mr Botha seems to have lost that essential quality, namely real command of his party without which no leadership can prevail. But only a fool will write him off.

Secondly, Mr Botha still gives the impression of a man who wants to move towards a certain goal, unlike Mr Vorster, who partly guarded the status quo and partly reacted to developments forced upon him.

Mr Botha at least understands that an escalation of conflict is unavoidable unless certain processes are set in train and encouraged that will lead to a South Africa in which wealth and power are much better distributed than today.

Stripped of all the rhetoric, there are essentially three processes which Mr Botha has in mind when he talks about his "reforms" and states that he will not shirk from implementing them.

They are:

1) The process of educating and training blacks and allowing them upward economic mobility. This will hopefully produce a black middle class which can be "co-opted" as allies of the whites since they will acquire a vested interest in political stability and capitalism.

(This is the object of the Wiehahn, Riekert and educational reforms).

2) Secondly there is the process of regional development aimed at alleviating the poverty of the homelands, which will hopefully lead to a decentralisation of power to the regions where mechanisms of consultation between the races would be built from the ground up.

(This was what the Carlton conference of 1979 was about.)

Joint

3) The process of granting political representation to coloured people and Indians and erecting the organisational structures of a confederation of states.

This would start a process of political consultation, leading to joint decision-making on the national level and ultimately to power sharing.

For this the government has created the President's Council, which may be converted into an elected body after the government's constituency has grown accustomed to whites and blacks sitting down to talk about new constitutional arrangements.

Underlying everything is still a small but definite commitment to achieve a measure of gelykberegtiging — the right to demand equal treatment in education, training, salary and economic opportunity.

For coloured people and Indians this is extended to having an equal "right of say" in political affairs. (The Afrikaans word medeseggenskap is ambiguous; it may or may not mean power sharing.)

All this must be achieved within the next 10 (sic) years.

Forgetting for the moment the question whether the scope and rate of change are adequate, gelykberegtigings is within the context of Afrikaner nationalism a policy objective which is radically different from that of the past and quite new.

If one realises this, one begins to understand why Nationalist spokesmen see the reforms that they propound, usually in an unspecified way, as fundamental change.

And one starts to comprehend why the details of the Botha reforms are never spelled out, because gelykberegtiging is lethal ammunition in the hands of the Afrikaner rightwing.

Unlike at the first Carlton conference, business now has a much clearer picture of what Mr Botha has in mind when he talks about being serious with implementing his reforms.

Lethal

Unless present plans are changed, indications are that Mr Botha, on the occasion of the second meeting scheduled for November 12 in Cape Town, would particularly like to discuss the second point outlined above.

The business leaders would in all probability be informed at length of the latest government decisions with respect to regional development, deconcentration points, concessions to industrialists willing to invest there, and the Development Bank.

The overwhelming impression arising from interviews with business leaders is that they have little or no inclination at all to discuss this.

Business leaders are concerned with the issue of citizenship and political rights — how can blacks, through the Wiehahn recommendations, be given a labour vote but not a political vote and be denied citizenship?

They see it as a classic formula for destabilising the workplace.

Secondly there is the issue of influx control — why talk about regional development if all the evidence suggests that the acute problems of rural underdevelopment can only be solved by allowing people to escape from the depleted land?

Thirdly there is the question of time — can South Africa wait for Mr Botha's processes to bring, over the next decade, a more equitable redistribution of wealth and power?

Leadership

All evidence suggests that the political leaders and business leaders will be talking past each other in Cape Town.

One can only hope that the quality of true leadership will prevail, and here the onus lies equally with the political and the business leaders.

Above all they should remind themselves of the words of John Kenneth Galbraith (who may not be popular in either circle).

Galbraith has said that the essence of leadership is to confront unequivocally the major anxiety of the people in their time.

A leader can compromise but he cannot be thought to evade.

Mr Botha needs the business leaders as much as they need him to address the central anxiety of the broad spectrum of South Africans.

This is not whether South Africa can wage war successfully but whether the necessary reforms can be introduced in time to save South Africa, first from the fate of Northern Ireland, and then from the horror of a civil war.

BOTHA, TRANSVAAL NATIONALISTS LIKELY TO COLLIDE

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 18 Oct 81 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text] A fullscale confrontation is likely between the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, and rebellious Transvaal Nationalists at next month's Transvaal party congress.

Mr Botha, who has not been invited to address the opening public meeting of the congress, will face a barrage of toughly worded resolutions clearly attempting to tie him firmly to old-style apartheid.

This year's congress will be opened by Mr Botha's archrival, Dr Andries Treurnicht, Transvaal leader of the party.

And the next day, Dr Treurnicht will take the chair to preside over the discussion of the resolutions the congress will fire at Mr Botha.

In the past two years, Mr Botha has seriously alienated the Transvaal congress with his openly disdainful and roughshod treatment of the right wing.

This year the tables will be turned.

If the Prime Minister can't dilute the resolutions, the Transvaal will effectively dedicate itself to a newly-drawn manifesto of hardline apartheid--which will stand as a powerful obstacle in the way of meaningful political reform.

The explosive (word missing from source) are contained in three resolutions, all of which are co-sponsored by Dr Treurnicht's Waterberg constituency.

The first binds the congress to an "unequivocal" rejection of a common voters' roll or a common Parliament for whites, coloureds and Asians.

It further demands an assurance that "under no circumstances will legislation EVER be implemented" to place the voters of all races on one roll.

Logically

The second resolution requests that "normalisation and the movement away from discrimination" be clearly spelled out.

And the third requests the Government to ensure that:

--In both policy and practice, the policy of separate development progresses purposefully and logically.

--The tendency to regard South Africa as a unitary State, especially in economic and labour matters, be abandoned.

--Vague political statements be replaced with fearless, direct and purposeful politics.

A number of carefully laid traps lurk in the resolutions.

By passing the constitutional resolution as it stands, the Transvaal congress would place in the hands of rightwing Nationalists a formidable weapon in any arguments that might develop over the issue of a common Parliament after the President's Council has made its recommendations.

The perpetual ban on a common voters' roll would place Mr Botha in the untenable position of binding future governments for all time.

And the demand for an end to the practice of regarding South Africa as a unitary State in economic and labour terms, is a re-opening of the fight that developed in the party after Dr Treurnicht's controversial Marble Hall speech following the general election.

Dr Treurnicht said yesterday the fact that the Prime Minister had not been invited to address the opening public meeting was routine and not sinister.

There was an arrangement that the Prime Minister would open two congresses a year, apart from the Cape, Dr Treurnicht said.

So far this year, Mr Botha has opened only the Cape congress--and indications are it is the only one he will open.

PRIME MINISTER'S APPEAL TO PATRIOTISM EXPECTED TO FADE

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 14 Oct 81 p 10

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE Prime Minister's favourite way of getting out of tight corners is to wrap himself in the national flag and flail away at everything in sight, as he did when he opened the Cape congress of the National Party at Parow this week.

Even by Mr Botha's standards of political invective, this was a virtuoso performance. He used a scattergun on the Opposition, the HNP, Lord Carrington and Mr Malcolm Fraser, the World Council of Churches and some elements of the South African Council of Churches, the United Nations, the communists, and of course the Press, contriving to suggest — not too subtly — that they were all linked in an attempt to harm nice, flag-wrapped patriots like himself.

It should not be taken too seriously. Nobody would accuse the Prime Minister of excessive moderation or self-restraint, and party congresses tend to evoke the worst in political leaders.

And, anyway, his tirade reveals more than it conceals. His reform programme, boldly announced and timidly pursued, has outraged his Rightwingers without winning significant support from his Left. The business community is deeply disillusioned, as Mr Botha will discover soon when he meets its leaders again.

He dares move neither Left nor Right for fear of aggravating the damage on the opposite wing. All he could do in Parow was to mumble a bit about "holy cows" and then to take refuge, with an enthusiasm that betrayed his need, in an old-fashioned display of tub-thumping party politics.

But he managed, as he often does, to impart a sense that he is ready to resort to authoritarian remedies for the ills which he perceives. For the Opposition, accused of being an extension of South Africa's enemies, the Prime Minister's comments had an ominous and bullying undertone. As Mr Botha's half-and-half policies arouse more opposition on both wings, his habit of taking refuge behind the flag is likely to become less amusing.

POOVALINGAM RESIGNATION SEEN HAMPERING BOTHA'S PLANS

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 2 Oct 81 p 21

[Article by Peter Sullivan]

[Text] The excercise of the so-called "Poovalingam option" has dented the image of Mr Botha's personal instrument for change and will leave doubts in reformists' minds about the effectiveness of the President's Council.

Whichever way it is viewed, the resignation has partly if not fully vindicated the Opposition's rejection of the council for not including black members in its make-up.

Mr Poovalingam entered the council despite opposition from Indian circles but made it a proviso that he would not remain if blacks were not included within a year.

This option was then suggested for the Progressive Federal Party, which had been condemned for "boycotting" the council outright.

The leader of the Opposition, Dr Frederick van Zyl Slabbert, is now in a position to say "I told you so" and has in effect said the Poovalingam option was never on.

Meanwhile the Prime Minister is left with a council which is rejected by even moderate Indian appointees.

Mr Botha has labelled the council a prestige body and is on record as saying it has to work, there is no other way.

To his credit, he did say consistently that there was never any chance at all of blacks being appointed to the council.

But with the removal of Mr Poovalingam, any new appointee will be seen as to the right of Mr Poovalingam, himself a conservative man.

And if Mr Poovalingam felt the council was achieving something worthwhile it would have been easy for him to suspend his resignation until positive results made it unnecessary.

The only conclusion that can be drawn is that whatever reforms the members of the President's Council are talking about among themselves, they are not sufficient to convince the conservatives, let alone those of a more liberal stripe.

Mr Botha's reform intentions are therefore bound to be questioned yet again as scepticism in political ranks continues to grow.

Mr Poovalingam's resignation has dealt a severe blow to the Prime Minister's initiatives on improving the image of the government, writes a Durban correspondent.

Leaders of the South African Black Alliance said it now behoved other Indian and coloured members of the council to follow the example set by him.

The chairman of Saba, Chief Gatsha Buthelezi, said he was "very delighted" when he heard that his "old friend and political associate" had kept to his promise of quitting the council within a year if black representation on the body had not been forthcoming.

"Mr Poovalingam has provided living proof of honesty among certain politicians and I wish to congratulate him on his stand," Chief Buthelezi said.

The leader of the Labour Party, Mr Alan Hendrickse also paid tribute to Mr Poovalingam's honesty and courage in stepping down from the council.

GOVERNMENT URGED NOT TO SELL OUT NATIONAL INTERESTS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 21 Oct 81 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE SOUTH AFRICAN Government must give the Western contact group by March next year a date for the United Nations-supervised election in South West Africa.

This is what the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, and his two Cabinet colleagues, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr Pik Botha, and the Minister of Defence, General Magnus Malan, have told the internal parties in South West Africa.

Whether the South African Government will be able to comply is another matter.

But there is no doubt that the Americans are pressing South Africa to get the show on the road, to use an American expression.

One can understand their anxiety.

Since the Reagan administration has shown its friendship towards South Africa, and gave the Republic its support in the recent Security Council debate on South Africa's thrust into Angola, the Americans want some concrete response from South Africa to their South West Africa initiative.

The message goes something like this: "We've stuck out our necks for you; now you must give us, in return, something we can use to show that our faith in you has not been misplaced."

That something is clearly a settlement in South West Africa in accordance with the United States initiative and based on United Nations Resolution 435.

We have pointed out in this editorial column on more than one occasion that while South Africa values America's friendship, it should not do anything to maintain that friendship if it is at the expense of South West Africa.

In other words, the settlement must be one acceptable to the inhabitants of that territory as well as to South Africa.

The Reagan administration will one day come to an end; a more critical or hostile administration may succeed it. But South West Africa will remain our neighbour, and the form in which it emerges from the negotiations and settlement is of vital interest to us as well as to the territory.

That is why we should see that the points in the United Nations plan about which we have reservations are met.

The consequences, on the other hand, of not going ahead with a settlement can be serious, as Mr Pik Botha has pointed out.

If the US initiative fails, "the alternative will be painful and unpleasant", he said in Windhoek. The situation had now become acute and the international attention had become so concentrated that there was no more "escape time."

It was urgently necessary, not only in the interests of South Africa but of South West Africa, its people and its stability, that the territory should become independent as quickly as possible.

The 'price'

Mr Pik Botha is also reported to have said in an interview with the South West African radio service that the price of holding on to South West Africa might be "too great."

South West Africa's security was costing South Africa thousands of millions of rands.

He stressed that a speedy and possible solution must be found for the territory's own economic security and development.

We do not know how serious these arguments are. For example, a South West Africa that is our enemy might cost South Africa far more money in the long term than it is being forced to spend now.

Nevertheless, we can take Mr Botha's remarks as an indication that the Government wants a settlement if this is at all possible to achieve.

By going to Windhoek, the Prime Minister and his colleagues have helped to prepare the internal parties for the talks which they will have with the Western Five contact group.

Dr Chester Crocker, the US Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, is to visit nearly a dozen African countries to discuss a settlement, and will be joined by other members of the contact group.

He is taking with him proposals which he will discuss with South Africa, South West Africa and the Frontline States. He will also have talks with Swapo in Angola.

We do not know what his proposals are, but we can take it that the Americans will be trying to sell their initiative to Swapo and the Frontline States, as well as to South Africa and South West Africa.

The outcome will determine whether South Africa can meet the March deadline for setting a date for elections.

Since we do not know whether the delicate negotiations will succeed, we cannot say whether a settlement is in sight.

But we hope that if it is, then it will be of such a nature that the interests of the inhabitants of the territory, as well as our own, will be fully safeguarded.

GOVERNMENT OBJECTS TO BRITISH TV PROGRAM

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 21 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] LONDON. — The South African Government yesterday lodged an objection with Britain's Independent Television network over a programme which accused the Republic of forcibly resettling thousands of Blacks in homelands where there is little food, few jobs and rampant disease.

The programme, "The Discarded People", was screened on Monday night by ITV in its "World in Action" current affairs series and showed film the blurbs declared had been smuggled out of South Africa.

The South African Ambassador to Britain, Mr Marais Steyn, said the "World in Action" team had not applied for work permits before filming in South Africa and he did not approve of their methods, "which appeared to be wilfully unethical".

In a statement Mr Steyn said he was in close contact with the chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Authority, Lord Thomson, and had advised him of the South African Government's objections.

The ambassador said he had been invited to participate in the programme only last Thursday but had decided against it because he found that the "World in Action" team had not obtained work permits for South Africa.

"This put the motives of 'World in Action' under suspicion," he added.

"Had 'World in Action' followed the laid down procedures and approached the embassy in an open and ethical way it would have tried to obtain an interview with he Minister for Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, during their visit to South Africa last summer, since it was obvious that he was the most appropriate person to comment on aspects of the South African Government's resettlement policy purportedly investigated by 'World in Action'."

Mr Steyn said his request for a preview of the programme was categorically refused.

"This is fully within their rights but in all fairness it can hardly be expected of me to participate in a programme on the basis of the very sketchy information made available to me at such short notice," he said.

"More importantly, knowing that 'World in Action' had not respected the laid-down procedures for filming in South Africa, my participation would have implied tacit approval of their methods.

"I did not approve of their methods, which appeared to be wilfully unethical."

The ambassador said he had no objection in principle to participating in any television programme on South Africa.

The last "World in Action" programme on South Africa, screened in August, also sparked a strong protest from the South African Government.

The programme was titled "The Agony of Angola" and alleged that South African forces has been responsible for atrocities against civilians during raids into Angola. On that occasion Mr Steyn protested to both Lord Thomson and the British Foreign Office.

Monday night's programme featured film shot in Cape Town's District Six and the Ciskei and interviews with representatives of the Black Sash movement, the South African Institute of Race Relations and alleged victims of the South African Government's resettlement policy.

The commentator said many Blacks in the homelands "lack even the raw materials for survival.

"Blacks are only allowed in the White areas to work — they must have a special pass to stay there.

"The rest — their wives, children, the unemployed, the elderly and sick — are sent to vast resettlement camps in the distant homelands. They're crammed into camps by the hundred thousand. There is little food, few jobs and disease is rampant.

"To escape this plight many women and children return to the cities to live illegally with their husbands, and many unemployed men, unable to support their families in the homelands, come illegally to the cities in search of work. They live a hunted life in squatter camps surrounding the cities, always threatened by arrest and deportation."

The commentator said South African police had launched frosh raids on squatters this year.

"Thousands of South Africa's discarded people have been herded onto buses and driven out under armed guard to the distant Bantustans," he said. — Sapa.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIAL'S RACIAL SLUR CAUSES EMBARRASSMENT

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 14 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Chris Freimond and Helen Zille: "Koornhof Drawn Into Row Over 'Kaffertjie' Comment"]

[Text] CAPE TOWN. — A key man in the implementation of the Government's homelands policy has sparked off a serious row because he referred to blacks as "kaffertjies" in Parliament last week.

His remarks have caused the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, to send urgent telexes to homeland leaders giving a "true representation" of what he meant.

He is Mr Hennie van der Walt, chairman of the Commission of Co-operation and Development, which is investigating the consolidation of the homelands. Referring to the Langa squatters he said: "... I think the honourable Minister of Foreign Affairs should have taken action (instead of Dr Koornhof). It was after all people from Transkei who were involved. It was not our own kaffertjies. They came from outside our borders."

In reaction yesterday, black leaders called on the Prime Minister to take firm steps against Mr Van der Walt.

The chairman of the Soweto Committee of Ten, Dr Nthato Motlana, said Mr Van der Walt should be made to apologise. He challenged him to repeat the remark outside Parliament so he could be sued for insulting the dignity of blacks.

'Highly offensive'

Dr Motlana rejected the suggestion that the comments were not meant maliciously. "Some of us know that the polite words used to describe blacks are just a facade. Basically the South African racist has not moved away from the ideology that brought about the use of such terms," he said.

The Chief Minister of KaNgwane, Mr Enos Mabuza, agreed with Dr Motlana that "an insult is an insult and cannot be well intended".

The Prime Minister of Transkei, Chief George Matanzima — whose people Mr Van der Walt was referring to — said Mr Van der Walt should be rapped over the knuckles by Mr P W Botha.

He could not accept that the remark had been a slip of the tongue. "I get the impression he is used to using this term and a man in his position must know very well that this word is highly offensive to blacks," he said.

Dr Koornhof said yesterday he had sent messages to all the commissioners-general and homeland leaders giving the "true representation" of what had happened. Mr Van der Walt had not intended in any way to hurt or degrade anyone.

Mr Van der Walt said yesterday he would be issuing a statement on the incident shortly and until then he had no further comment.

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE PRECEDES CISKEI INDEPENDENCE

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 5 Oct 81 p 11

[Article by Barry Streek: "Independent Ciskei: SA Gets Rid of 2-million"]

[Text] DURING the white election in April this year, there were a lot of people in the Eastern Cape who were cynically calling the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, a smart operator.

How on earth, they said, could he organise things so that when blacks classified as Ciskeians went to vote in an independence referendum on December 4, 1980, the key area of King William's Town was going to go into the Ciskei.

But when the white people of South Africa went to vote in the General Election five months later, King William's Town, the sleepy town that symbolises so much of the conflict over land in the border area, was going to remain in South Africa.

It is probable that Dr Koornhof, as smart an operator as he can be, was not quite as smart as the cynics in the Eastern Cape thought he was.

The King William's Town debacle symbolises not only the land conflict but also the fact that the independence package deal, as it initially appeared last year, has become a very different parcel now that the wraps have been taken off in the all-white South African Parliament.

This week's debate on the status of Ciskei Bill, which paves the way for independence, has indeed removed the pretty wrapping and exposed exactly what the deal for the overcrowded homeland's independence is all about.

For the National Party MPs, there has been no doubt that not only was the policy of separate development the only answer for white people in South Africa, but the Ciskeians, as shown in last year's referendum, had, voluntarily and enthusiastically voted for the homeland's independence.

Contact

For 32 years, Dr Koornhof explained to Parliament, he had been in close contact with black people and "I have got to know them and love them as people who love this country just as much as we do, as people who in their own area have built up this country and, if it is necessary, helped defend it with the last drop of blood."

A senior Border MP, Mr Johan Greeff of Aliwal, who is a member of the Commission for Co-operation and Development and who headed its investigations into the consolidation of the Ciskei, took this approach further.

It is possible with an extremely enthusiastic speaker and able politican, like Dr Koornhof, that some exaggeration or overstatement could enter the heat of the debate. But with someone like Johan Greeff this could not be said: a straightforward attorney from Aliwal North, much of whose constituency borders on Transkei, he speaks from the heart and straight.

He explained that the commission had crisscrossed the Ciskei during its investigations and "we made a point of talking to the average member of the population."

As a result of these discussions, "I say there can be absolutely no talk of them being opposed to independence: everyone wants to be independent," he said.

With this approach, it was easy for Nationalist MPs, Dr Koornhof included, to dismiss the opposition fight against the Bill: regardless of the details, the Ciskeians wanted their independence which had been taken away from them by British colonialists 100 years ago. Indeed, it often seemed during the debate as if the Government MPs simply could not understand what the debate was about.

Packaging

It did not seem to matter that the package deal looked different once the wraps were off, or that people could reject the deal whatever the content and whatever the packaging.

It was a position that lead to a surreal debate and, at times this week, it has been difficult to believe that the MPs were talking on the same Bill, so divergent were their views.

For the Progressive Federal Party, the package deal was a fraud and the people classified as Ciskeian had been betrayed.

The MP for Pinetown, Mr Harry Pitman, an advocate, used legal analogies to make the opposition point effectively.

"When the one party to a purported agreement is under duress from the other party, his consent has not been given freely because it is implicit in any agreement that both parties must exercise their will freely and voluntarily. Here, however, as the Hon Member for Pretoria Central (Mr Louis Nel) has conceded, Ciskei gave its consent in order to escape oppression from the other party, the other party being the South African Government.

"In that situation one does not obtain the consent of the party under duress. What one does in fact do is to extort his acceptance by duress.

"There is another ground in which the simplist elements of an agreement are not present in this matter. The first essential element of any agreement is that both parties are clear on what the fundamental terms of the agreement will be.

He went on to say that the Ciskeians had not only not agreed to the Bill but "they expressly rejected the terms in this Bill.

"It is no use members repeating ad nauseam that the Ciskeians accepted this bill, because no matter how often one continues to repeat it, it does not make it true.

"It is simply not true. It is false. There was in fact no concursus animorum between the parties. There was no meeting of the minds.

"There was in fact a misrepresentation to the Ciskeians, a false representation to the Ciskeians."

Mr Nel: "You are again insulting the black people"

Mr Pitman: "If it was not a fraudulent misrepresentation, it was at least a fraudulent non-disclosure before the Ciskeians exercised their vote in the referendum.

"They were in fact not destined to retain their South African citizenship."

For the NP, the only solution is for black South Africans to become citizens of an independent homeland to fulfil the dream of Dr Verwoerd and Dr Mulder that there will be no black South Africans. In this way, the day of white minority rule in South Africa will end.

Pipedream

For the PFP, this is a romantic pipedream which cannot succeed and which is unfairly depriving people of their citizenship.

Essentialy, this is what it is all about. By December 4 another 2,1 million black South Africans will, as far as South African law is concerned, no longer be citizens of the Republic.

They will join more than 3 million people regarded as Transkeian, the approximately 2 million regarded as citizens of Bophuthatswana and half million regarded as citizens of Venda — and they will lose any political claim to the rest of South Africa, at least as far as the South African Government is concerned.

That has been the cornerstone of Nationalist policy ever since Dr Verwoerd and that has been non-negotiable.

When the possibility of Ciskei's independence was first announced in 1980 a very different impression was created. Along with the euphoria about the incorporation of King Williams' Town — if ever there was any logic to Separate Development theory the town's exclusion from the Ciskei destroyed that impression — it was explicitly stated time and time again that Ciskeians would not lose their South African nationality and that the independence of Ciskei would be very different from the other three countries.

For example, in November last year, the Chief Minister, chief Lennox Sebe, said in Port Elizabeth people would have Ciskeian citizenship and South African nationality.

A month earlier he told a mass meeting at Zwelitsha: "Anybody who says our independence will be the same as the independence of the others is a clown, to put it in polite language."

After the referendum, the reality, as shown in Parliament this week, has been very different. The Status of Ciskei Bill, is very similar to the laws which granted Transkei, Venda and Bophuthatswana independence.

Pass laws

The day-to-day realities for Ciskeians after December 4 will also not change: they will still be subject to pass laws, even though they will technically be foreigners, and the economic situation of the Ciskei will not alter.

In November last year, chief Sebe said: "The Ciskeian lives on a lonely island of poverty in the midst of a vast ocean of material prosperity."

That island will have a different legal status after December 4 but it will still supply labour to white South Africa. With the wraps off, Ciskei's package deal has not revealed significant change from the other three black states. Life for the average Ciskeian will still be harsh.

ETHNIC LOCAL GOVERNMENT GAINS GROUND

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 12 Oct 81 p 6

[Article by Sean O'Connor]

[Text]

STRONG support for the establishment of ethnic municipalities has emerged as the President's Council prepares to formulate the first of its recommendations on a new constitutional dispensation for local government in South Africa.

The Transvaal Executive Committee has now added its voice to those calling for separate and fully-fledged local authorities for each race group.

By SEAN O'CONNOR

The views of the Executive Committee on a new third-tier structure of administration were disclosed last week at the annual Transvaal Municipal Association (TMA) congress by the MEC in charge of local government, Mr Hein Kruger.

And only 10 days ago, the Minister of Internal Affairs Mr Chris Heunis told a National Party youth conference in The Wilderness that there would be institutions in which whites, coloureds and Indians could decide on their own affairs.

But Mr Heunis forecast there would also be joint organisations in which these three groups would "decide together on matters of mutual concern".

Meanwhile, the economics committee of the President's Council has finished hearing evidence on a new local government dispensation and — if everything goes according to plan — it is expected that the committee will start formulating the first of its recommendations early next month.

Last week the TMA congress gave unanimous support to its association's submissions to the President's Council urging separate municipalities for the different race groups — a proposal which has been echoed by the Natal Municipal Association.

Multiracial

However, the Cape Province Municipal Association has recommended that municipalities become multiracial authorities, and the Johannesburg Central Business District Association has said coloured and Indian areas should become wards of "white" municipalities.

But, while there are no indications yet of what the President's Council may recommend, there are growing signs the Government favours ethnic local authorities, with joint decision-making in separate institutions.

There is speculation the Government may be considering giving provincial administrations a "more metropolitan flavour" by modifying their structures to allow for the representation of ethnic municipalities on the second-tier level. It is here that joint decision-making may be introduced.

Mr Kruger, opening last week's TMA congress, said the Transvaal Executive Committee did not believe each race group should function in a vacuum on the local level, and added it was obvious other institutions would be established in which the autonomous groups could consult on mutual problems.

A senior TMA executive member and chairman of the Johannesburg management committee, Mr Francois Oberholzer — doyen of municipal administrators — said last week he believed it was now clear there was a definite move towards the concept of separate local authorities for the different races.

NON-WHITE CHURCH BRANCHES IN FRONT AGAINST APARTHEID

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 6 Oct 81 p 25

[Article by John Allen: "Broeder Against Broeder"]

[Text] The "apartheid churches" of the Ned Geref Kerk family have spawned an anti-apartheid movement that is second-to-none in the South African church world.

That is the message which came from last week's annual national assembly at Hammanskraal of the Broederkring of the Ned Geref Kerke — the body which is at the forefront of the "black" Dutch Reformed Church struggle against white rule and the white NG Kerk.

As conservative white and brown leaders of the (coloured) NG Sendingkerk gathered in Cape Town for the church's centenary celebrations, members of the Broederkring debated and accepted a document denouncing the creation of the Sendingkerk and attacking the white church and the government.

The Broederkring, an unofficial fraternal body which says it represents the true feelings of the majority in the coloured, black and Indian churches of the NGK family, declared that "no reconciliation is possible without prior confrontation."

Apartheid in the NGK family began 100 years ago in Wellington, Cape, when pressure for separation created the Sendingkerk, now the biggest of the three original "mission" churches.

The (black) Ned Geref Kerk in Afrika and the (Indian) Reformed Church in Africa were founded later.

But the white church didn't keep apartheid to itself. According to recent analysis by the white leader of the Sendingkerk, the Rev David Botha, apartheid in the state was the brainchild of the white NGK, which developed the concept before the National Party came to power.

Last week, after debates held mostly in Afrikaans, the Broederkring accepted a document describing the policy as a violation of the truth of the Gospel.

It said young people in the Dutch Reformed churches were "battling with the question (of) whether they have the moral right to resort to counter-violence . . . . (against) ever-growing institutional violence and police brutality . . ."

It branded the establishment of the Sendingkerk as sinful. It accused the NGK of heresy on the grounds that it had "avoided, covered or distorted" most relevant Christian truths in the Bible to justify Government policy.

It said the NGK — as well as the smaller Hervormde Kerk and Gereformeerde Kerk — preached a false gospel.

"How can there ever be freedom in Christ when a false confession through this kind of "proclamation" of the Gospel is made Sunday after Sunday? How does one continue to associate in Christian fellowship with a church which deliberately distorts the basic truths of the Gospel?"

In one of its toughest declarations, the Broederkring assembly affirmed calls for the isolation of the NGK.

In this respect it clashed with the views of Bishop Desmond Tutu, general secretary of the SA Council of Churches. For while the Bishop and the broeders see eye-to-eye on many issues, he has consistently rejected advice that he should withdraw his "hand of friendship" to the NGK.

There were predictions at the meeting that the broederkring's stand could be met with by a Government banning order.

Dr Allan Boesak, chairman of the organisation and student chaplain at the University of the Western Cape, noted this when he said the body had to "salvage what is left of the Reformed tradition."

He added: "Resistance to Government is a proud part of the Reformed tradition."

There was concern among members that church investigations of the Broederkring could pave the way for state action against it.

The organisation is a minority body in the three "black" NG churches and is strongly opposed to the leadership of the black and coloured churches.

In the struggle between Broederkring members and conservative leaders, the organisation has been charged with propagating "another theology," pretending to be the true representative of the church, acting as a secret organisation and behaving as a pressure group.

Relationships between the Sendingkerk and the Broederkring have improved to a degree recently, the assembly was told, but an investigation by the black church's leadership is apparently continuing.

A report on what was called the "assault" against the Broederkring tabled at the assembly said there were no differences of principle between the organisation and the black and coloured churches.

There was agreement, the report said, on the need to unite all churches of the NGK family, on the condemnation of apartheid as unChristian and on the struggle for justice, equality and freedom in South Africa.

But Broederkring members clearly questioned the degree to which these principles were being implemented in practice by the coloured and black church leadership.

It elected a young executive committee which included two of the small group of white members. But most of the 65-odd members present were middle-aged or elderly: men who, they said, had always been described in their communities as members of "the apartheid church."

SA WILL DEFER RESPONSE TO WESTERN PROPOSALS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 27 Oct 81 pp 1, 2

[Text]

CAPE TOWN. — South Africa's response to the western proposals on independence for South West Africa which were received in Cape Town and Windhoek yesterday, will be made known only after they have been discussed with the democratic parties in the territory.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr Pik Botha, said the proposals had already been discussed at top level in Cape Town.

A foreign affairs statement released in Cape Town said: "The western five contact group presented a document to the South African government containing the principles they envisaged for the election of a constituent assembly and a constitution for an independent South West Africa.

"The document was discussed by the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr Pik Botha, the Minister of Defence, General Magnus Malan, the Administrator-General of South West Africa, Mr Danie Hough, and senior officials of various interested government departments.

"The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr Botha, will discuss these proposals with representatives of the Western Five on Wednesday, October 28.

"After this, these principles would have to be discussed with the internal democratic parties in South West Africa.

"Only then would the South African Government be able to determine its attitude towards these principles."

In terms of the proposals, the SWA Constituent Assembly to be elected under United Nations supervision, would formulate a Constitution for independence by a decision-making process requiring a two-thirds majority.

The proposals set no timetable for the Constitution to be drafted.

The guidelines make no provision for the guarantee of minority group rights; instead they incorporate a declaration of fundamental rights guaranteeing personal liberty, an independent Judiciary, and equality before the courts of law.

As "the supreme law of the state," the Constitution will be enforceable by the Judiciary.

Proportional composition of the Constituent Assembly will be decided "so as to ensure fair representation in that body to different political groups representing the people of Namibia".

The proposals met with mixed political reaction in Windhoek yesterday.

"It is entirely within our own thinking. That is the kind of Namibia we want to see," Mr Andreas Shipanga, leader of the Swapo/Democrats, said.

The chairman of the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance, Mr Dirk Mudge, said: "I hope this will bring peace."

But he said in an earlier speech that the DTA did not yet know who would underwrite the constitutional guarantees.

"It certainly will not be the western five, but we are prepared to talk to them," he said.

The leader of the SWA National Party, Mr Kosie Pretorius, said there was too much emphasis on the international aspect.

"It seems as if the international world once more wants to prescribe to SWA," he said.

The leader of the Herstigte Nasionale Party, Mr Sarel Becker, rejected the constitutional suggestions.

"The HNP is not in favour of independence for SWA.

"We feel that SWA is not capable of becoming independent from South Africa either economically or militarily. The HNP rejected the concept of a unitary state," he said.

GEN MALAN CAUTIONS AGAINST RELIANCE ON WEST

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 21 Oct 81 p 8

[Article by Jaap Theron]

[Text]

THE Reagan Administration's understanding of South Africa's problems was a ray of light in a dark world, but South Africa must prepare itself to "engage and conquer its enemies on its own," general Magnus Malan, Minister of Defence, said yesterday.

Gen Malan who addressed a banquet in Johannesburg of the national executive of the Southern Cross Fund, said South Africa had ample evidence "not to rely on the West to assist it in any conflict."

He warned South Africa not to rest on its laurels after its successes against Swapo terrorists during recent operations.

The ordinary citizen must realise that the onslaught against his freedom and existence would continue.

Increase

The total number of internal sabotage incidences had increased by 200 percent during the first six months of this year compared with the last six months of last year.

He said it was common knowledge that sabotage was aimed at creating a climate of fear, distress and defeatism among the ordinary citizens.

Women

In this regard he called upon the women of South Africa to play a much more important moral role of resistance. The day when the threat demanded more manpower to defend the country, it would be the women who would have to support and urge their men to secure victory.

He said it had been stated that the solution to a revolutionary terrorist war was only 20 percent militarily and that the main burden of 80 percent rested with politicians.

This fact was unfortunately, being used by the country's enemies to discredit its military efforts.

But on the other hand military power was indispensable in creating a safe milieu without which no political solution would be possible.

The recent successful operation Proteu into Angola showed how sophisticated armament was being stockpiled by Swapo terrorists, so much so that a direct conventional attack from Angola with the support of Russian, Cuban and other Eastern Block Nations was no longer a vague possibility.

● During the recent Cape NP congress Gen Malan hinted that South Africa would prepare for a conventional war some time in the future.

FRG EASES TIGHT CREDIT POLICY TOWARDS SA

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 8 Oct 81 p 29

[Text]

BONN — West Germany took another step yesterday towards easing its tight export credit-guarantee policy towards South Africa, apparently in an effort to secure jobs in Germany's engineering sector.

Officials said that the Bonn Cabinet had decided to provide credit guarantees for R341-million worth of turbine and generator delivery to a South African coal-fired power station project outside Pretoria.

The Cabinet also guaranteed credits last July for German companies seeking a share in the big Matimba coal-fired power station project in the north-western Transvaal.

Since November 1977, export guarantees for business with South Africa were granted only for individual orders not exceeding a certain amount, though exceptions could be made under special circumstances at Cabinet level.

This essentially political decision partly reflected Bonn's sensitivity to charges that it was collaborating in major deals — above all in the nuclear field — with South Africa. Bonn denied that there was any such nuclear collaboration.

The precarious state of the power-engineering sector — hit by the logjam in the commissioning of domestic nuclear power stations — has now clearly influenced the Cabinet move.

Consortium

The Cabinet is ready to guarantee lofty export credits to South Africa — amounts that cover the Matimba project and the latest turbine and generator delivery

It is not immediately clear which companies were involved in the latest application for credit guarantees.

The Matimba project, however, was won by a consortium of MAN and Alsthom and Atlantique of France.

Guarantees

The July Cabinet decision to grant credit guarantees for the Matimba project may well have contributed to the German-French winning of the order. The contract was announced two months after Bonn had given the go-ahead for credit guarantees.

ARABS EXPLORE INVESTMENT OPPORTUNITIES

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 20 Oct 81 p 25

[Article by Colin Campbell: "Approach to Horwood by Arabs' Agents on Investing"]

[Text] WASHINGTON — Financial intermediaries, acting on behalf of Middle East Arab businessmen, have been asking about investment opportunities in South Africa, the Minister of Finance, Mr Horwood, told me in an exclusive interview yesterday.

"They wanted to know about gold and real estate, and there was some interest in the share market," Mr Horwood said.

The Minister had talked to "certain financial people who have good standing among the Arabs. I cannot tell you anything authoritative about what precise forms such investments might take."

Mr Horwood said that there have been previous approaches, but at this year's IMF meeting there seemed to be a little more interest from the "Arab sources."

"Nothing may come of it, but at least contact has been made," Mr Horwood added.

If Arab investment funds did come into South Africa, it would probably start in a small way. If the investment came to the point of any significance, South Africa would obviously look at the implications and, as any other country would, consider safeguards.

Russian sales

The Minister had no doubt that the Arabs would again buy gold — as they have in the past — when they thought the price was right.

I put it to the Minister that it was in the interests of Russia and South Africa to know what was happening, or what was not happening, as far as gold sales were concerned.

"We make known our gold-sales figures. The Russians do not. We would like to know what they are doing, but up to now South Africa has had no contact with the Soviets."

In an earlier Press conference Mr Horwood made the following points:

- Exchange control — it was South Africa's policy to dismantle them as much as possible. Dr De Kock is to press ahead with the second report of the De Kock Commission on his return to South Africa.
- Inflation — it is still too high, but he was reasonably confident that it would ease off in the months ahead.
- Gold — members of the South African delegation had held talks with members of the US Gold Commission, including its chairman, Mr Donald Regan, US Secretary Treasury, and was encouraged by the fresh thinking which is now evident about gold and its monetary role.
- The rand — the Minister expected it to be more stable vis-a-vis the dollar.

COUNTRY REPORTEDLY SET TERMS FOR SPY EXCHANGE TOO HIGH

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 6 Oct 81 p 11

[Text]

PARIS — South Africa cut itself out of the West German spy swop by announcing it wanted Soviet dissident Anatoly Shcharansky in exchange for KGB agent Kozlov, well-informed sources have suggested here.

"One of the terms of the deal was total secrecy on the price Moscow had to pay," the sources say.

South Africa's part in the deal, which exchanged East German master spy Guenther Guillaume for about 40 West German agents held in the East and 3 000 East Germans who wanted to go to the West, ended after Pretoria raised the "price too high."

South Africa apparently wanted to secure the release of Scharansky (33), who is serving 10 years in a Soviet labour camp, to please Washington, observers here say.

West Germany had hoped to internationalise the swop to defuse criticism at home and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt sounded out Copenhagen, Paris and Pretoria.

France and Denmark gave the go-ahead South Africa reportedly asked for time to think.

After the French Government changed South Africa's relations with Bonn deteriorated, particularly after the recent incursion into Angola.

Paris dropped out of the deal after Mr Francois Mitterrand became President and imposed tougher conditions.

France is now reported to be seeking its own deal to release Shcharansky, or another dissident, in exchange for East German spy Heinz Bernhard Zorn.

French sources have suggested Paris would be prepared to let Zorn go if Shcharansky, Yuri Orlov, or even Nobel Prize physicist Andrei Sakharov were allowed to leave for the West.

PFP'S CHARTER FOR SOCIAL, ECONOMIC PROGRESS

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 7 Oct 81 p 11

[Text]

INTRODUCTION:

IN a world of both starvation and affluence, the task of those vested with the responsibility of governing is not only to give political and spiritual freedom, but also to strive for economic well-being for all.

In our South African society, we see both riches and poverty, unemployment and affluence, privilege and disadvantage.

Our objective is, therefore, to create an economic environment which will facilitate the achievement of economic well-being by all and to lay the foundations for a society in which there is no discrimination based on skin colour or sex and no privilege by reason of class, race, birth or sex; a society in which there is true equality of opportunity in an economic system in which we aim for as high a degree of efficiency as is compatible with an acceptable level of economic justice, in which poverty is eliminated and in which there is incentive for the industrious and protection for the disadvantaged.

Freedom and liberty in the political sense are only available under a democratic system. However, democratic systems give a variety of economic alternatives, from which one should be selected on the basis of equality of opportunity and efficiency. Though the latter two concepts are not mutually exclusive, it is sometimes necessary to modify aspects of one of ensure essentials of the other.

In the society for which we strive, anyone able and willing to work should be able to obtain work, therefore the policies we formulate are aimed at full employment. Those who work should at least be able to satisfy basic needs for the present and future in food, clothing, shelter, medical care and education for their children.

The society to which we are committed should also be able to offer reasonable leisure and recreational needs and a suitable and healthy environment.

DECLARATION OF COMMITMENT:

WE, therefore, record our belief that:

All people should be free — free not only spiritually and politically, but free from squalor, poverty and degradation, free to work and to progress — the right to these freedoms is indivisible.

Everyone has a right to share in the goods and services produced, if he in turn is prepared, within the limits of his own ability, to contribute to this production and to co-operate to further the welfare, not only of himself but also of his fellow men.

However unequal the environment may be, all people ought to be equal, not only in the exercise of political rights and in the eyes of the law, but equal also in the opportunity to create, to achieve, and to procure the well-being of themselves and their families.

The economic environment should give encouragement to the individual to work and incentive to use his ingenuity and further his ambitions in fair competitive circumstances.

To achieve this means that some measure of protection must be given to the weak and that the strong must be restrained, so that justice can be done between them.

Provision should be made for a minimum level of food, clothing and shelter for those who, by reason of age, infirmity or other circumstances beyond their control, are unable to contribute.

All people should live in an environment which enables them to enjoy a meaningful quality of life free from undue pressure and pollution.

POLICY

WE, therefore, recommend an economic policy for our country based on these beliefs and having the attributes, objectives and characteristics set out hereunder:

Political freedom is an essential ingredient for the operation of a just economic system.

There must be true equality of opportunity for all citizens including that of acquiring and owning property, so that they may enter the economic system on an equal footing. This will entail:

- The removal of all discriminatory legislation;
- Making racial constraints on economic activities unconstitutional, and;
- The provision of equal access;

(1) to education for all, as well as to the opportunity for training to acquire vocational skills, including retraining facilities for disadvantaged adults;

(2) to reasonable health facilities.

A market system should operate to achieve the goals of productivity and efficiency but it should do so within the constraints of a social conscience.

There must be equality of bargaining power in the market place to prevent exploitation, injustice and abuse. This entails:

- Rules of conduct prescribed by law as may be necessary to prevent the exploitation of consumer and worker;
- Competition that is fair and uninhibited by cartel, monopoly or other abuse of power concentrations;
- Public scrutiny of the exercise of concentrated economic power to prevent abuses in the same manner as political power is subject to scrutiny.

As the living standards of most South Africans will always be determined by their earnings from wage labour it is essential that the concept of economic justice is also extended into the area. This means:

The recognition of:

- The individual's basic right to work. Therefore all possible steps must be taken to give every person the opportunity to work. Where jobs cannot be provided, then the State should provide relief which includes unemployment benefits, and should also use fiscal, monetary and other measures to assist in job creation;
- The principle of equal pay for equal work of equal value should be fully accepted. There is also a need for a logical evaluation of job responsibility and the determination of a just level or range of remuneration, and;
- The need in present South African conditions for a basic minimum wage which should be determined in accordance with regions, industry categories and other considerations which will give those who work and fulfil their social obligations at least the opportunity to obtain the basic minimum living standards.

The establishment of relationship between capital, management and labour based upon the recognition that each have an interest in the welfare of the others. Processes towards industrial democracy should be encouraged. Among ideas well worth studying are profit sharing schemes for employees and appropriate participation by workers with management in the decision-making process.

The creation of a realistic and fully operational system of labour relations.

Nationalisation is rejected as a general rule but the State has a role in the provision of services which private enterprise cannot or does not offer.

Adequate planning is required to deal with society's future needs, however, the State's functions in this field should be essentially indicative, not compulsive.

The wide gaps in income and wealth in South Africa require special action to enable those in a disadvantaged position, to better their situation. This aim can be achieved only by uplifting the under-privileged rather than by impairing the standards enjoyed by the more fortunate.

A caring society is required which provides for those who cannot do so adequately for themselves whether by reason of sickness, disability, advanced age or inability to obtain employment. While encouragement should be given so that wherever possible individuals make their own plans, the State must play its role in providing for those who cannot.

Society should be so structured and laws so amended as to allow a high degree of vertical as well as horizontal mobility. Every worker should have the opportunity to realise his full potential, and should he so choose, to become an entrepreneur.

The extreme poverty of certain regions requires special development activity in such areas; to create opportunities for work, to reduce deprivation and to improve the quality of life, are urgent priorities.

However, it must also be accepted that continued economic development inevitably implies increasing levels of urbanisation. Provision must be made for this process and that an environment be created in which both the public and private sectors contribute and in which individuals can be helped to house themselves.

The State obtains its funds from taxation, borrowing and income from certain activities conducted by it and, in turn, performs the function of re-allocating the resources so obtained. Taxation should be applied in such a manner as to maintain incentive on the one hand, and on the other to enable the state machinery to function and to provide adequate social services.

Before wealth can be consumed or redistributed it must be created. Policies should therefore, be directed to encourage wealth creation by the individual.

The State's fiscal and monetary policies should, in particular, be directed particularly to:

- The creation of employment opportunities;
- The retention of currency values;
- The maintenance of economic stability, and;
- The increase of living standards in both relative and absolute terms.

A major destabilising factor in any economy is inflation. To combat this, government must exercise a high degree of monetary discipline.

We wish to stress that the economic system we propose can only flourish in a free and democratic society and we, therefore, believe that the economic reform we propose must go hand in hand with political reform in order to achieve the stated objectives.

CLUBS WARNED TO REMAIN ALL WHITE

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 8 Oct 81 p 10

[Text] More than 450 sport clubs in South Africa and SWA/Namibia have been warned by the Association of Clubs that they will be breaking the law if they admit black members.

Mr Bob Stuart, chairman of the association, said yesterday his organisation had sent off a circular to each member club outlining the dangers of taking the Minister of National Education, Dr Viljoen, at his word that it was perfectly legal for clubs to admit black members.

"We have urged our clubs that in spite of the many conflicting statements on this matter our advice not to admit black members remains as valid as it has ever been.

"Unless and until there are amendments to the Liquor Act, the Group Areas Act and the Black (Urban Areas) Consolidation Act white clubs which admit black members do so at their peril and pur their liquor licences in jeopardy."

Mr Stuart said the Human Sciences Research Council had submitted an exhaustive and reasoned report to the Government recommending repeal or amendment of sections of these Acts.

"The Government has apparently accepted these recommendations, thereby acknowledging that amendments are necesary.

"The Prime Minister himself apparently pledged himself to introducing the necessary legislation during this session of Parliament.

"It would seem, however, that only the Liquor Act is to be dealt with this session," said Mr Stuart.

Mr Stuart said the law in South Africa was what appeared in the statute book.

"It is obviously highly dangerous to contravene the law upon the assurances of a politician or a State official that one's transgression will be overlooked.

"Such people have no authority to grant immunity from prosecution.

"It will be of no avail to clubs to raise this as a defence should they be prosecuted."

TRANS-NATAL COAL TO UPGRADE EXPORTS

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 14 Oct 81 p 14

[Text]

IN a capital programme involving a total of R500-million over the next 10 years, Trans-Natal Coal Corporation will spend about R234-million in escalated money terms over this period in developing the Optimum colliery to export 3 500 000 tons of coal a year.

This massive programme does not include the Northern Transvaal coalfield, which is regarded as a long-term project, and on which significant amounts are being spent on prospecting, purchasing mineral rights and technical research into the potential oil-from-coal processes.

Capital expenditure will be carried out at a rate of between R30-million and R80-million a year.

The directors say in the annual report that Escom has already granted Trans-Natal approval in principle for the export of coal from Optimum, and the exports from the mine will form part of the Gencor coal subsidiary's programme to use the remaining 4 750 000 tons a year of its bituminous coal export qu.

The estimated escalated capital cost for the export of the remaining 1 250 000 tons a year is around R145-million over a period of six years from 1983.

Investigations are continuing into the possible export of 1 500 000 tons a year of anthracite by Kwa-Ngoma Mines in terms of its quota.

Increased demand for coal by Escom is expected to continue in the current year, say the directors, but the supply of metallurgical coal to Iscor should decrease by about 500 000 tons.

"Developments on the external market remain promising, and with sufficient coal available for exportation at very favourable prices an increased contribution to group profit from this source can be expected."

In the past year Trans-Natal's total coal sales reached a record level of 28-million tons, or 12% higher than the previous year's 25-million tons.

Export sales, Trans-Natal's major growth sector in the past year, rose to 4 200 000 tons from 2 600 000 tons, representing 15% of total turnover compared with 10% in the previous year.

Production shortfalls during the year were supplemented by external purchases to make optimal use of the available capacity flowing from phase two of the Richards Bay export programme.

The directors say much progress has been made in the planning of projects to use the remaining 4 750 000 ton a year export quota of bituminous coal for the third phase of Richards Bay, and Escom has already approved in principle the export of 3 500 000 tons a year from Optimum colliery.

Drilling operations continued during the year in KwaZulu and on the Springbok Flats. Promising coal reserves were proved in the Orange Free State and in the Amersfoort area.

PLATINUM MARKET EXPORTS REMAIN SOFT

Jchannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 5 Oct 81 p 17

[Article by John Mulcahy: "Rusplat Profit Down But Div Raised By 18%"]

[Text]

RUSTENBURG Platinum Holdings' taxed profit for the year to August 31 was marginally down on the previous year's level, but the final dividend has been raised by 18%, above most expectations.

In a preliminary statement notable for its paucity of detail, Rustenburg announces taxed profit of R120 100 000 for the year, compared with R125 600 000 the previous year, while the final dividend is 5c higher at 32,5c, making a total of 45c compared with 40c for the period to August 1980.

Earnings rose to 95,8c a share from 100,2c, and the dividend cover was cut to 2,1 times from 2,5 times. The company had repaid all its borrowings by the end of the 1980 financial year, leaving it in a positive cash flow situation, and able to cope with fluctuating demand for its products.

A warning by the directors at the interim stage that profits in the second half were likely to be materially lower than those in the first half proved to be pessimistic, and sales revenue in the third quarter was higher than had been anticipated.

The weaker trend returned in the last quarter of the year, however, and the directors say weak market conditions "significantly and adversely" affected affected platinum sales during the last three months of the year.

Profit before provisions fell to R266 200 000 from R273 700 000, and the renewals and replacements provision was slightly lower at R32 900 000 compared with R33 700 000 the previous year.

Profit before provisions in the second half of the year was R10 300 000 lower than for the corresponding period last year, and the year's figure was 2,7% lower than the previous year.

Tax and lease charges rose to R106 200 000 from R91 700 000, but the tax normalisation charge dropped to R7-million from R22 700 000 last year.

Rustenburg last year introduced tax normalisation as a more logical approach to tax relief. In prior years Rustenburg's taxed profit contained an element of tax relief arising from capital expenditure "of an expansionary nature".

This expenditure had not been charged against profits, and thus led to an enhancement of reported taxed profit. To avoid this anomaly the tax normalisation was introduced, to equate with the element of tax relief on expansionary projects.

Rustenburg's expenditure on mining assets fell to R47-million over the year from R84-million the previous year, and R29-million was charged to the renewals and replacements reserve as ongoing capital expenditure.

COMMENT: No indication is given by Rustenburg on prospects or the market subsequent to the year-end, but the indication that demand in the last quarter of the year was substantially lower tends to support the view that the platinum market is not yet out of the woods.

In the Impala annual report, published last week, the directors say platinum consumption by the automobile industry has been restricted by the delay in the recovery of automobile sales in the US, numerous waivers of the more severe emission standards during 1981 and a fall off in Japanese domestic automobile sales.

They added that the failure of the platinum market to respond to increases in international tensions other than with a minor short-lived price surge, has further confirmed the bear market.

Rustenburg has undoubtedly benefited from the depreciation of the rand against the dollar, as the platinum producer price has been left at $475 an ounce for over a year, but operating costs are still escalating, and prospects for the other platinum group metals are gloomy.

In addition, Rustenburg sells platinum to the US motor industry on contract, at what are believed to be "negotiated prices", and with the low level of automobile sales — and the low free market platinum price — it seems logical that the motor manufacturers will attempt to elicit reduced prices.

The higher dividend puts Rustenburg on a historic yield of 7,3% on yesterday's 615c closing price.

SOWETO IS ANGERED OVER RENT HIKES

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 5 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Montshiwa Moroke and Camuel Dikotla]

[Text] AT MEETINGS held in Soweto at the weekend more than 1 000 residents resolved not to pay the increased rent introduced by the West Rand Administration Board last Thursday.

Angry residents said not only were they not going to pay the increased rent but they were not going to pay rent at all until Wrab undertook to scrap the R8 increase.

Residents said the new increases on service charges were "unreasonable" because there were many people who were unable to pay even the old rents.

There was a call from residents for councillors in Soweto, Dobsonville and Diepmeadow to resign their posts because the rent issue had clearly exposed their ineffectiveness and shown they were mere puppets of the Department of Co-operation and Development.

The meetings also proposed that because the rent issue could not be separated from all other economic issues affecting the lives of black people, residents should stay away from work for three days from today in an effort to make whites aware of the plight of black workers.

Organisers of the meetings said they had advised Putco not to send buses into Soweto to take commuters to work. They said taxi associations had already been approached on the boycott issue. The only people who would be allowed to take taxi's to work would be people doing essential services, such as hospital staff.

Legal opinion

In another move, the Soweto Chamber of Commerce and Industry has sought legal opinion concerning the doubled rent which traders were told to pay early this year.

This was announced by Mr Vela Kraai, chairman of the traders' organisation, at a meeting at the Dube YWCA yesterday. He said the issue had to be taken further because most traders were unhappy.

The chairman of Wrab, Mr John Knoetze, said in an interview last night he would be meeting executives of the Trade Union Council of South Africa to discuss the rent issue. Mr Knoetze refused to elaborate on the agenda.

About the planned stayaway, Mr Knoetze said it was irresponsible of the organisers to plan such a strike. He said: "I am prepared to meet members of the organisations that held meetings in Soweto — either individually or as a panel group. I will explain why the Government is justified in increasing the service charges in Soweto."

The Chief Executive Officer of Soweto, Mr Nico Malan, said last night the Soweto Council was going to meet today to discuss the service charge increase in Soweto.

PFP POLICIES, AIMS TAKEN TO TASK

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 7 Oct 81 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text]

WE referred yesterday to the rather unexciting session of Parliament that is drawing to a close.

If there was no drama from the Government side, how did the Progressive Federal Party fare?

Mainly indifferently.

One can understand why. The party is becoming more and more divided between the Houghton clique of Left-wingers and the Harry Schwarz conservatives.

Unfortunately for Harry, the party has acquired a few more young liberals since the election, whereas he has the support of some former United Party Reformists.

The result is that he is fairly isolated. Nevertheless, he is the most eloquently patriotic member of the PFP. Not that the others are un-South African by any means. It is just that most do not share his support of such matters as the South African thrust into Angola, the defence effort, and the need to regard Swapo as an enemy.

The others still mouth such platitudes as the country cannot fight a just war unless its cause is just, and how can one expect the boys on the border to be enthusiastic about national service, and so on, when they are not happy about the way things are going at home, politically and racially?

It's the kind of argument that nearly wrecked America during the Vietnam War, when the old adage, "My country right or wrong," was dumped in favour of the divisive and dangerous, "We don't have to fight a war we don't believe in."

We have never, of course, been an admirer of Mr Schwarz since the days when the Young Turk/Reformists, with his help and leadership, started the moves that wrecked the United Party.

At one time we thought that his group might wreck the PFP as well, but as things are going, they will never be strong enough to take over the party or to impose their more conservative, more moderate, philosophy on it.

But we do admire Mr Schwarz's guts in taking a view on defence that is unpopular in the PFP and sticking to his guns.

We shall certainly not be surprised if he finds his position untenable one day.

Be that as it may, the PFP is now under the leadership of the charismatic Dr Van Zyl Slabbert, who showed up poorly in the censure debate, but won one or two major brushes with the Government later on.

He is not a man who seems able to reconcile the opposing wings of his party — perhaps they are irreconcilable — but he projects an image of intellectuality that makes up for his less-forceful political approach.

However, though the party did better under his leadership in the general election, it is clear that its appeal remains limited to the mainly English speaking, wealthy areas of the Cape Peninsula, Johannesburg and environs.

The Herstigte Nasionale Party outvoted the PFP, without winning any seats; it is the more potentially powerful of the two.

The major movement in South African politics is to the Right rather than the Left — and the PFP's image of a boycott party that is seeking to reach an accommodation with the Blacks at the expense of the Whites will not give it a breakthrough into working-class, mainly Afrikaans or platteland constituencies.

The PFP, which refused to participate in the President's Council, still maintains its boycott even to the extent, this week, of opposing a Bill strengthening the powers and privileges of the council.

The result is that it will continue to have a poor image among the great majority of voters.

The PFP does the country, as well as itself, a disservice by trying to dismiss the council as a kind of commission of inquiry.

But even if it were just that, the duty of the PFP would have been to serve on it.

In terms of national politics, the PFP is irrelevant, since it has no chance of becoming the Government and consequently of putting into practice the policies it advocates.

This may explain why the PFP is now determined to achieve power at local level, in the case of Johannesburg and Randburg, and why it is going to contest the Pretoria municipal elections as well.

Only Johannesburg is within its grasp, but just imagine what kind of victory it would be for the PFP if the commercial and financial hub of South Africa fell into its hands.

Although the PFP disputes that it has a budget of R200 000 for next year's civic elections, we can be sure that, with the support of its powerful financial backers, it will conduct an unprecedently costly campaign to win control.

We hope it will not succeed, not just because we think that the PFP's brand of integrationist politics will be dangerous for the city and for racial co-operation and goodwill, but because it would not be in the interests of the PFP either, since a PFP victory would stir ill-feelings that are fortunately dormant.

Perhaps the old saying about the Progs should be applied to Johannesburg as well, namely, that the PFP fights the election for victory, but in the hope that it will not win.

TREURNICHT ANALYZES BLACK, AFRIKAANS NATIONALISM

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 12 Oct 81 p 6

[Text] There need be no clash between Afrikaans nationalism and Black nationalism in South Africa if each respected the other, Dr A P Treurnicht, Minister of State Administration and of Statistics said in Pretoria at the weekend.

Speaking at a Kruger Day celebration, he said the recognition by the Afrikaner of the other up and coming nationalisms in Africa did not mean that they were abdicating, however.

The continued existence of the Afrikaner as a separate nation was being challenged within South Africa and from abroad.

It was being said that military preparedness, security and independence of the country should override the importance of nationhood for the Afrikaner.

But there was no need to play the one up against the other.

"It is not being unfriendly to others if we discuss the survival of our nation with our people," Dr Treurnicht said.

Human rights had become a kind of "equality religion" the world over. It required absolute equality without recognising differences which were facts of life.

But the acceptance of a unitary society in South Africa would mean suicide for the Afrikaner, he said.

The various nationalisms developing in Africa and South Africa were realities which the Afrikaner accepted.

"It is being said that Afrikaner nationalism will come into conflict with Black nationalism but there is no need for this if we respect one another.

The Afrikaner respected Black nationalism as long as his own was respected and as long as the two developed along parallel lines.

"The road of South Africa is not only for the Whites or only for the Blacks...it is for both, but not as a unitary structure, but as good neighbours," he said.

"The continued existance of the Afrikaner was not planned at the cost of others. But there were countries which planned their independence at the cost of us.

"We know this and we are taking note of it and we find it totally unacceptable."

Like any other nation, the Afrikaner could not afford "selfish separateness".

To idolise nationhood was also not acceptable and the Afrikaner did not claim to be a super-nation.

"We do not ask for preferential treatment, but there is no reason why we should sacrifice our nationhood for the sake of good neighbourliness," Dr Treurnicht said.

RIGHT WINGERS USE SWA TO ATTACK GOVERNMENT

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 19 Oct 81 p 23

[Text] Leaders of South Africa's far-right parties are uniting to use the dispute over SWA/Namibian Independence to attack the Government. Mr Jaap Marais (HNP) and Dr Connie Mulder (NCP) will open the offensive in Windhoek next week.

WINDHOEK — South Africa's ultra right-wing groups have seized the SWA/Namibian dispute to launch their most concerted offensive against the Nationalist Government.

While Prime Minister Mr P W Botha, Foreign Minister Mr R F Botha, and Defence Minister General Magnus Malan have been briefing internal political parties in Windhoek on South Africa's standpoint in the territory's independence talks, hard-line white leaders in the Transvaal have been hatching a plan to wreck the latest initiative.

The political offensive is led by Herstigte Nasionale Party (NHP) leader, Mr Jaap Marais, and his National Conservative Party (NCP) counterpart, Dr Connie Mulder. It also has the support of people such as the HNP founder, Dr Albert Hertzog, and Mr Eugene Terreblanche of the militant Afrikaner Weerstands Beweging (AWB).

Their aim is to undermine white support for parties that accept the United Nation's plan for SWA/Namibian independence — Resolution 435 — and any amendments proposed by Western nations engaged in the negotiations.

The right-wing attack is to begin in Windhoek on October 27 — two days before the Western contact group delegation arrives for talks — with Mr Marais and Dr Mulder sharing a platform at a political meeting to protest against the implementation of Resolution 435.

Mr Marais this week confirmed that the meeting would be the first of many to be held throughout the territory in the next few months.

Sources say the offensive will spread later to the Transvaal where the HNP is gearing up for next year's municipal elections.

But observers point out that, apart from the HNP, none of the far right groups involved has any organisational support within SWA /Namibia. Dr Mulder's NCP and groups such as the AWB and Aksie Eie Toekoms, as well as certain individuals, formed a loose alliance in September under the umbrella name Aksie Red Blanke Suid Afrika.

Their support for the move to mobilise opposition to the SWA/Namibian independence plan means that they intend to use the dispute, with white fears of a probable Swapo victory in an election, as a political lever against the South African Government.

TRANSKEI'S FIRST POST-INDEPENDENCE ELECTION IS ASSESSED

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 21 Oct 81 p 11

[Article by Patrick Laurence: "149 Out of 150--and One-Party Rule Comes to Transkei"]

[Text]

WHATEVER the differences in substance, the results of Transkei's first post-independence election, announced earlier this week, have given it the outward appearance of a typical African one-party state.

Predictably, the election, held on September 24, resulted in the virtual annihilation of the opposition Democratic Progressive Party (DDP). Only one of its six candidates, the party's parliamentary leader, Mr Caledon Mda, was elected.

Less predictably, however, three senior Cabinet Ministers, Mr R Madikizela (Finance), Mr H H Bubu (Education), and Mr S W Mbanga (Commerce) were unseated by rival candidates from the governing Transkei National Independence Party (TNIP).

Top member

The extent of defeat suffered by the three Ministers is as surprising, if not more so, as their defeat in the first place.

Mr Madikizela, who used to be a top member of the now moribund opposition Democratic Party, was one of five candidates in Nqgenbeni constituency, which returned four members to the Transkei National Assembly.

Mr Madikizela was unable to secure even fourth place, in spite of reportedly receiving the tacit backing of the Paramount Chief of Western Pondoland, Chief Tutor Ndamase (son of the first leader of the Democratic Party, Chief Victor Poto).

Mr Bubu was one of six candidates in the East Pondoland constituency of Lusikisiki, which returned four members to the National Assemby. He was unable to fill one of the four top niches.

Candidates in Lusikisiki included Ms Stella Sigcau, Transkei's Minister of Interior, who was successful, and Mr W M Dweba, who was rejected with Mr Bubu.

Mr Mbangwa was one of six candidates in the Gcuwa constituency. The top two candidates were returned to the National Assembly.

The defeat of all but one of six DPP candidates means that for all intents and purposes Transkei has become a de facto one-party state, with the ruling TNIP controlling 149 of the 150 seats in the Assembly (of these 75 are elected by popular vote and 75 are filled by chiefs elected by an electoral college drawn from the territory's traditional leaders).

Accounting for the opposition's failure, Transkei's Prime Minister, Chief George Matanzima, said yesterday: "The opposition party lost because it has no policy. It had nothing to offer the people."

But, in the view of many observers, the election result was largely a logical corollary to Transkei's Public Security Act, which effectively outlawed opposition parties by making it a treasonable offence to oppose Transkei's independence.

As the platform of opposition parties — which have undergone several mutations in form and name since independence — was based, to a large extent, on advocacy of some form of re-unification with South Africa, the law virtually made opposition a treasonable offence.

Combined with the administration's use of draconian powers, including detention of opposition leaders without trial, the Public Security Act reduced enthusiasm for parliamentary opposition politics to a minimum.

As Professor David Welsh, of the Department of African Government at the University of Cape Town, said yesterday: "The de facto one-party state of Transkei should come as no surprise, given the immense power of the Matanzima brothers."

Transkei's election results put it on a par with other one-party states such as Zambia, Tanzania and Kenya. The defeat of Transkei's Cabinet Ministers suggests further parallels.

Past elections in Zambia, Tanzania and Kenya have been marked by contests within the one lawful party and the rejection by voters of government Ministers in favour of new candidates.

Some theorists have contended that a one-party system which results in the regular rejection of Cabinet Ministers by voters is more democratic than systems such as South Africa's, where it took more than 30 years for a Cabinet Minister to suffer an election defeat (1948 to 1981, when Dr Dawie de Villiers failed to win in Gardens).

Chief Matanzima's explanation for the defeat of his Cabinet Ministers was that the people "favoured change," but Professor Welsh saw their defeat as evidence of "an element of competitiveness" rather than testimony for a form of democracy.

"Given the perks obtainable from participation in the system, there must be a fair amount of enthusiasm to get into it," Professor Welsh said.

But he conceded that the threat of defeat, even by a rival candidate in the same party, could act as a check on the abuse of power by sitting Cabinet Ministers and MPs.

He added: "It is better than nothing and does enable parties to renew themselves. But in one-party systems there is an inherent tendency to political sclerosis."

But for popular consent to function in a meaningful sense within a one-party system, there had to be popular participation in elections "and that is the crucial element apparently lacking in Transkei."

In yesterday's interview Chief Matanzima characterised the election as one of "high enthusiasm." But then he added: "I don't think many people voted."

His explanation for the apparent anomaly was the switch from the old Reference Book to the new Book of Life as the means of establishing the right to vote.

Thus, Chief Matanzima said, many people queued to vote but few were able to produce the Book of Life to establish their right to vote. He did not say why so few had the new Book of Life.

AUSTRALIAN DIPLOMAT DECLARED PNG; ASKED TO LEAVE COUNTRY

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 21 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Don Marshall: "Aussie Woman Diplomat Told To Quit SA"]

[Text] An Australian diplomat who took an intense interest in black politics in South Africa has been told to leave the country "without further delay", it was learned in Pretoria yesterday.

Miss Helen Churchward, a second secretary at the Australian Embassy in Pretoria, had completed a three-year term of duty in the South African capital and had been granted six months long service study leave by her government in order to stay on in this country.

South Africa's Department of Foreign Affairs, acting through what it called normal diplomatic channels, ordered the attractive woman diplomat to leave. She will return to Australia at the end of this month.

Boyfriend

Miss Churchward, who is in her early thirtied, had a South African boyfriend in Pretoria.

A Department of Foreign Affairs spokesman said in Pretoria last night that there was nothing unusual about the order telling Miss Churchward to leave the country.

"She had completed her assignment in South Africa and it is the practice that foreign diplomats depart immediately afterwards. Long leave is not normally an issue in extending a diplomat's stay.

"The Australians themselves have a similar policy which they rigidly adhere to in Canberra, so there is nothing unusual in the South African Government asking Miss Churchward to leave," the spokesman said.

Cautious

In an obvious move to avoid straining further already deteriorating relations between South Africa and Australia, the Australian Embassy in Cape Town last night reacted cautiously to enquiries about Miss Churchward's departure.

A statement issued to the Rand Daily Mail said:

"An Australian Embassy official confirms the Miss Churchward, who served as second secretary in the Embassy (in Pretoria) from July, 1978, to July, 1981, and who has subsequently been in South Africa on long service leave, will be leaving shortly to return to Australia."

The spokesman said that the Embassy had no further comment to make on the matter.

Miss Churchward could not be contacted last night.

An order similar to Miss Churchward's was served on another Australian second secretary at the Pretoria Embassy in 1979.

Banned doctor

Mr Bruce Haigh had also completed his term of duty at the embassy and his term of office was extended, but the South African Government also insisted that he leave.

The Department of Foreign Affairs denied at the time that he was ordered to leave because he had spent several nights at the home of the banned East London doctor Mamphele Ramphele at a village near Tzaneen, in the Northern Transvaal.

Mr Haigh denied that there had been an affair between himself and the woman doctor. He said he had visited her in connection with an Australian aid project in the Northern Transvaal.

PROFILE OF REVEREND NAUDE UNDER BANNING ORDER

Johannesburg RANDDAILY MAIL in English 19 Oct 81 p 9

[Article by Eugene Hugo: "Only 8,760 Hours To Go"]

[Text] Today, four years ago, Beyers Naude began his lonely ordeal by decree

WHEN the sweatpeas are in full bloom again at 26 Hoylake Drive in Greenside next year the Reverend C F Beyers Naude might be free.

It is only a timorous, fleeting, thought today, more likely to bring on apprehension than happiness. Nevertheless it is there. Asked about it, Mrs Naude simply shakes her head.

On Monday, October 19, 66-year-old Dr Naude enters his last year of banishment for misdemeanours unknown.

But his wife, Ilse, appears almost to fear the passage of time which might take them headlong into a re-imposition of the punishment they have already suffered together.

Time has undoubtedly weighed heavily on the Naude family since that spring day in 1977 when a five-year banning order was served on the former Director of the Christian Institute — time more likely to be counted now in the 8 766 still remaining hours.

For four years Dr Naude has had to live with his own thoughts, unable to convey them to anyone under the conditions of his banning order. He may not be quoted in any publication. Even his feelings must remain secret.

Before his banning order Dr Naude's life's work was to do everything in his power to bring black and white leaders together to plan a peaceful future. How he must itch to have his freedom to pursue this long-held and interrupted ideal.

Steve Biko

The strain has taken its toll. Tears blinked in the eyes of Mrs Naude as she said: "If it's not the last year I don't know if I'll have the courage to go on. This last year has got to me, it's the seclusion. It's not a natural life . . . him living over there and me here."

The banning of Beyers Naude in 1977 came in a momentous year for South African politics.

Bracketing the day he is unlikely ever to forget were the September death in custody of black conciousness leader Steve Biko and the November assassination of National Party parliamentary candidate Dr Robert Smit.

Prime Minister John Vorster had clashed in Vienna with American Vice-President Walter Mondale over the concept of majority rule, there had been the first rede awakenings to the Information Scandal and a General Election.

Amid all this, the October 19 swoop unleashed a fury of condemnation as it left 18 organisations banned, two newspapers closed down, World and Weekend World editor Percy Qoboza detained and many people restricted, including Dr Naude and Daily Dispatch editor Donald Woods.

But the banning of Dr Naude can only be seen as a singular act of infamy — it climaxed a long history of persecution of a man dedicated only to peace.

And his banning was almost certainly based on the mistaken finding in 1975 of the Le Grange-Schlebusch Commission that this man of God was an advocate of violence with inside knowledge of guerrilla plans to start a campaign of urban terrorism.

The Beyers Naude story is of one man's battle with the Afrikaner establishment by challenging its most sacred and powerful institutions — the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk and the Afrikaner Broederbond.

Because of a superb intellectual ability to challenge the Afrikaner holy of holies with the Scriptures, he, perhaps above any other opponent, brought out an essential ruthlessness in the Afrikaner makeup.

Dr Naude emerged from the subsequent flagellation as the Afrikaner Judas who kissed off the apartheid Christ in betrayal.

The man who always felt he had an important role to fulfill in the future reconciliation of conflicting forces in South Africa had to endure Afrikanerdom's ultimate contemptuous smear: "Communist fellow traveller".

Yet, he is the embodiment of verligte Afrikanerdom's struggle to escape the confines of conservatism and few individual lives mirror the strife, the strictures and trauma that accompany this pioneering role.

The unique tale of Dr Naude's fall from Afrikaner grace started 20 years ago when the events of Sharpeville put the razor-edge to an already finely-honed conscience, so plummeting Dr Naude into two decades of controversy.

Responsible

After the Sharpeville uprising, Dr Naude became the focal figure in a dissident church movement which vociferously attacked the political and economic dispensation.

He had concluded that the National Party of Dr Hendrik Verwoerd was responsible for the tension that led to Sharpeville and he rejected its policy of hard-line apartheid.

Until then Dr Naude had been a Nationalist supporter, a Broederbonder and Moderator of the Southern Transvaal Synod of the NGK — a man of great prominence in the Afrikaans church and cultural circles.

He resigned from the Broederbond in 1963 and the subsequent publication of confidential Broederbond documents placed a question mark against his integrity in the minds of Afrikaners.

Dr Naude went on to play a leading role in the founding of the Christian Institute — a now banned organisation unflagging in its criticism of the Government — and was appointed director in September, 1963.

Then the witchhunt was really on.

The NGK labelled the Institute heretical and started taking action against clergymen who were members. Dr Naude was under constant attack, particularly from the more conservative elements in Afrikaner ecclesiastical circles.

The Minister of Justice, the Broederbond, the NGK were just a few who took time out to take a swipe at him.

There were hate letters and abusive telephone calls, death threats and social ostracism, and cries of "traitor" and "heretic" as the villification continued.

Highlight

And always the fear of a hidden microphone or some other bugging device invading the privacy between man and wife.

A highlight in Dr Naude's struggle against attack from South Africa's Rightwing came when he and Prof A S Geyser won a libel action against the Pretoria verkrampte, Professor A D Pont. They were awarded R20 000 damages after Prof Pont had suggested they were Communist fellow travellers.

But Nationalism was not yet finished with Beyers Naude and his persecution neared its climax in 1975 when the Le Grange-Schlebusch Commission found that he was an advocate of violence.

Conclusive proof, it claimed, lay in newspaper reports about what Dr Naude was supposed to have said concerning the action of guerrilla fighters in South Africa.

The newspaper statement attributed to Dr Naude amounted to an admission, according to the Commission, "that he is aware of unlawful underground activities which it was his civic duty to report to the authorities in the first instance".

But the commission made no mention of the public denial of the truth of the reports at the time, of correspondence with the Prime Minister and tape-recorded evidence which showed that Dr Naude had been misquoted in the Cape National Party organ, Die Burger.

Mr Vorster meanwhile told the National Party's Free State congress that if the newspaper report was true, the State would act against Dr Naude with all the power at its disposal.

As early as 1973 it was predicted that the Government would ban him — four years later it was a fact.

Before his banning Dr Naude had become increasingly disillusioned with the NGK and finally resigned with four others last year. He had gone the full circle.

Dr Naude is now silenced and effectively trapped in a world where even a careless greeting could lead to a jail sentence. Every time he comes into the room when his wife is talking to someone else, he has to leave.

Isolation

But this silver-haired, slightly gaunt and softly-spoken patriarch of South African theology appears to be drawing on deep inner resources which reject any thought of bitterness and scorn intimidation.

The Government's now traditional "cooling off" sentence has obviously given Dr Naude time for some of the pursuits clergymen indulge in — deep self-examination, meditation, even new discoveries in their field.

One can only guess at what has motivated Dr Naude to overcome his isolation because he cannot speak for the record about it.

He is a perceptive person and he must be acutely aware of the things happening around him. His friends can see it reflected in his elation, his depression or in his anger, although they will tell you he is always strictly controlling any feelings that might allow him to let go.

But with his high ideals, Dr Naude must above all feel a sense of helplessness and sorrow over his inability to make a contribution towards relieving society's woes.

Learning

What has probably helped him overcome some of the intense frustration — born from the restrictions which leave him so helpless to go out and fight for conciliation — is pastoral counselling which takes up at least four hours of his day.

He can keep learning even from those people who seek comfort from him. Seven newspapers a day should keep him informed along with the constant stream of local and overseas correspondence.

His major frustration, however, still must inevitably be that he cannot meet openly with the people in the Christian community, exchange views or express them in Afrikaans — because he is the type of person who needs the response and stimulus of fellow human beings.

And to increase his burden Mrs Naude's health is suffering. She and her banned husband need to get away together — but this needs special permission for Dr Naude to leave the Johannesburg area to which he has been confined.

It is perhaps indicative of the kind of man he is that through all this hardship Dr Naude is still able to smile readily and even enjoy a joke about his predicament.

The Government condemned one of South Africa's most eminent Afrikaners because he tried to save his country the only way he knew how, but to all appearances it has not dampened his ardour or wilted his spirit.

The Beyers Naude banning will one day be considered in its full historical context . . . and the verdict is unlikely to favour those who sought to muzzle one of the most persistently articulate and penetrating of all the critics of apartheid.

HERTZOG'S BID TO UNITE SWA'S RIGHT FAILS

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 19 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Peter Kenny]

[Text]

WINDHOEK. — Dr Albert Hertzog recently made an unsuccessful bid to unite all South West Africa's Rightwing groups in an alliance against the South African Government in its support of a United Nations election in the territory.

Sources said Dr Hertzog's bid took place two weeks ago when he visited Windhoek. Among people he met was the leader of the National Party in the territory, Mr Kosie Pretorius.

Dr Hertzog, the founder of the Herstigte Nasionale Party, left Windhoek last weekend after trying to persuade the leader of the powerful National Party of SWA to form a united front against the South African Governments's plans for SWA.

Dr Hertzog is no longer in the HNP but the 81-year-old campaigner still has considerable influence among the Rightwing and is adamant that SWA should not fall out of white hands.

Persuade

He is convinced that South Africa is serious in its attempts to have a UN-sponsored election and believes that by mobilising the Rightwing he could stop it.

His visit is believed to have been an attempt to persuade Mr Pretorius to join the alliance against the South African Government.

But Mr Pretorius doused Dr Hertzog's hopes publicly in a meeting at Keetmanshoop when he issued a stern warning to his Rightwing not to go against the South African Government.

Mr Pretorius said he was aware that the leader of the HNP, Mr Jaap Marais, the leader of the National Conservative Party, Dr Connie Mulder and the leader of the Afrikaanse Weerstandsbeweging (AWB), Mr Eugene Terre Blanche, were to address a mass rally in Windhoek on October 27 to protest against a United Nations-sponsored settlement in SWA.

Mr Pretorius said: "I welcome all rightful attempts to form a united Christian front in which whites can play the primary role, but the other population groups must also play a part.

Warn

"But I must warn certain elements in SWA not to attempt anything for their own political motives.

"I must also warn against any attempt to create a rift between the National Party of SWA and the South African Government," Mr Pretorius said.

Such attempts could only bring about chaos and the downfall of the whites, said Mr Pretorius who has often been considered a Rightwinger.

In an interview yesterday, Mr Pretorius confirmed that Dr Hertzog had spoken to him but said he would deny that Dr Hertzog had come to persuade him to go against the South African Government.

He also said what he had said in Keetmanshoop had no connection with Dr Hertzog's visit.

Mr Pretorius said he had warned members of his party not to go against the South African Government because he suspected the HNP did not have the true interests of the people of SWA at heart and were merely using it as a springboard for political capital against the South African Government.

"Negotiations concerning SWA are at a particularly delicate stage," Mr Pretorius said.

The big drawcard to October 27 is expected to be Mr Terre'Blanche who was a former sergeant in the South African Police in Windhoek.

A security policeman who said he knew him when he was in Windhoek, said Mr Terre'blanche spelt his name Terblanche.

But when he discovered the French Terre'Blanche meant "white earth" he changed the spelling of his name.

END OF NEWSPAPER'S LIBERALISM DEPLORED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 2 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] DURBAN. — The deliberate ending of the Rand Daily Mail's liberal editorial era was a sad and worrying thing for South Africa. It could spell the end of dissent and rational thought, Mr Alister Sparks, former editor of the paper, said in Durban yesterday.

He was speaking at the University of Natal in Durban, where he delivered the E G Malherbe Academic Freedom Lecture.

Mr Sparks said it was difficult for him to be objective about the Rand Daily Mail and particularly about his departure from it.

The paper had been the thread which kept the constellation of rational thinking for people together.

"It was a newspaper which, by being a common denominator to all of them, managed to give them some sense of common purpose and mutual support."

In this way, he said, it had helped to sustain and keep the whole spirit of dissent alive in South Africa.

"It plugged away at issues like pass laws and influx control, endorsements out and Group Areas removals, Bannings and detentions without trial — and especially deaths in detention."

He feared that the removal of this linkpin would have a ripple effect on other institutions of dissent — at a time when pressures for conformity were going to become heavier than ever.

There was a danger that the blanket of conformity would creep over everyone.

He likened the situation to that of the then Rhodesia where, according to him, dissent and rationality ceased to exist.

"Thus in time the Rhodsian Press sank not just into conformity, but into total submissiveness."

"As in Rhodesia, we have become a country in which a spade is called anything but a spade. A newspeak has been evolved to cloud the issues and avoid the truth: a newspeak of euphemisms and rationalisations, the language of avoidance and self-delusion."

He said the Prime Minister had failed to adapt and reform.

"Now that we are facing the consequences of his failure, of which he himself warned, he is trying to tell us it is something else — not the rising wrath of our own fellow-countrymen whom we are oppressing, but the threat of an external enemy." — Sapa.

AFRIKAANS ACADEMIC RAPS HOMELANDS POLICY

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Oct 81 p 10

[Text]

THE Government's homelands policy presents an added security risk for South Africa, according to an associate professor of political science at Rand Afrikaans University.

In a special report on the homelands compiled for the South African Institute of International Affairs, Professor Deon Geldenhuys drew attention to the fact that South Africa's neighbouring states were being used as a springboard for terrorist attacks on the country.

"The Security implications which particularly the independent homelands hold for South Africa have gained new currency with the recent increase in the activities of armed insurgents entering South Africa from neighbouring states and committing acts of terrorism."

In his report, Professor Geldenhuys said internal resentment to the Government's racial policies was growing and that Black liberation movements could in future be expected to play an increasingly prominent role in fostering resistance.

Banned

"Although officially banned in South Africa, they (Liberation movements) are bound to become political forces which cannot be ignored by either the South African Government or foreign powers," he predicted.

Prof Geldenhuys said the time factor could not be ignored in South Africa's attempts to deal with the issue of race relations.

"To say that time is running out is said or original nor particularly helpful. Yet, it has to be acknowledged that the South African Government is faced with growing and more assertive domestic opposition — from Blacks, Coloureds and Indians — to its racial policies," he said.

Temporary

"Internationally, the pressure against South Africa is presently being contained to some extent, thanks to the Reagan Administration but this may prove a temporary respite.

"It seems safe to say," he said "that the South African Government's options on the racial issue are likely to become narrower in a situation of growing domestic polarisation and mounting external pressure."

Although White rule was still firmly entrenched in South Africa, it was being challenged more seriously, both domestically and internationally, than ever before, Prof Geldenhuys said.

"As for accommodating Black nationalism, the homelands' brand of ethnic nationalism has become anathema to Black nationalism as articulated by exile movements and Black consciousness organisations.

STUDY OF MINES EMPLOYMENT ISSUE ASKED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Oct 81 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text]

WE are running out of White hands — in the mining industry as well as in other sectors of the economy.

And whether Whites like it or not, Blacks are advancing in skills, in pay and in the positions they hold.

It cannot be otherwise, for without them the economy would grind to a halt; without them our farms, our factories, our businesses could not operate.

We are a country dependent on Black labour; we are a country which, as it expands, has to rely more and more on Blacks to take up positions for which there are no longer Whites available; we are a country which, for the sake of good relations between the races, must allow Blacks to develop to their fullest potential, without job discrimination, or we will find ourselves in a state of increasing conflict with people who have no hope, no prospects, no chance of achieving the rewards of their labour and of their growing skills.

For all these reasons, job reservation, with a few exceptions, has been set aside.

Only the mining industry remains a bastion of White privilege; only the mining industry remains a sector in which Black advancement is curbed by the opposition of White unions.

Now the Wiehahn Commission has recommended that the definition of "scheduled person" in the Mines and Works Act be replaced by the non-discriminatory definition of "competent persons."

At present, only "scheduled persons" may hold blasting certificates — and only holders of blasting certificates may become fully-fledged miners.

That is why the White miners have fought over the years to keep blasting certificates out of the hands of Blacks.

It would, in their view, be the start of a process in which jobs like those of shift bosses, mine overseers and mine managers could fall into the hands of Blacks.

Theoretically, once racial discrimination on the mines is ended, all posts could be within the reach of Blacks, but in practice only some of them would be available to them in the foreseeable future.

The Wiehahn Commission itself has suggested that the definition of "scheduled person" be changed on condition that adequate measures are taken to allay the possible apprehension of White workers about their future job security, standards of work are rigorously maintained, and all workers are required to achieve the same level of proficiency before being appointed to a post.

Equal pay for equal work is a further stipulation.

The commission also suggests that changes in work practices should be subject to consultation and negotiation between employers and employee organisations.

The Government, while accepting the principle of eliminating racial discrimination in the industry, will not amend legislation until measures have been effected to safeguard the job security of White miners.

It emphasises that employer organisations and the trade unions themselves must take the initiative to reach a compromise.

Whether such a compromise can be achieved is open to question, since the views of the all-White Mine Workers' Union are well-enough known, the union, supported by Right-wing political parties, being completely opposed to any diminution of the existing rights of White miners.

Indeed, having accepted the principle of equality on the mines, the Government is dodging the issue by leaving it to the industry to reach a settlement in negotiations with the unions.

The fact of the matter is that, as a minority report admits, the numbers of Whites working in the industry are declining, though it claims the "so-called shortage of suitably-qualified White workers is artificially created."

We doubt that this is true.

The Wiehahn Commission, in fact, points out that a consistent shortage of 250 White holders of blasting certificates has been reported by the Chamber of Mines.

This has resulted in Black workers without certificates doing tasks for which they are not qualified.

Like other industries, the mining industry cannot continue to keep skilled posts in White hands only, for the simple reason that there are not enough Whites available or attracted to mining.

We hope that the Mine Workers' Union, while safeguarding the interests of its members in matters like proficiency and equal pay for equal work, will not adopt an intransigent attitude as it has done in the past.

We agree that Black advancement in the mines is a thorny issue, but calm deliberation rather than emotional outbursts are necessary if the issue is to be satisfactorily resolved.

AFRIKANERS OBJECT TO MIXED UNIVERSITIES

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 21 Oct 81 p 14

[Article by Jaap Theron: "Mixing not necessary say Afrikaners]

[Text]

THE Transvaalse Onderwysersvereniging strongly hinted in its monthly mouthpiece, Mondstuk, yesterday that it would in an organised manner canvas "a counter-reaction" against what it called an "organised action" to open White Afrikaans universities to all races.

Spokesmen for the TO did not want to comment on the editorial in Mondstuk in view of the recent decision of the Federal Council of Teachers' Associations that its members should not comment on the report of the Human Sciences Research Council until the Government has published its final report on it.

But Mondstuk made it clear that the TO, backed by the majority of Afrikaans-speaking teachers in the Transvaal, was against the unqualified opening of Afrikaans universities to all races.

It has always been the expressed opinion of the TO that Afrikaans universities could be opened to other races on a selective basis when there was a need for the training of other races in directions which were not available at non-White universities.

The TO, however, has always been dead against the general opening of Afrikaans universities because it believes that it would jeopardise the culture and character of such institutions.

The TO has repeatedly stated that its position on own universities for each population group was not aimed at polarising population groups, but rather to grant to each group the same education rights which they demand for Afrikaners.

The Citizen has been told that the TO has not only requested the Federasie van Afrikaanse Kultuurverenigings (FAK), to arrange a comprehensive and representative congress of Afrikaners on education, but that it would be playing a leading role at such a congress.

The FAK yesterday announced that a comprehensive congress would be held before the March deadline for comments on the HRC's report next year.

Professor Gawie Cillie, chairman of the FAK, yesterday said his executive would finally consider the holding on a national Afrikaner congress on education on November 20.

The Citizen was told that the FAK will invite all Afrikaner organisations affiliated to it, as well as all other Afrikaners to toward "opinions with regard to the HSRC report on education so that it could supply the Government with a relevant opinion of how the Afrikaner feels about the education of his children."

An action committee will decide who will attend the envisaged congress on education and it is understood there is no possibility that a selective group of Afrikaners will be able to hijack the opinion of the congress.

The TO which initiated the idea of a congress, also made it clear in its editorial yesterday that the call for open universities was put to it and that it was not a spontaneous reaction of Afrikaners.

An early indication of the TO's investigation in the Transvaal into the question of "periodical sport integration at school levell" apparently shows that 95 percent of all Afrikaans teachers in the Transvaal are against mixed sport at school level.

WESTERN PROPOSALS TOO COMPLICATED, IS ASSERTION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 27 Oct 81 p 2

[Text]

The western five's proposed settlement plans for South West Africa were too complicated for the developing nations of the territory and were asking too much from any developing nation, Prof Willem Kleynhans, political scientist of Unisa, said last night.

Prof Kleynhans commented on the constitutional proposal which the western five yesterday handed to the South African government and to the internal democratic parties of South West Africa, and predicted that it would lead to mind boggling among the under-developed South West African nation as has never been experienced before.

He said it appeared that the American-initiated new plans included something each of the complicated United States' system of checks and balances, something of the Westminster system, something of the European government systems, with the result that the developing nation of South West Africa had before them a sort of Babelonic system with ramifications of which the understanding would be too much for the asking.

Unitarian

Prof Kleynhans said a much simpler unitarian system, with a view to the fact that almost 90 percent of the South West African inhabitants were non-Whites, should have been proposed.

He said the proposed proportional system of government for South West African was in fact the most complicated constitution in the entire west.

"How could one sell this to the Bushmen, or for that reason to any of the underdeveloped SWA nation?" he asked.

A constitutional lawyer at the University of South Africa, Prof Dawid van Wyk, said the constitutional proposals were typical of modern Western constitutions, such as those presently in use in Bophuthatswana, the United States, Germany and France.

Fair Chance

He said the three-branched system of government had a fair chance of working in the territory if it was tailored to accommodate aspects of traditional government which the indigenous people were used to.

"You know these proposals don't differ much from Zimbabwe's constitution either," he said. "It will only work if the eventual government plays the game and upholds the rules of the constitution. But Swapo is the uncertain factor. There would have to be assurances that Swapo would uphold the constitution if they gained power."

Shortly after receiving a copy of the draft proposals from Mr Middleton, the leader of the SWA National Party, Mr Kosie Pretorius, said it was wrong to put the emphasis on an international solution for SWA at this stage. An internal "national" solution should first be found which could later lead to an international settlement.

The leader of Swapo Democrats, Mr Andreas Shipanga, welcomed the draft constitutional proposals.

"We agree almost 90 percent with this presentation," he said.

"It is entirely within our thinking, it is the kind of Namibia we want to see."

Mr Shipanga said the draft guidelines effectively ruled out the possibility of a one-party state in SWA.

Meanwhile, the Chairman of the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance, Mr Dirk Mudge, told a public meeting at the weekend that the current initiative would end in an election.

"I feel that the election will take place and I say to you: you are making a big mistake if you think nothing is coming."

The DTA was not afraid to take on Swapo in an election campaign, he added.

Dr Van Zyl Slabbert, leader of the Official Opposition, welcomed the plans and said it was clearly a combination of the American system of cheques and balances, and the West German system of proportional representation — in effect a system which fully agreed with the PFP's plans for South Africa.

He said there were several constitutional principles embodied in these plans — principles which could help to prevent the abuse of power, domination of any one group over another and the safeguarding of the sovereignty of the constitution.

NEW WEAPONS MANUFACTURER HAD OVERSEAS HELP

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 19 Oct 81 p 2

[Text]

A NEW chemical factory at Krantzkop near Wellington, which will supply the SA Defence Force with rockets and explosives for bombs, was officially opened by the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, yesterday.

The factory is owned by Somchem, the main contractor for explosives and propellants in the Armscor group.

A spokesman for Somchem said at yesterday's opening ceremony that two countries had "assisted" South Africa in setting up certain of the manufacturing processes, but did not name the countries concerned.

Construction of the new manufacturing plant was necessitated by the rapid expansion of production capacity at Somchem's Somerset West plant, to the point where no further expansion there was possible.

In order to fulfil the increasing requirements of the SADF for Somchem's products, the company was forced to build a second factory, and the Krantzkop site, 20 kms north of Wellington, was chosen.

Construction began in April 1979, and on November 4 last year — exactly three years after the United Nations imposed its arms embargo against South Africa — Krantzkop's administrative staff moved into their new offices on the site.

The manufacturing plant incorporates the latest technology, and one of the processes employed is functional in only two other countries.

The TNT manufacturing section, "normally one of the messiest", according to a spokesman for Somechem, is "so clean you could eat your proverbial breakfast off the floor".

Somchem is consulting the Department of Nature Conservation to protect the rare species of flora found around the plant.

A variety of game is also found near the factory, and Somchem plans to introduce more species.

• Somchem originated in 1962 as a subsection of AE&CI when an agreement was signed with the Government whereby AE&CI would establish a factory for local production of explosives and propellants.

In 1971 Somchem was registered as a full subsidiary of Armscor, and today Somchem manufactures a wide range of propellants, explosives and rockets required by the SADF.

PROFILE OF URBAN ADVISOR FLIP SMIT

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 16 Oct 81 p 9

[Article by Patrick Laurence: "The Man Who May Change the Face of Our Cities"]

[Text]

THE appointment of the softly spoken Dr Flip Smit, of the Human Sciences Research Council, as an adviser to the Government on how best to meet the challenge of accelerating black urbanisation will lead to radical changes in official policy if his advice is heeded.

Dr Smit, a former university professor who ponders deeply before committing himself on any issue, hardly fits the stereotype of a man with the potential to revolutionise policy on as vital an issue as black urbanisation.

But a study of his thinking on urbanisation generally, and particularly as it affects blacks in South Africa, leaves little doubt that his views cut diametrically across many of the axioms which underlie present policy.

The authoritive book "Swart Verstedelikking" which Dr Smit wrote with Mr Jan Booysen, of the University of Pretoria, contains many of the ideas which he has been quietly advocating over the years at conferences and from his previous positions as professor of geography at Tukkies and senior researcher at the Africa Institute.

The recently published book may be considered as the distilled essence of Dr Smit's views on urbanisation and therefore provides an accurate guide to the direction official policy will take if his advice is taken.

For convenience quotes from the book are attributed to Dr Smit, although strictly they are the joint views of Dr Smit and Mr Booysen.

Of cardinal importance is his telescopic view of black urbanisation as an inexorable process which must be accepted rather than lamented. The corollary is that a national plan must be devised to cope with it instead of persisting with futile attempts to deny or prevent it.

He notes that General Jan Smuts once described the problem posed by the urbanisation of blacks as a "sphinx problem" which should be passed on to the "ampler shoulders and stronger brains of the future".

But, he says, even today "uncertainty hangs like a black cloud over the future of the urban blacks", in spite of the obvious urgency of the situation.

He outlines the dimensions of the problem crisply. At present about 38% of the black population — or just over 6 million — is urbanised. By the turn of the century 75% will be urbanised, which in sheer numbers means provision has to be made for another 21 million urban blacks.

Dr Smit puts it succinctly: "More houses will have to be built in the next 20 years than were built since the arrival of Van Riebeeck." He quickly dismisses any vain hopes that the increase can be accommodated in the homelands.

Economic forces, he states, will ensure that most of the 21 million will have to be housed in South Africa's existing metropolitan areas.

As if to reinforce the point, he adds: "It must be accepted as a fact that homeland urbanisation cannot offer a solution to urbanisation in 'white' South Africa."

Stressing the need for an national strategy to meet the challenge ahead, he implicitly, but unmistakably, cautions against reliance on merely "negative" measures, of which influx control is a classic example.

He says: "A study of black urbanisation must come to the conclusion that Sir Thomas Graham's image of (official) policy in 1924 is still largely appropriate to the urban black population today."

Sir Thomas referred to contemporary regulations to check the inflow of blacks as: "Little barriers to keep the sea out, and, when the sea advances, down come the barriers and you retreat a few yards inland and erect further barriers."

In another paper, delivered at a conference in 1979, Dr Smit says strict application of influx control in one area often merely leads to the "damming up" of blacks in another area.

Thus, there is a build-up of blacks on the East Rand because of stringent influx control in Johannesburg, and a growing population of squatters in the Winterveld, in Bophuthatswana, because of rigid application of pass laws in Pretoria.

Dr Smit underlines the dimensions of the problem ahead by referring to existing shortages in black housing.

In 1977 the shortage stood at 310 000 houses and 126 000 hostel beds, in spite of the expenditure of black housing totalling R66-million between 1974 and 1977. Merely to eliminate the backlog will cost R1 000-million at 1977 prices. Since then building costs have trebled.

In search of an answer to the looming problem, Dr Smit focuses on modern thinking or gedagteriqtings on how to respond to the challenge of providing housing and services in underdeveloped countries.

He adds: "It has become increasingly clear that Western standards and concepts are not appropriate to countries of the Third World. South Africa can fruitfully take note of these new thought directions."

In his careful, scholarly manner he advocates a move away from the present policy where the State provides subsidised Western-style housing — even if they are on a "matchbox" scale — to one which encourages blacks to build their own houses and to use traditional building styles and methods.

"Financial limitations and lack of skills in the installation and maintenance of services have led (students) to the conclusion that Africa's cities cannot have better sanitary systems than those which the residents can themselves build and maintain."

He adds: "That it is also applicable to the South African situation is beyond question."

His view rests on two interrelated axioms:

- That black involvement in the provision of housing according to their own standards and traditions is more likely to meet their accommodation needs.
- That it is more satisfying to the people concerned (presumably according to the criteria of the-greatest-happiness-of-the-greatest-number).

As a corollary to this view, Dr Smit advocates gradual abolition of the present system of providing subsidised housing for urban blacks. One reason is that it stifles black initiative. Another is that it is an impediment to the 99-year leasehold scheme.

"Among the black population of South Africa there is already a tendency toward the attitude that a heavily subsidised house will be provided for them if they wait long enough," Dr Smit says.

Similarly, he contends, "heavily subsidised" rentals in most townships discourage blacks from taking advantage of present home-ownership and leasehold schemes (instalments on these schemes are higher than "sub-economic" rentals).

Dr Smit is critical of the objective of making Soweto the "most beautiful city in Africa", proposing instead the more modest aim of making it the "most viable" of African cities.

While not wanting to deny the people of Soweto the right to electricity, he questions whether it is justifiable when seen against the huge shortage of housing and more fundamental services in the rest of the country.

He warns that electrification of Soweto may compound the existing housing shortage in Soweto by drawing more blacks to it, adding that it can lead to jealousy, strife and rebellion by black plattelanders against elite townships.

Squatting

On the related problem of squatting, Dr Smit says it should be accepted as inevitable in the light of the anticipated speeding up of black urbanisation in the next two decades and the limited resources available to deal with it.

Stressing the rural roots of the squatter problem, he says: "Many of the causes of squatting in the Cape Flats must be related back to the Ciskei and Transkei ... The causes must be sought more widely than in the particular squatter area."

Dr Smit is opposed to the destruction of squatter settlements, as it can "destroy the social order" and shatter tribal and family ties. Instead he proposes that squatter communities should be encouraged and helped to improve their living conditions and make the settlement a bridge between the rural and urban life-styles.

"Schemes such as that at Ekuvukeni, where more than 80% of the houses were erected by blacks and which serves as a bridge between the traditional and modern houses, are strongly recommended."

BID FOR ORIENTAL LABOR IS SHELVED

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 20 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Don Marshall]

[Text] A SCHEME to recruit skilled construction workers from Taiwan and Thailand to ease the acute shortage in South Africa has been shelved because the governments do not citizens to work for South African companies.

The scheme, which had Cabinet approval, was launched after Mr P W Botha's Taiwan trip earlier this year.

No proposed recruitment figures were available, but the men would have been used on several large construction projects around the country and their contracts would have ensured their return home.

The project was confirmed last night by Mr J C Pretorius, director-general of the Department of the Interior, and Professor Nic Wiehahn, a manpower specialist from Unisa.

Satisfied

The matter was regarded as "extremely sensitive" in Government circles.

"The question of getting people to come to South Africa has become a high-temperature political issue because of the large reservoir of labour in this country," Prof Wiehahn said last night.

The Government had not approved the scheme until it was satisfied no suitable South Africans were available and trade unions had agreed.

Several South African contruction companies are keen to import skilled workers.

The Thai and Taiwan governments intervened by indicating their reluctance to allow their citizens to come to South Africa unless they were employed by Thai or Tawainese companies granted contracts here.

'Priority'

"This is where the matter rests," Prof Wiehahn said last night.

"This was merely intended as a short-term solution to a serious shortage of skilled manpower in South Africa.

"I believe our priority should be to train our own people of all races to do skilled work, but we have such a tremendous backlog that we cannot meet immediate demands."

Skilled workers have been recruited in the East before. The Government allowed about 350 South Koreans to help in a R96-million project to double the size of the Caltex refinery in Cape Town in 1975.

A lot of foreign workers came on contracts in 1971 to work on the R80-million Natref plant at Sasolburg. Among the men from 19 nations were 600 Irish and British, 300 Iranians and 100 Germans.

Refugees

Political instability in Poland has meanwhile helped South African employers recruit highly-skilled workers.

Several major employers — including Iscor and Escom — have recruiting officials in Austria to interview Poles who have fled their country and are living in a large refugee camp near Vienna.

"We have done quite well and so have other employers," Mr Johan Prinsloo, Iscor's personnel manager, said last night.

Iscor has already employed more than 60 technical engineers and artisans from among the Polish refugees. Several have already arrived in South Africa with their families and the others are expected soon.

Escom has recruited about 40 highly-trained technical people — engineers and artisans — at the camp and recruiting agents are looking for more, Mr C J Uys, Escom's public relations officer, said last night.

Escom's major overseas labour source is still Britain. Several hundred highly-skilled workers have signed for jobs in South Africa this year.

ARTISAN TRAINING PLAN MAY BLOCK BLACKS

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 20 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Steven Friedman: "Doubts About New Deal for Blacks"]

[Text]

A NEW artisan training agreement in the metal industries may effectively block opportunities for some black workers to become artisans, some employers fear.

But while acknowledging that the agreement has tightened criteria for workers to become artisans without first becoming apprentices, both the Steel and Engineering Industries Federation and registered unions in the industries reject suggestions that it will keep blacks out of skilled jobs.

Last week Seifsa and the unions ratified the new agreement, which sets out new criteria for non-apprentices to become artisans.

Criteria

The new agreement replaces the journeyman recognition scheme, which allowed non-apprentices to become artisans and was negotiated before blacks were permitted to do skilled work.

Unlike the old agreement, it now requires applicants to have an agreed educational level and to pass trade tests before they can become artisans.

These criteria were inserted after demands by the unions for criteria aimed at "preserving artisan standards".

Minutes of a Seifsa board meeting sent to the Rand Daily Mail indicate some concern that the new criteria will block artisan status for many blacks.

The minutes note "that to meet the educational requirements, certificated evidence would be necessary".

Impetus

It was felt that this would "constitute, unfortunately, an effective block to the entrance of many black workers under the agreement".

The minutes express the fear that, because of deficiencies in black education, many workers might be unable to qualify.

However, Seifsa's board had decided to accept the agreement but also to "give further impetus to the introduction of institutionalised training on a nonracial basis".

The director of Seifsa, Mr Sam van Coller, said Seifsa was "happy" with the new agreement.

"The old agreement was a relic of a different era and we are pleased that the unions have agreed that the educational standards will not be higher than those which apply to apprentices and that, in some trades, the education criteria will be lowered", he said.

Protect

The director of the Confederation of Metal and Building Unions, Mr Ben Nicholson, has insisted that the new criteria will protect black artisans.

Because they will now have to undergo trade tests, they will have "a qualification which will be valid throughout the industry, rather than with one employer only", he said.

CONFEDERATION VIEWED AS SCHEME FOR SUBORDINATION

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 20 Oct 81 p 9

[Text] More and more people are seeing a South African confederation as an elaborate scheme for subordination, according to Professor Marinus Wiechers, director of the Institute of Foreign and Comparative Law at Unisa.

He told a seminar on Southern African Interaction in Pretoria yesterday that the feeling of subordination--"if not vassalage"--was a deep-rooted danger.

"Promises of confederal nationality and economic co-operation across 'soft' borders are not enough to allay fears," Prof Wiechers said.

The Government had turned the constellation of states ideal into a far more acceptable, but still vague, concept.

He said constitutional development towards a more workable basis for southern African interdependence was still severely hampered by ideology and politics reminiscent of separate development practices.

He listed as "almost insurmountable" problems:

--The insistence on creating independent states which cost people of those nationalities their South African citizenship.

--The creation of territorial units by consolidating land in terms of old-fashioned and anachronistic 'native reserves' legislation.

--The establishment of separate institutions for whites, coloureds and Indians from which all black participation was excluded.

--The overall and unrealistic emphasis on maintaining the so-called white (or predominintly white) Republic of South Africa.

The consequences of an internal decolonisation process on rigid lines and "internal divide-and-rule policies", he said, led to anomalies, frustration and deep resentment.

The professor believed a "total strategy" was needed to give full scope and constitutional realisation to interdependence and co-operation and wanted the following ideas applied:

--Agreements with independent states for economic and social advancement for everybody.

--Inclusion of land and towns--even cities--in national states.

--Promotion of new forms of regionalism where the option of national states was unacceptable.

--Establishment of overriding structures and arrangements as well as incorporation by means of representative processes into existing institutions.

"Constitutionally, we have the means, through decentralisation and progressive devolution, as well as institutionalised bargaining, to reshape the whole pattern of southern Africa," he said.

"All that is needed is statemanship, faith and the courage to build a future, albeit less defined but more secure, stable and peaceful than the present situation of fragmentation, power manipulation and fear."

UNISA CHIEF CALLS FOR BLACK, BROWN DIGNITY

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 20 Oct 81 p 9

[Text]

HUMAN dignity of the black and brown population must be part of implemented policy in South Africa or there would be nothing but strife and an escalation of unrest.

This was said by Mr Justice V G Hiemstra, Chancellor of the University of South Africa, yesterday when he officially opened a seminar in Pretoria on "Alternative Structures for Southern African Interaction", organised by the Institute of Foreign and Comparative Law at Unisa.

Mr Justice Hiemstra, who is also Chief Justice of Bophuthatswana, said: "We are deeply engaged today in constitution-making and we stand on the eve of tremendous changes as we move towards our second republic."

"The ethos of the first (republic) was nation-building, free from the British connection.

"The ethos of the second (republic) will have to be accommodation of the striving of black and brown for recognition and human dignity," he said. "It will have to encompass a triumph for justice for all races according to the concepts of our time.

Strife

"If this fundamental principle of justice is not going to be part of implemented policy, I see nothing but strife and escalating unrest," Mr Justice Hiemstra said.

The most important preparations for a future constitution were taking place in the President's Council "where they remain a tantalising secret with only a few broad guidelines as yet visible under the blanket of silence," he said.

The original design for a constellation of states had been ambitious, based on the assumption that the countries south of the Zambezi and the Cunene were moderate, facing a common Marxist threat.

"There are, however, political and ideological divisions between South Africa and the black African states which, for the present, rule out any formal relationship."

Blacks were today largely left out of the constitution-making process. There was consultation with black leaders periodically, but this was entirely inadequate, he said.

Assumption

Such consultations were based on an erroneous assumption that existing territorial arrangements were acceptable and final.

"Secondly, these consultations do not bring a solution any nearer for that half of the black people who live outside the national states.

"The views of the blacks range, on the one hand, from complete commitment to violence as a means of gaining exclusive control of the country and on the other hand to a fatalistic and docile acceptance of whatever is done by the whites," Mr Justice Hiemstra said.

The militant stand was mainly taken by young urban blacks who looked upon their elders as stooges of the whites. The older generation, which would soon disappear, warned that the young ones were past the negotiating stage.

"It is to me of overwhelming importance that the initiative be taken by black leaders to produce a constructive plan of multiracial accord," he said. — Sapa.

FOUR FACTORS SEEN BOOSTING COUNTRY'S EXPORTS

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 20 Oct 81 p 16

[Article by Howard Preece]

[Text] FOUR positive factors point to "some increase" in South Africa's exports next year, according to the Federated Chamber of Industries.

These are exchange-rate movements, new export incentives, some commodity-price rises and more spare capacity in the domestic economy.

These views have been put to the executive council meeting in East London of the FCI by its export trade committee.

It says: "The decline in the value of the rand, especially against the dollar in which many export sales are denominated, has improved the competitive edge of many South African exports, which had become eroded.

"The prospects are for further downward movements in the value of the rand except perhaps against the dollar which is probably now overvalued.

"The new system of export incentives will help to reduce the lack of competitiveness of many South African manufactured exports because of the relatively higher price of locally made raw materials.

"A rise in the price of certain commodities, such as base metals (is expected), as a gradual improvement occurs in the economies of the industrial countries."

The FCI also refers to "the greater availability of capacity within South Africa to satisfy export markets as domestic demand moderates".

It says: "All these factors suggest that South Africa's exports can be expected to show some increase again in 1982."

Looking at the wider international picture, however, the FCI still takes a fairly sombre approach.

It comments: "The prospects for merchandise exports are largely influenced by conditions in world trade.

"The interrational economic outlook still gives cause for concern. Slow growth remains a key feature of the international situation and outlook.

"The volume of world trade, which slumped by 1,5% in 1980, is also expected to stagnate during 1981.

"World trade situations have been seriously disrupted by high interest rates and the volatility of international exchange rates.

"The most serious factor in the outlook for world trade continues to be the slow rate of expected recovery of the developed nations and the crippling oil-induced deficits which continue to be carried by non-oil producing countries.

"The most optimistic situation outlined by the World Bank (on the assumption that the real price of oil will not increase in the period up to 1985) is of no more than a 1% gross national product growth for the industrialised countries and a substantially lower growth for the non-oil devloping countries.

"Under these circumstances it may be expected that world trade will virtually stagnate until the middle of the current decade.

"Furthermore, most countries will be forced to introduce major adjustment policies primarily to correct balance of payments difficulties leading to increased demands for protectionism."

INTERNATIONAL CARTEL AGAINST SA IS EXPOSED

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 18 Oct 81 pp 1, 3

[Article by Martin Welz: "Escom Caught In Tender Trap"]

[Text] COLLUSION between international manufacturers could have cost Escom and the South African taxpayer hundreds of millions of rands in the past 20 years.

A Sunday Times investigation has revealed that South Africa was a major target of a secret cartel of manufacturers of electrical equipment, which it is estimated pushed up tender prices by between 15 and 25 percent.

In the past two decades all Escom contracts for water and steam turbines and generators — worth thousands of millions of rands — for new power stations have been awarded to cartel members.

Escom plans to spend R11 000-million on expansion this decade. Nearly a third of that will be spent on overseas contracts for electrical equipment.

A report by a United States congressional committee, based on hundreds of secret documents, and published last year, revealed that a score of major German, Swiss, French and British electrical giants have secretly been operating a tightly regulated international cartel for the past 30 years to "rig" tenders in developing and non-producing countries.

Ten years ago several major Japanese companies were also persuaded to join the cartel.

Using secret codes and a seemingly innocuous front organisation in Switzerland, the International Electrical Association, cartel members concluded agreements aimed firstly at destroying smaller manufacturers in developing countries and then at artificially raising the profits of cartel members on export projects by between 16 and 62 percent, depending on the target country.

The cartel organisation also ensured that these lucrative contracts were "fairly" distributed among its members.

European members of the cartel, according to a 1980 membership list, included the German companies Siemens, AEG and MAN, the Swedish Asea, the Swiss giant Brown-Boveri, the British General Electric and the French companies Alsthom and CEM.

Consortium

Japanese members include Toshiba Electric, Mitsubishi and Hitachi.

Only a week ago Escom announced the award of a R380-million generator and turbine contract for Matimba, the latest of five similar new power stations to be completed by 1984. Successful tenderer was "a German-French consortium" ... MAN-Alsthom. And last week Siemens subsidiary Kraftwerk Union announced that it, too, had been awarded a R360-million Escom tender.

Major suppliers of transformers to Escom are Asea and British General Electric, both cartel members.

This week when the Sunday Times asked for comment on the American findings, a spokesman for Siemens in Munich — founder member of the cartel — would at first only confirm that an "export cartel" had existed "before the war".

"Times have changed, the world has changed and there was no possibility to make such agreements after the war," the spokesman said. "It is impossible on account of competition worldwide."

Legal

When pressed he finally admitted that Siemens is still a member of an "export" cartel. But, he said, it was quite legal.

A senior Siemens official was a signatory to a cartel agreement for producers of turbines and generators signed on June 24, 1970 and updated on January 1, 1973. The agreement is included among the documents uncovered by the American investigation.

Cartel documents dealt with in the American report include agreements still current in 1978. All of them extend to South Africa.

This week Escom claimed that it had never heard of the cartel.

"If it exists, it can't be very effective. In our experience the unsuccessful tenderers are very unhappy ... they wouldn't put up that performance if it weren't for real. Also for technical reasons we doubt whether cartel agreements could have had any real influence on Escom's tender procedures," an Escom spokesman told the Sunday Times.

But an American development economist, Dr Richard Newfarmer of the Overseas Development Council in Washington and a University of Notre Dame professor, has calculated from cartel documents that collusion between cartel members has effectively pushed up prices by 16 percent to 40 percent.

In terms of various secret cartel agreements it is frequently arranged in advance what tender prices are to be, who is to be put in the most favourable position to win the tender and how the loser members of the cartel are to be compensated for going to the trouble of putting in a "fake" tender.

In communications from cartel headquarters in Lausanne, cartel members are referred to by code numbers and letters.

Among the hundreds of documents obtained by American investigators into the International Electrical Association is a letter dated November 12, 1974 from the then Secretary-General of the IEA, Mr J R Hughes. Headed "Advice of Order: Special Arrangement" it states that "Reference A 9396 has resulted in an order. Successful tenderer: 18. Description of plant ordered: three 600 megawatt turbines with condensing and feed heating plant."

Copies of the letter were sent to "3, 4, 9, 11, 16, 18, C, D".

With the assistance of Dr Newfarmer and other sources the Sunday Times was able to break the code and discover that the letter refers to an Escom tender.

"Reference A" refers to a "product section" of the cartel consisting of those members that manufacture steam turbines and generators. 9396 was the code number allocated to the contract for the Matla power station in South Africa. The contract was awarded to MAN, member no 18.

Other cartel members who were somehow involved in a "special arrangement" concerning the tender, received copies of the notification. They included Brown-Boveri (no 3), Kraftwerk Union (a Siemens subsidiary, code number 9), CEM (no 16), Toshiba (code C) and Mitsubishi (code D).

"Special arrangement" meant simply that the tender had not been arranged in terms of standard existing agreements between the cartel members, but by special agreement.

The Sunday Times has so far been able to decipher two further references to specific South African contracts in secret cartel documents.

Dues

In 1973 cartel headquarters in Lausanne sent an account to Toshiba in Japan demanding payment of cartel "dues" relating to two transactions described as E 5128 and E 5147.

Transaction 5147 was the tender for the hydro-electric plant at the Hendrik Verwoerd dam, while 5128 was for the hydro-electric plant at the Van der Kloof dam.

Escom accepted the tenders of Hitachi for the hydroturbines and of Toshiba for the generators.

Tenders for the latest Escom hydro-electric scheme — Drakensberg — have also gone to the Japanese cartel members.

In the case of transformers the cartel had been particularly successful, also in South Africa, Dr Newfarmer found.

Despite having to make a few "bargain basement" tenders in the mid 1980's — apparently by agreement to knock out non-member competitors — cartel members were able to win tenders for transformers in South Africa at prices nearly 20 percent higher than what they would have got without collusion between them.

A cartel report lists 11 South African tenders for transformers awarded to cartel members between May 1965 and December 1967.

In two cases the cartel put in only one tender, pushing up the price to 113 percent and 121 percent of their standard price. In the only case listed where the cartel members tendered according to standard cartel agreements, the price obtained was 117 percent of the standard price.

This list indicates that when the cartel was functioning, they were able to raise their price by as much as 50 percent.

In documents filed with Swiss registry officials the IEA blandly describes itself as a gatherer of information and statistics for members. Indeed, only if members are regularly and reliably informed of one another's activities, can they secretly arrange matters between them.

But, in addition, so as not to leave it to chance or the market, all product sections have extremely detailed and complex "Tendering and Contract Agreements". Copies of agreements still effective in 1976 are included in the documents obtained by the American congressional investigators.

Terms differ from agreement to agreement, but many include:

- the fixing of prices at regular meetings in so-called price handbooks
- inflation and escalation clauses are dealt with in terms of fixed multipliers, and no member may undercut these prices
- market share is fixed in terms of a predetermined table, and the Secretary General has to ensure that tenders are allocated accordingly
- terms for delivery, payment, and guarantees are fixed by standard section agreements, so that members cannot even compete on that level.

The members of Section E — producers of water driven generators — for instance have committed themselves to strict price "discipline". Tenders are allocated by agreement to ensure that each members gets a predetermined share.

The secretariat establishes who is entitled to the next tender and others are obliged to bid at least 7,5 percent higher.

Those concerns that do not get the tender are compensated for their fake tender — 2 percent of the contract price must go to a fund which is shared at the end of the year according to who got what, calculated by the Secretary General.

This week all attempts to trace a telephone number for the IEA in Lausanne were unsuccessful.

Spokesmen in South Africa for Brown-Boveri, Asea and MAN all denied knowledge of the cartel this week.

EDITOR BECOMES RIGHTWING TARGET

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 18 Oct 81 p 5

[Text]

DR WIMPIE de Klerk, editor-in-chief of Die Transvaler, flagship of the Perskor newspaper fleet, has become a prime target of rightwing intrigue in the National Party and there are moves to curb his influence, according to informed sources.

The campaign to curb Dr de Klerk forms part of a much wider rightwing strategy which will swing into full force at the Transvaal congress early next month.

According to informed sources, the rightwingers have scored a significant gain in their moves against Dr de Klerk with the appointment of a new, highly conservative deputy chief editor, Mr Jan van Vreden, to guard their interests in the newspaper's top editorial echelons.

Mr van Vreden's position is a new one in the editorial line-up — there is already one deputy chief editor.

The first public signs of the broad rightwing campaign became clear this week in a series of tough resolutions that will confront the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, at next month's Transvaal congress.

Mr Botha, whose cavalier treatment of the Transvaal congress in the past has earned him bitter enemies, faces a rough passage at the congress this year.

The rightwing is obviously out for revenge and could also make a run against one of the Prime Minister's close and important Transvaal allies, Mr Fanie Botha.

There is speculation that an attempt might be made to oust Mr Botha, the Minister of Manpower, from his position as vice-chairman of the party in the Transvaal.

He alienated the rightwing shortly after the election when he tackled the Transvaal leader, Dr Andries Treurnicht, during a meeting of the Transvaal head committee.

He attacked Dr Treurnicht's controversial Marble Hall speech that had obliquely, but clearly, knocked Mr Botha's labour policies.

Dr Treurnicht won the encounter, forcing Mr Botha to back down at a specially convened subsequent meeting of the Transvaal head committee.

According to informed sources, Dr Treurnicht also figures in the moves against Dr de Klerk, whose editorship of Die Transvaler has long been a bone of contention among rightwingers.

Die Transvaler is traditionally the mouthpiece of the National Party in the Transvaal, but rightwingers have long complained that Dr de Klerk's editorial policy is not representative of the mainstream of Transvaal Nationalism.

Informed sources say there is enormous significance in the still-to-be-announced appointment of Mr Jan van Vreden as deputy chief editor at Die Transvaler.

Mr van Vreden, described as a highly conservative Nationalist, was news editor at the Pretoria-based Perskor newspaper, Hoofstad, when Dr Treurnicht was editor there.

They formed a close association which has been maintained ever since, sources say.

Mr van Vreden was promoted from Hoofstad to editor of Perskor's Noord-Transvaler, a Pietersburg newspaper, after Dr Treurnicht's departure from the Press world into politics.

On Monday, it was announced within Perskor that he was to be appointed a deputy chief editor of Die Transvaler — but so far the appointment has not been publicly announced.

However, rightwingers, including Dr Treurnicht, were apparently aware of the move some time before even its internal announcement.

According to informed sources, Dr Treurnicht last week told a media confidante in Cape Town of Mr van Vreden's impending move to the Johannesburg-based daily and said the idea was that Die Transvaler would at last have a conservative within its top editorial structure.

Dr Treurnicht said yesterday he held no positions in Perskor and had nothing to do with Mr van Vreden's appointment. He confirmed he had heard about it, but did not recall making any comments about it.

He said anyone who tried to make sinister deductions about the appointment was "plucking them from the air".

Dr de Klerk writes a weekly political column and generally tends to act as a pathfinder for the verligte movement.

His views are anathema to the right wing and his position at Perskor has been uncomfortable for some time because his political convictions are not shared by the bulk of the giant organisation's top personnel and directors.

The Perskor conglomerate's directors include such prominent Transvaal rightwingers as Mr Marius Joosta, the chairman, Mr M C Botha, the former Minister of Bantu Administration and Development, Mr Jack Steyl, the former Transvaal secretary of the National Party, and Mr Sybrand van Niekerk, the former Administrator who defied the Prime Minister's injunction that politicians relinquish their newspaper connections.

Dr de Klerk was out of Johannesburg this weekend and could not be reached for comment.

COUNTRY MAY LOSE HEAVILY ON MAIZE EXPORTS

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 18 Oct 81 p 18

[Article by Ken Slade]

[Text]

SOUTH Africa stands to lose out on a potential annual R1 000-million maize export market because the State is forcing maize farmers to subsidise domestic products.

This is the view of the chief executive of the National Maize Producers' Organisation, Dr Pieter Gouws.

Dr Gouws said this week that should local maize farmers continue to increase production at current rates, an average maize harvest of 16-million tons in 10 years' time would be commonplace.

"The normal domestic consumption of the crop grows slowly and at present stands at only six million tons a year.

"Profitable markets will have to be found for the expected bumper harvests, and the maize producers will have to turn increasingly to foreign markets to sell their produce."

But Dr Gouws was not sure such harvests could be exported profitably under present circumstances.

"There are insufficient export facilities and high domestic rail costs. Maize is being exported through Durban, East London and even Cape Town.

"Farmers are paying extremely high rail fares for their produce and it seems stupid to me that we have to use these ports, which are so far, when Richards Bay could be used as a maize export port."

Dr Gouws said that during 1966, maize producers called on the Government and rail authorities for permission to use Richards Bay as a maize export harbour.

"Since then a total of 17 meetings on the same issue have been held, and all we hear is that they are still investigating the matter."

He also appealed to the State to stop using the agriculture industry, especially maize farmers, to subsidize domestic industries.

"A good example of this is that we are forced to purchase locally manufactured bags for our produce, even though we can buy the same product cheaper from overseas."

POLYETHYLENE PRICE RISE NOTED

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 16 Oct 81 p 11

[Text]

THE price of low density polyethylene (LDPE) has risen by R190 a ton — about 14,5% on the old price, causing protests from converters and end users.

This could add almost R2-million to the annual costs of one the major users of LDPE — Barlows subsidiary Nampak.

Both AECI — sole supplier of LDPE — and Sasol — sole suppliers of ethylene — hope prices will ease relatively next year.

In a telex message to its customers, AECI said the increase was necessary because of a large and unforeseen increase in the price of ethylene from Sasol.

This increase took account of price increases in ethylene over the past six months for which AECI had not bargained, and "hopefully" any further increases in the price until the end of 1982.

AECI hopes not to have to increase the price again next year, although it does not guarantee this.

The high ethylene price from Sasol is caused by different methods of production at Sasol 1 and Sasol 2.

Sasol 1 produces most of the ethylene and its feedstock is naphtha. Its price is related to the international price of naphtha and its availability.

The feedstock used at Sasol 2 for the cheaper ethylene product is coal, and the price is related to the North-West European coal price.

Sasol 1's ethylene price is between R150 and R200 a ton more than Sasol 2's.

World ethylene prices have risen and one of the main factors has been the exchange rate. Naphtha is bought in dollars and the North-West European price is quoted in marks.

Sasol hopes to produce most of its ethylene at Sasol 2 from next year with a corresponding drop in production from Sasol 1.

AECI's plastics division manager, Mr Mike Sanders, said the pricing policy for low density polyethylene was always fully discussed with plastic converters.

Drops in the ethylene price, or profits made in importing cheaper US or European LDPE, were pooled and used to offset any shortfall in estimates of ethylene costs.

BRIEFS

RIGHTWINGERS VS. NATS--The "Action Save White South Africa" (ASWSA) and the Herstigte Nasionale Party (HNP), who will be sharing a platform in Windhoek later this month may form a united front on other issues--including this week's Human Sciences Research Council (HSRC) report on education. This was the view of the HNP leader, Mr Jaap Marais, in an interview this week after the announcement that Dr Connie Mulder, leader of the National Conservative Party, would be joining Mr Marais in a protest against South West African independence. ASWSA said this week that it was sending Dr Mulder and the leader of the Afrikaner Weerstandsbeweging, Mr Eugene Terre'blanche, to SWA to launch a campaign to "redeem the cause of whites in South West Africa". Mr Marais said that Dr Mulder's appearance on the HNP platform on October 27 followed a call he (Mr Marais) had made at the recent HNP congress in Pretoria. "I said the only was we were approachable was in the case of specific issues where we would join forces with other rightwing groups to oppose the Government." EVANDER SUBSTATION BOMBED--The town clerk of Evander Mr S J van Onselen regards the explosion at the town's main substation as sabotage although police are still investigating. The R60 000 transformer, one of five, blew up at 8,45 pm on Wednesday and threw the whole town into darkness for one and half hours. Although the council has a spare transformer the switch-over took time as security police were flown into the area from Middelburg to start their investigations. Mr Van Onselen has estimated damage to the transformer between R16 000 and R18 000. He could not say how long it would take to repair because of delivery problems. Yesterday experts from Pretoria and Security Police from Middelburg visited the sub-station and continued with their investigations. The town clerk said Evander had been considering tighter security around their key points but had not yet reached a satisfactory method. "We have had countless reports from civil defence but have not yet come up with the most effective method." [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 23 Oct 81 p 2]

SHARP POPULATION RISE--Pretoria will be a one-million people city by the year 2000. Population estimates released by the Prime Minister's office today give the 2000 population for Pretoria as 1 119 900--a 56 percent increase on the 1978 statistics. In the 30 years from 1970 the Pretoria population would have doubled almost, with the largest percentage increases in the coloured and Indian communities. According to greater Pretoria draft guide plan the white population growth in the Pretoria area during the past 30 years had been considerably higher than in most other urban areas in South Africa. The black population figure for the same period is low because the large black settlements all fall outside the Pretoria plan area. Within Pretoria the greatest increases are expected in the eastern and south-eastern residential area, with an exceptional growth in the Wonderboom area. [Text] [Johannesburg THE STAR in English 3 Oct 81 p 5]

KRUGER SALES UP--Krugerrand sales from January to September this year had reached a total of 2 463 902 ounces, which represented a significant improvement over 1980 when this level of sales was only achieved in mid-November, an International Gold Corporation statement said yesterday. The statement said that with expectations of strong sales during the fourth quarter as the busy Christmas buying period approaches, a successful year for the Krugerrand was anticipated. "Sales during the traditionally slow month of September reached 215 799 ounces, compared with the 264 107 ounces sold in September 1980. "However, the latter figure was inflated by the launch at that time of the half, quarter and tenth-ounce Krugerrands. "Sales of the smaller denominations have now exceeded 2,7 million units since their introduction, clearly illustrating that they have amply fulfilled their primary objective of broadening the base of the market by attracting new gold-coin buyers throughout the world. "This perference indicates that all denominations of the world's premier bullion coin have now achieved a high degree of consumer acceptance," it added. DISTRICT SIX STAYS WHITE--Pageview in Johannesburg and the major part of District Six in Cape Town are likely to remain White group areas, according to informed sources. The Cabinet apparently took a final decision over both these controversial areas at its weekly meeting yesterday. However, the office of the Minister of Community Development said a statement on the Government's decision would only be released at the weekend. The Citizen understands that recommendations before the Government ruled Pageview out as an Indian group area apparently because it was not possible to link it with an existing Indian group area. Pageview is a relatively small area and will only suit the housing needs of a very limited number of Indian families, even if it were declared a flat area. The Government has apparently decided to grant an additional group area for Indians near Johannesburg. It is not yet clear where this will be. The President's Council has recommended that part of District Six in Cape Town be returned to the Coloured community. It is now expected that a relatively small portion on the northern side of the presently vacant District Six is likely to be returned to the Coloureds. The major part, much of which has already been sold to White businessmen, will be considered a White group area, which it was declared some time ago. ATLAS AVIATION COURSE--Atlas Aircraft Corporation of South Africa is to provide training for first year apprentice members of the Association of Aviation Maintenance Organisations in Southern Africa from next year. The president of Amosa, Mr S du Plessis, welcomed the agreement signed at Lanseria Airport yesterday. He said apprentices could now receive formal training in basic skills and general knowledge. The agreement meant that the standards of aircraft maintenance would improve still further. The first course will start on January 11, 1982, and will last for 33 weeks. The minimum requirement is Standard X, but Standard VIII will also be acceptable, provided good marks have been obtained in scientific subjects. UNIFIED EXCHANGE RATE--South Africa still intends to move toward a unified exchange rate for the rand and to continue to relax exchange controls, South African Finance Minister, Owen Horwood told analysts here. At present, South Africa has two convertible currencies, the commercial rand and the financial rand, the latter trading at a discount to the commercial rand. Senator Horwood said: "We have been trying to depart from a two-tier exchange rate in an orderly way." He did not give any timetable for the move, but said the most opportune time to move to a unified exchange rate would be when the financial rand's discount narrowed significantly. He also told analysts he believed that in the last months of this year and in the first few months of next year, gold prices would move higher. He cited an increase in industrial demand for gold and the prospect of lower US interest rates to support his view. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 5 Oct 81 p 22]

URBAN BLACKS VERSUS HOMELANDS--Rejection of the Government's homelands policy is particularly strong among urban Blacks and it would be wrong to link them to homelands, according to Professor Deon Geldenhuys of Rand Afrikaans University. In a report on the homelands, Prof Geldenhuys also noted there was no clear official formula to accomodate homelands opposed to independence. "The South African Government has not yet formally and explicitly accepted that at least some of the remaining self-governing homelands would not accept independence. "Consequently, no clear official formula has yet emerged for accommodating them politically as integral parts of the South African state" he says. Prof Geldenhuys said the homelands' economic record, together with urban Blacks' lack of identification with the homelands, were among the major causes of the "failure to reverse the stream of Black migration from the homelands to "White South Africa. "The Government has patently failed to enlist general Black Acceptance of the homelands as an ultimate channel for Black political participation" he said. "Rejection of the homelands policy is particularly strong among urban Blacks. Given their lack of identification with the homelands, it is simply absurd to link Urban blacks politically with the homelands". [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Oct 81 p 10]

POLICE DETAIN TWO STUDENTS--Police have confirmed that two students at Witwatersrand University, Mr Keith Coleman (21) and Mr Clive van Heerden (23), were detained by Security Police at the weekend. They were detained under Section 22 of the General Laws Amendment Act in terms of which they may be detained for 14 days. It is reported that police raided the flat in Yeoville, Johannesburg, shared by the two men at 4.00 am on Saturday. They detained Mr Van Heerden, but Mr Coleman was not in and a message was left asking him to report to John Vorster Square. He was detained when he reported there at 2.00 pm on Sunday. Mr Van Heerden's brother, Mr Auret van Heerden (25), a former Nusas president, is being held under Section 6 of the Terrorism Act. Colonel Hennie Muller, head of the Security Police on the Witwatersrand, confirmed yesterday that Miss Hanchen Koornhof was now being held under Section 6 of the Terrorism Act. Miss Koornhof (26), an English teacher at a Benoni high school, was detained by Security Police on October 12 under Section 22 of the General Laws Amendment Act. Mr Cedric de Beer, with whom she shared a Mayfai flat, is also being detained under Section 6 of the Terrorism Act. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 27 Oct 81 p 3]

RUSTENBERG BASE METAL REFINERY--Matthey Rustenburg Refiners' new base metal refinery is being opened by the chairman of Johnson Matthey of the United Kingdom, Lord Robens. Situated at Rustenburg, the R78-million plant will have an annual capacity of 19 000t nickel, 11 000t copper, 2 500t cobalt sulphate crystals to the highest commercial qualities with considerable saving in operating costs. Matthey Rustenburg Refiners (MRR) was formed in 1972 by Johnson Matthey and Rustenburg Platinum Mines as a jointly-owned company to process mine concentrates and to recycle precious metal residues. BOTHA FIGHTS PRESSURE--The Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, said in Pretoria at the weekend he would not be pressurised by either the Left or Right into implementing change. Addressing the annual dinner of the Constantia Club, he said people were debating over change and development. Some did not want change and others said it was all he wanted. It was not in his character to be pressurised and he would choose his own time to implement change, Mr Botha said. He said where there was a need for change, however, it was part of life and peoples' character to change. Everything changed and that which did not, died. But change must not threaten stability and an orderly existence, because if it did, it was not change but retrogression. Mr Botha appealed for discipline in national life and thought. He mentioned an "uphill struggle" awaiting South Africa in the next year, but did not elaborate. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 27 Oct 81 p 10]

SENIOR OFFICERS PROMOTED--The Chief of the SA Defence Force, General Constand Viljoen, announced in Pretoria yesterday the promotion of three senior officers. Brigadier Hercules Dawid Viljoen has been promoted to major-general and appointed Inspector General of the SADF from December 1. Brigadier Frans Engelbertus Clase van den Berg becomes major-general, and General Officer Commanding Northern Transvaal Command from January 1. Brigadier Hercules Gerhardus du Plessis also becomes major-general, and Chief of Air Staff Logistics from January 1. Brig Viljoen had for the past year been project leader of the programme to rationalise the organisation of the SADF in line with the Government's decision to make the Public Service more effective. Brig Van den Berg, Officer Commanding, Army Combat School, succeeds Major-general PM Hanekom who had been transferred to the staff of the Chief of the SADF. Brig Du Plessis, SAAF Director of Electrotechnical Engineering, succeeds Major-General D J van Niekerk who had been appointed Chief Director, Logistical Support on the staff of the Chief of the SADF. COAL FOR BAVARIA--Bayerwerk Ag, the State-controlled power utility in West Germany's biggest Federal state, Bavaria, plans to start talks in early 1982 on buying coal from South Africa, Bavarian economics Minister Anton Jaumann said yesterday. Speaking to reporters in Munich after a visit to South Africa, Jaumann said Bavaria was highly interested in South African coal, as the price was much lower than that from Germany's own coalfields in the Ruhr district. He noted that South Africa's current annual export quotas of 27-million tons had not been used up fully and Pretoria had decided to boost exports to 80-million tons yearly in the next few years. Jaumann said the South African Government had made it clear that it was willing to conclude long-term contracts to supply coal if "reliable" partners were found. South Africa's interest in selling the fuel was just as great as Bavaria's willingness to buy it, he added. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 27 Oct 81 p 20]

IMMIGRATION GAIN--There was a net increase of immigrants during July, 1981, of 2 628 people. The number of visitors from other countries who arrived in South Africa totalled 52 117. Of this, 36 306 came on holiday or were in transit; 12 902 were here for business reasons; and 2 909 for study. During the same month the number of South Africans who departed on visits to other countries totalled 63 227. Of these 50 903 went on holiday, 11 704 on business and 620 left to study. The number of immigrants totalled 3 479 including 692 people who arrived as visitors at one time or another and have since become approved immigrants. The number of emigrants totalled 851. INCREASED ANTI-SWAPO ACTION--Security forces have intensified their activities against Swapo in Ovambo, the northernmost region of SWA/Namibia, in the wake of the recent military successes against the guerillas and MPLA forces in southern Angola. A SWA Territory Force spokesman disclosed at the weekend that 58 armed guerillas had been killed in Ovambo this month. The spokesman also said that during Operation Protea in late August two senior members of Swapo's military wing, the People's Liberation Army of Namibia, had been killed. They were the acting commander of Plan, whose operational name was "Pongo," and the chief political commissar of Swapo, who remains unidentified. "Security force actions against Swapo in the past few months (including operations Protea and Carnation) have had a favourable influence on the security situation," the spokesman said. "The Swapo terrorists' ability to operate from southern Angola has been cut short and the local population has adopted a more positive attitude towards the security forces." The intensity of Swapo's guerilla offensive had declined since April. Operation Carnation, designed to create a "buffer zone" north of the territory, and Operation Protea, which knocked out Swapo-Fapla bases in southern Angola, had contributed to the decline. "Contacts, landmines and sabotage have declined sharply, but hard intimidation by Swapo of the local population has increased," the spokesman said. Security forces were concentrating their efforts on neutralising this. [Text] [Johannesburg THE STAR in English 19 Oct 81 p 11]

SWAPO LEADERS CAPTURED--Security forces in the operational area have killed 58 Swapo insurgents since the start of the month and captured two top leaders. They are: the acting commander of Swapo's military wing, Jason Mehale, with the operational name of "Pondo", and the chief political commissar, Helao Camilho, with the code name of "Nafidi". "Swapo activity has shown a marked decline since Operation Protea and Operation Carnation," a Defence Force spokesman said in Windhoek yesterday. INCREASED IRON EXPORT ASSISTANCE--Iscor is increasing by 30% the rate of assistance payable to exporters under its steel export promotion scheme for all export shipments undertaken on or after October 1. Iscor's new largesse is seen as yet another move to aid the local steel product manufacturers in their export drive. "Our steel products mark-up is very low, profits are marginal and we labour under the disadvantage of having to compete at exceptionally low prices internationally," says Hymie Flekser, managing director of L Flekser Steel, which exports primarily structural sections to the US, Africa and Indian Ocean islands. "Any aid and incentives from Iscor will only help us get our products to the market at lower and therefore more competitive prices," says Mr Flekser, whose group steel merchandising arm was sold for R6-million last month to Macsteel. "The new incentives will help especially those manufacturers whose steel content in products is very high," explains Eric Samson, chairman of Macsteel, the country's largest privately owned steel merchant, whose turnover reached R250-million this year. Iscor's current rate of assistance of 12,5% for steel products and 4% for tinplate products will now be increased to 16,25% and 5,2% respectively. "Provided the qualifying percentage added value is attained," explains Iscor, "maximum assistance paid for exporting steel products will increase from R100 to R130 a ton of net steel content. "This will be paid when the average net FOB price a ton of exports per consignment exceeds R800. "For fabricated tinplate products, the maximum abount of assistance will be increased from R20 to R26 a ton of net steel content, and will be payable when the average net FOB price a ton of exports per consignment exceeds R500. OPEN BUSINESS AREAS--Assocom is to ask the Government to open White business districts to all races immediately and to phase in the opening of other business areas. Delegates at the 79th Association of Chamber of Commerce conference in Durban also decided today to ask the Government to repeal existing legislation which prohibits the use of Black, Coloured and Asian managers in White-owned businesses in White urban areas. Durban businessman Mr Alec Rogoff today suggested the Government had adopted "stalling tactics" over the phasing out of job reservation. Mr Rogoff said job reservation had been removed in theory, yet businessman could be prosecuted if they appointed Black, Coloured or Indian managers in White areas. The recent South African rugby team in New Zealand had Coloured people in its management, he said. "How can we explain to our staff that their training and advancement is being held back because of their colour?" Mr Rogoff said industries were allowed to appoint Black managers and it was, therefore, discriminatory that retail business should not be allowed to do so. It was difficult to escape the conclusion that the Government while accepting the principle of removing these restrictions, was employing stalling tactics. PHOSPHATE ROCK EXPORT--The Phosphate Development Corporation, Foskor, had entered the export market for phosphate rock with a product of high quality, the managing director of the group, Mr T G J Pistorius said in Phalaborwa today. Pilot consignments have been made through the new minerals loading terminal at Richards Bay. A mobile crusher, claimed to be the biggest in the world, and commissioned in Phalaborwa last week, boosted Foskor's capacity to more than 3.5-million tons of phosphate rock. Mr Pistorius said that Foskor is planning to be a permanent exporter and the possibility of expanding to export about 4-million tons a year, is being investigated. Foskor's ore body at Phalaborwa was low-grade but the corporation was producing the best-quality phosphate rock. On the international market, the quality of phosphate rock is measured in BPL units. The largest part of world production ranges from 66 to 77 BPL. Foskor normally produces a product with a BPL of 80 but has managed to increase this to 86 BPL, Mr Pistorius said. Only about 4-million tons of similar quality is at present available on the world export market. [Text] [Johannesburg THE STAR in English 12 Oct 81 p 23]

PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT BUOYS BINGA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 26 Oct 81 pp 1, 6

[Text] WHEN the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, stood in front of more than 3 000 people on a sandy football field and under the blazing sun in Binga his message was simple, reassuring and to the point:

"We are coming to Binga to see how you are living. We are visiting you as your Government which you elected. Although my party won the elections we are united with ZAPU in the Government.

"We are a government of national unity. Your grievances are of concern to us all regardless of tribal, racial or political affiliations. The well-being of the people of Binga is of as much concern to us as the people in other areas."

The Prime Minister's plane arrived shortly after 10 am and people had gathered at the football field to see him.

But it was not until the afternoon that the Prime Minister emerged from a meeting with district council officials and went to the field to address them. They were still waiting patiently.

Mr Mugabe's message on unity of the political parties may not have been of as much importance to the Binga people as the need to provide their immediate needs. In the words of one villager, what people wanted to know was what the Government was going to do for them in terms of better roads, hospitals, schools and more land.

It was perhaps for this reason that people cheered and clapped hands much more enthusiastically when he said: "We have sat down with your council and have listened to your grievances. It is our concern to improve the living conditions of the people of Binga."

The Binga District Council chairman, Mr Francis Munkombe, said the Prime Minister "listened very eagerly to our problems". One of the grievances of the people of Binga was that the fisheries were still closed to the peasants.

The district education officer, Mr Everest Mtombeni, said he asked for extra secondary schools in the area.

"I recommended to the Prime Minister for 16 primary schools and at least four secondary schools to be opened by next year," he said, noting that there was one secondary school in the district.

The appeal for more land figured prominently wherever the Prime Minister stopped to talk to the district council officials.

According to one council official, land, or lack of it, was still a burning issue. It was at Jambezi that Mr Mugabe appealed to the people to fill resettlement forms. The Prime Minister noted that some people had refused to give their names because they were afraid if they did they would "be taken to some other far away place".

"I assure you we will not put you where you don't want. We will agree where you can stay." The delay in resettling people was being caused by the need to carefully plan in terms of availability of water and where roads and buildings could be put up, he said.

The district council chairman for Wankie, Mr M. Chiyasa, appealed for land, more schools, proper roads and women's training centres in the areas.

"Educational facilities here are inadequate. You are lucky to have visited the Sacred Heart School. Elsewhere we have no schools, they are in ruins. We are also appealing for hospitals," he said.

One council official said he hoped the visit by the Prime Minister would not be the last. "We want to see more Government officials here," he said

This view was echoed by the Prime Minister when he addressed the rally at Sacred Heart. His visit was a prelude to more visits by Government ministers, he said.

Mr Mugabe reiterated his position that people had a right to demand essential services from the Government. The time for begging was over. This was a people's government and whenever they had a complaint they had access right up to the office of the Prime Minister, he said.

In Victoria Falls Mr Mugabe was confronted with problems somewhat different from those of Binga and Jambezi.

In the words of the chairman of the Victoria Falls Town Council, Mr A. G. Ndlovu, progress was difficult because of lingering colonial attitudes.

"Some employers are still following colonial attitudes and this creates division," Mr Ndlovu said.

After the Prime Minister spoke, a number of people carrying banners paraded in front of him. Some of them read: Forward With One-Party State; There Is No Power In The Workers' Committee.

One banner, which seemed to underline Mr Ndlovu's speech expressed lack of confidence in the member-in-charge of the police in the town, the general manager of A-Zambezi Motel and the secretary of the town council.

At Victoria Falls, Kamativi and Wankie, the Prime Minister, while expressing his opposition to strikes did not hesitate to condemn companies for discriminatory practices. In two cases the Prime Minister said an investigation would be launched into the allegations of discrimination.

A key aspect of the complaints from people in the mining areas was poor or inadequate housing.

Mr Mugabe, noting that the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Dr Eddison Zvobgo, could not go into mining premises as they were private property, said the Minister of Mines, Mr Maurice Nyagumbo, would be given the responsibility of examining the housing conditions.

The chairmen of the workers' committees in Wankie and Kamativi, Mr Mtoliki Sibanda and Mr Simon Ncube, both welcomed the Prime Minister's visit as they felt this gave them an opportunity to air their grievances.

Although they did not get the chance to enter into a full discussion with Mr Mugabe they did welcome the suggestion that they should put their ideas on paper for further study.

In a stadium just behind a beerhall that was closed by Dr Zvobgo, the Prime Minister faced a number of questions from the people of Plumtree district.

What was the Government going to do with the elephants that had menaced their crops? How soon would the Government build more schools, more hospitals, provide water facilities, provide more land for grazing? Above all, what was the Government going to do about the commercial farmers, mostly white, who impounded cattle that strayed on to their farms?

Mr Mugabe replied that people must co-operate with their elected district councillors, must avoid letting their cattle stray on to commercial farms and must fill resettlement forms.

To a number of people the Prime Minister's visit was greeted with some relief. One council official said the presence of the Prime Minister somehow gave people hope that their grievances would be listened to at the highest level.

Mr Mugabe's tour could, in the words of one observer in Plumtree, be described as successful because it gave him the opportunity to see for himself developmental problems in remote areas. It also gave the people, many of whom had never seen him before, a chance to meet, chat and shake hands with the leader of the Government.

The Lighter Side of Mugabe's Tour

THE Prime Minister's meet-the-people tour had its humorous moments. Undoubtedly this aspect of the tour served to portray Mr Mugabe as just another human being rather than a stone-cold boss who sat in an inaccessible ivory tower in Salisbury.

In Binga, after people had been waiting in the sun for some time, the Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office, Mr Emmerson Munangagwa, had the unenviable task of keeping them in good humour.

Mr Munangagwa, who speaks at least five languages, kept on changing from one language to another. But when he switched to Bemba, a language spoken in Zambia's Copperbelt Province, his audience looked at him with surprise. Noting the mood, he mumbled, "sorry, wrong language", before switching to Tonga amidst roars of laughter.

After a choir had sung, Mr Munangagwa asked: "Did they sing well?" The crowds roared "Yes". He thought for a moment and later said: "No, they did not sing well." This created surprised looks, even from the Prime Minister.

Then he said: "You see, I am the one who invited them to sing, so I am the one who did well, not them." There was spontaneous laughter.

At another rally the Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Richard Hove, who was introducing the ministers, said of Mr Munangagwa: "This man travels by day and by night. He is a spook. What he does and where he goes I really don't know," he said, doing an old Chubby Checker twist on the sand to the delight of the audience.

At Jambezi, when Mr Mugabe stood up to speak, people said: "We don't understand Shona." Then he said: "IsiShona kalisizwi? Manje mina isiNdebele ngiyakiliza." An interpreter was found and the Prime Minister continued to speak in Shona.

But after he had spoken and before the interpreter could speak the crowd exploded into applause.

At Kamativi the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, after he had been introduced by Mr Hove, stood up and said: "Forward with unity." The crowds roared "forward". But when he shouted: "Forward with taxes", the crowd replied "forward" after some hesitation and in very restrained voices.

Mr Mugabe's speeches sometimes created a light-hearted atmosphere. For example, at one time he was emphasising that the Zimbabwe Government was concerned with the welfare of all Zimbabweans, regardless of their political affiliation.

"When we build a school Muzorewa's children will have access to it. When we build a hospital even Sithole's children will have access to it.

"When we build a road even Smith will be able to drive along it," he said amidst cheers and applause.

It was very typical to see the Prime Minister shake hands with a variety of people, share jokes and burst into laughter. On a number of occasions he actually went forward to the cheering crowds to shake hands with them.

MUGABE PROMISES TO PUNISH DISSIDENTS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 26 Oct 81 pp 1, 10

[Text] THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said yesterday the Government will deal ruthlessly with dissidents.

Addressing a rally at Pelendaba stadium in Gwanda, Mr Mugabe said the Government had built one national army. There was no longer any ZIPRA or ZANLA, but a national army made up of both former combatants and former Rhodesian forces.

He asked: "What do those people who do not want unity want?"

He warned dissidents: "I have got the hammers to knock off their heads. These dissidents should know that I am all out to crush them.

"If it means fist fighting, I know how to use my fists. If it is knobkerries, I also know how to use them. And if it comes to guns, I have too many of them.

"We now have one national army, one Government and one Prime Minister . . . not two," he said.

Mr Mugabe reiterated his call for unity and called on the people to work together with the Government.

He said the Government was going to build more schools in Gwanda, but asked the people to make the bricks and leave the Government to provide things like window frames and roofing.

The Government was aware of the people's problems, he said, and was doing everything it could to better the lives of the people.

"There must be a new lifestyle for the people of this country. The Government you elected does not select who to serve and who not to.

"No region is superior to any other region, and if you feel that such a thing is happening, you must report this to the Government."

Mr Mugabe said the Government would like all children to go to school irrespective of whether a child's parents belonged to ZAPU or ZANU or even to Bishop Muzorewa.

He promised workers that new wages should be published next month. The minimum wage was only a starting point and there was no reason why people should strike, because their wishes were also the Government's wishes, and the Government was aware of their problems.

PRIME MINISTER CALLS FOR RECONCILIATION

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 26 Oct 81 p 10

[Editorial: "Reconciliation"]

[Text]

ON March 4 1980, following a massive victory in the elections held under the terms of the Lancaster House Agreement, the Prime Minister called for reconciliation between the opposing sides in the liberation war, which that agreement had ended. It was a gesture which took most of his enemies by surprise. And some of them, like the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole, Bishop Abel Muzorewa and Ian Smith, had even expressed fears that if Mr Mugabe won the elections, they would be locked up.

Again on April 17, on the eve of independence, he restated this theme in terms which could leave no doubt that the new Government was determined that this would remain a major cornerstone of its domestic policy.

And during his meet-the-people tour of Matabeleland north and south provinces which ends today, he has again said his Government would continue to pursue a policy of reconciliation. "The Government will not at all negate the sacred policy of reconciliation," he said.

Who are the enemies of the policy of reconciliation that the Prime Minister has to continue to preach about? Of course, not all people have accepted or embraced the policy of reconciliation. At the last elections, there were eight African political parties that brought about the present Government. Some of them, having lost badly have accepted and come to terms with the fact that the electorate doesn't need them. Then there are those like Mr Sithole who, even having failed to raise one seat in Parliament, still behave as if they have a political base in the country. Judging by the tone of his statement at the weekend, it can be argued that Mr Sithole still thinks there will be a second coming.

Of course, there are other people who have benefited more from the policy of reconciliation. Bishop Muzorewa and his counterpart, Ian Smith, know it very well that had it not been for this policy they would have long been in jail. Yet both continue to behave as if they were an alternative Government.

In our view those who try to confuse the people by wild criticism designed to undermine the Government and those that try to hold the country to ransom as in the case of nurses and teachers are enemies of reconciliation.

Without the policy of reconciliation, we would be fighting each other, ZANU (PF) and ZAPU would be at each other's throat, black and white would be endless enemies, smaller parties such as UANC and ZANU (Sithole) would have long been banned. And without this policy there would be no restoration of peace, integration of the three previously warring armies, no reconstruction of the war-damaged infrastructure, no resettlement and rehabilitation and, above all, no correction of the racial imbalance in the Civil Service.

MINISTER OF MINES DENIES GOVERNMENT TAKEOVER PLANS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 26 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

THE Government does not intend to take over the Chamber of Mines, the Minister of Mines, Mr Maurice Nyagumbo, said last night.

The Chamber of Mines belonged to the individual mining companies and represented the industry, he said.

The Government would, however, definitely use the chamber's expertise in marketing and training, said Mr Nyagumbo, answering questions on the television panel programme, The Nation.

He said the parastatal minerals marketing board was planned to bring about stability in the marketing of Zimbabwe's minerals by finding suitable buyers.

"We will not discriminate, but will be open to all potential buyers of our minerals," the minister said.

STOCKPILED

He compared the proposed situation with the existing one in which multinational companies had established their own external markets "which cannot be disclosed to the State".

"We have since discovered that they have stockpiled minerals outside this country, which I think is unacceptable to the Government."

Asked about criticism that the envisaged marketing board would result in the loss of specialised selling techniques established over many years, Mr Nyagumbo said it was not intended to do away with the expertise of the big companies, but to encourage them to co-operate with the new system.

"We will learn from them, but there will be no preference for any particular market. That is what we are saying," stated the minister.

SLUMP

Mr Nyagumbo pointed out that the country could expect a 10 percent drop in mineral production and marketing because of a slump in world prices and difficulties with transport.

He felt that in two or three months the railways would have recovered and, coupled with higher world copper prices, the position would improve.

Asked about the prospects of specialist training, Mr Nyagumbo said the Chamber of Mines school of mining in Bulawayo was currently training a number of geologists.

Twelve geologists and mining surveyors were training at the school and several others were being taught in "friendly countries" such as Romania and Yugoslavia.

The minister said that it was hoped within a year or so to provide a faculty of engineering and metallurgy at Salisbury university.

Mr Nyagumbo quashed a rumour that oil prospecting in the Chiredzi, Chipinga and Triangle districts was yielding positive results.

"That is not true. According to our geologists, our oldest rock formations indicate that there is no chance of finding any oil at all."

The minister said that in spite of the depressed state of the mining industry, he felt that large mining concerns would want to absorb workers being repatriated from South African mines.

The minister cited two mines which, he said, had made a tangible and meaningful effort to eradicate racial discrimination.

Rio Tinto's Empress nickel mine near Gatooma and How Mine, owned by Lonrho, south of Bulawayo, had upgraded black conditions so they had the same type of housing and shared the same sporting facilities.

Small miners, because of their difficult working conditions, had, in many instances, not made this sort of progress, said Mr Nyagumbo.

BRIEFS

PADIS IMPACT--A new era in development planning has opened for Africa, the director of the Pan African Documentation and Information System, Dr Julien Quirino-Lanhounmey, said in Salisbury on Friday. Closing the first intergovernmental meeting of African computer, documentation and information scientists he said the conference would help streamline the haphazard approach to handling and transferring information on the continent. "This meeting symbolises the opening of a new era in the field of information and documentation to meet the ever-growing challenges of development planning... and the increasing attention the African states are giving to planned development." The five days of discussion would help governments, through their technicians, acquire a clearer picture of the accomplishments and future of PADIS, he said. TREATY HERALDS NEW TRADE UNITY IN AFRICA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Nov 81 p 6

[Text]

NAIROBI.

EIGHTEEN nations ranging from Ethiopia in the north to Lesotho in the south will soon take a major step towards the establishment of a Southern and East Africa Common Market encompassing more than 120 million people.

On December 21 in Lusaka heads of state of the 18 nations, which are as diverse politically as they are geographically, are to sign a treaty setting up a preferential trade area.

The draft treaty was finalised at a conference of ministers of finance, trade and economic planning in Addis Ababa this month.

The agreement provides for co-operation in the areas of industry, agriculture, transport and communications.

It will also remove customs barriers and facilitate transit trade.

The preferential trade area is being formed under the auspices of the Economic Commission for Africa.

Southern African nations included so far are Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Swaziland, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

As an indication of the success of moves made so far, diplomats point to the inclusion of Ethiopia and Somalia which have let economics override the political differences that boiled over into full-scale war in 1977/78.

VOLATILE

The third nation from the volatile Horn of Africa to be included is Djibouti.

The other countries involved are Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, the Seychelles, the Comoros, Mauritius and the Republic of Malagasy.

A spokesman for the 18 said in Addis Ababa he saw them eventually evolving into a regional common market.

"If we can accomplish that we will dramatically change for the better the living conditions of all our people."

The spokesman said the region's economic potential was enormous with vast supplies of base metals and other raw materials. Energy potential was provided by reserves of oil, coal and uranium and by hydro-electricity and unlimited solar energy.

The spokesman pointed out that the region was already a major supplier of products such as meat, skins, fish, coffee, tea, sugar, spices, vegetables, seeds and oils, cotton tobacco, timber, glassware and cloth.

"This treaty is full of promise."

The spokesman said Namibia would be welcome to join the group as soon as it became independent.

South Africa could not be included.

Western observers are highly optimistic about the treaty and say it may indirectly provide a solution to the dispute over who gets what out of the assets of the old East African Community of Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda, which fell apart in 1977 amid charges over each country's responsibility for debts.

U.S. ADMINISTRATION ATTACKED ON REPEAL OF CLARK AMENDMENT

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 8 Oct 81 p 12

[Article by H. Matos]

[Text] In bringing about repeal of the Clark Amendment, Ronald Reagan has once again proved his complicity with those who are considered enemies of Africa.

This maneuver is a continuation of the destabilization plans outlined by the U.S. administration to "bring down" the increasingly strong liberation movement in the south of the African continent. Incidentally, it is no surprise that the U.S. executive is taking this direction regarding the People's Republic of Angola, the secure rearguard of the revolutionary forces struggling against the odious system of apartheid in Namibia and South Africa.

Seeing the impossibility of fully implementing the project to create a "buffer zone" (which would take in Cunene, Kuando-Kubango and Huila Provinces), thanks to the fighting spirit of our young FAPLA [Armed Forces for the Popular Liberation of Angola], international imperialism, led by the United States, has decided to legalize its support to the betrayers of the Angolan people.

Reagan's wish, now fulfilled, is not a new one. During the electoral campaign that brought him to power in the United States, he promised the resurrection of the ghosts (here read Angolan puppets) under the protection of the Pretorian hoodlums. Once officially installed in the White House, Reagan began to pressure the U.S. Congress to repeal the famous "Clark Amendment," a goal recently achieved with the support of his Republican cohorts in the Senate.

As is known, the Clark Amendment was sponsored by U.S. Democratic Senator Dick Clark in 1976 to prohibit the United States from providing material and financial aid to counterrevolutionary groups that survived with Pretoria's help. During the administration of James Carter, who preceded Ronald Reagan in the presidency, all kinds of pressure were applied by U.S. congressmen, but the Democrats always stood up to these tactics.

The repeal of the Clark Amendment is an act hostile to all Africa. In this way, the United States seeks to maintain a climate of tension in the southern part of the African continent, where violence is stirring again as South Africa stubbornly resists a peaceful resolution of the Namibian problem.

With Reagan's accession to office, the anachronistic Pretoria regime went from partner to secure ally, according to Washington. The secret meeting last month in Zurich (Switzerland) between Chester Crocker and a racist South African delegation, led by Brand Fourie, and the readmission of the apartheid nation to the World Medical Association, thanks to the U.S. vote, are testimony to the intentions of the Reagan administration against independent Africa.

SOUTH AFRICA SEEN COUNTING ON FLAGGING WORLD INTEREST

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 9 Oct 81 p 1

[Editorial: "Escalation of Savagery"]

[Text] We once predicted that the South African racists would attempt to take advantage of the "media fatigue" that overtakes wide segments of world opinion when a certain event drags on beyond the limits of active interest or immediate security concerns.

The strong international reaction severely condemning the South African aggression against the sovereign territory of the People's Republic of Angola at first took the racists by surprise. Unable to respond to the criticism, the Pretorian authorities took refuge in guilty silence while their troops established themselves on Angolan territory, razing villages, destroying the people's economic and social goods and massacring peaceful settlements.

Then they used the pretext of the death and capture of some Soviet internationalists to launch a hysterical propaganda campaign, seeking to divert world attention from the basic issue: the illegality and brutality of the attack on and occupation of an independent African country by the odious apartheid regime.

This was followed by a feigned withdrawal from Angolan territory, which was simply the pullback of some units assigned to transport various vehicles and equipment vital to Angola's economic and social reconstruction into occupied Namibia, which demonstrates the Machiavellian and destabilizing intent of the South African racists and fascists.

On the international level, despite the demonstration of active solidarity--a little from every quarter of the globe--with the Angolan people, attention came to focus basically on the discussions of the Contact Group (United States, France, FRG, Great Britain and Canada) on the future of Namibia and the practical means to bring about implementation of UN Resolution 435/78.

In yet another of their frequent and shameless maneuvers, the South Africans made grand statements of principle, declaring themselves ready and willing to accept the standards already defined and internationally adopted for Namibia's rise to independence as quickly as possible and without upheaval.

The brutal and undeniable truth is once again visible to all. Disregarding their highflown declarations and once again scorning the sovereignty of nations and the international community, the racists reoccupied the important highway links of Xangongo and Mongua; they are attempting to create false arguments to consolidate certain positions in other areas of Cunene and pursuing their action of death and destruction, expanding the occupied areas in southern Africa.

The use of armored vehicles and patrol cars, or helicopter-borne and cavalry troops (always with the protection of the racist air force); the increased violations of the air space over Mocamedes Province (Baia dos Tigres/Espinheira/Virei); greater air penetration well inside Huila Province (Mulondo); and, above all, the simultaneous concentration of mixed South African and Angolan puppet forces at Enana base, in illegally occupied Namibia; all these confirm predictions that the South African racists intend to Balkanize Angolan territory, to install their lackeys in an extensive strip that corresponds substantially to the "demilitarized zone" provided in UN Resolution 435/78.

Their intentions are obvious; to force the participation of the Angolan puppets as a "legitimate party" to the upcoming discussions on Namibian independence and to create a buffer zone which, in Pretoria's view, will make it difficult or even impossible for SWAPO to conduct liberation actions on Namibian territory.

Once again, the ignorance and insensitivity of the apartheid authorities will make it difficult for them to understand the reason for their continuing failures. The war in Namibia is not an exported war of the neighboring territories. It is a struggle with deep roots in Namibia itself, in the hearts of a people weary of the humiliation, despotism and barbarism of apartheid, of a people aspiring to a dignified and honorable admission into the world community of independent nations, in which South Africa continues to be a parish, the object of the disapproval and disgust of all men who love freedom, justice, peace and social progress.

The struggle continues!

Victory is certain!

OFFICIAL REVIEWS CZECH ASSISTANCE, COOPERATION

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 11 Oct 81 p 11

[Interview with Milos Vessel, Czechoslovak ambassador to the People's Republic of Angola, by J. Miranda, date and place not given]

[Excerpts] Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, president of the republic and party and commander-in-chief of the armed forces, yesterday began an official visit of friendship to the Socialist Republic of Czechoslovakia, where he will meet with President Gustav Husak and other high officials of the government and Communist Party of Czechoslovakia.

Meanwhile, Milos Vessel, ambassador of the Socialist Republic of Czechoslovakia to the People's Republic of Angola [RPA], granted an extensive interview to JORNAL DE ANGOLA, in which he reported on aspects of his country's social and economic development and the Angolan-Czechoslovak friendship and cooperation accords. Following is the text of the interview.

Question: What level of cooperation does Czechoslovakia maintain with the RPA? In which sector of the economy are most of the Czechoslovak cooperants working?

Answer: Czechoslovakia has a long-range cooperation program of technical assistance to Angola. Since the beginning of 1978, an average of 35 technicians/cooperants have been working in the paper and cellulose industry, in the CCPA enterprise of Alto Catumbela. In the energy sector, a group of Czechoslovak technicians has been working since 1979 on construction of the high-voltage line in Benguela Province.

In 1980, technical assistance was also increased in the health field. A team of 10 to 12 physicians and paramedics is working in Benguela Province.

Of equally great importance to the RPA was the participation of 12 veterinarians who were part of the CEMA group in the area of internationalist technical assistance in 1979 and 1980.

For the future, as provided in the Protocol of the Second Session of the Angolan-Czechoslovak Joint Commission, Czechoslovakia plans to increase the number of cooperants in the RPA. There will be another team of 18 physicians for the Waco-Kungo hospital, technicians for forest surveys and charcoal production and more cooperants in the energy field. We expect that in 1981/1982 there will be about 100 Czechoslovak cooperants in the RPA.

Question: Could you name some more salient aspects of the economic and trade relations between the RPA and Czechoslovakia?

Answer: Czechoslovakia's major export activity in the RPA has been based on large shipments of TATRA trucks, which have performed well, especially on difficult terrain. To improve the technical assistance services, in addition to a service station for these trucks, a new and modern technical assistance workshop will go into operation soon in Lobito.

Czechoslovakia is also one of the major suppliers of Zetor and Skoda tractors, for which we are providing broad technical assistance, and a group of our skilled mechanics is permanently stationed here.

The Czechoslovak Foreign Trade Enterprise is exporting mainly footwear, malt, powdered milk and school and office supplies.

However, we are not supplying enough mechanical and technical equipment, tools, instruments and medical equipment, in which Czechoslovakia has strong production potential and exports throughout the world.

The Czechoslovak machine industry is interested in investing in construction of several needed complexes in the RPA, such as breweries, clothing and shoe factories and fabric mills. In the energy field, in addition to supplying energy equipment, it would also like to build factories for production of materials needed for the development of the power industry.

Question: What are the basic aspects of trade relations between Czechoslovakia and other African countries?

Answer: The Socialist Republic of Czechoslovakia currently has trade relations with over 100 developing countries. We have accords with 58 countries, but our basic trade is concentrated in a limited circle of countries. In Czechoslovakia's overall trade with developing countries, the developing African countries account for 26 percent of our exports. Of these African countries, exports are strongly concentrated in a few countries, such as Libya, Nigeria and Algeria. With the developing African countries as a whole, our trade is insignificant. Since these are small countries with low population density, they have a limited market and in many cases their economy is still strongly influenced by the former parent country. Recently the RPA joined the countries in which Czechoslvak exports have been concentrated and has broadened trade relations with us. Most of our exports consist of machinery and equipment (they account for 50 percent or more of our exports, for example, to Algeria, Morocco, Nigeria and Libya).

Czechoslovak imports from African countries oscillate considerably. Most of the imports are raw materials, such as iron ore, nonferrous metals, copper, asbestos, phosphate, fertilizer, cotton, rubber, leather and such agricultural products as coffee, cocoa beans, rice, lemons, etc. These products account for over 90 percent of the total value of our imports.

REPORT ON DOS SANTOS VISIT TO CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 10 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpt] Prague, 9 Oct (ANGOP)--A definition of the areas and terms of bilateral cooperation between the People's Republic of Angola and the Socialist Republic of Czechoslovakia is the main topic in the official talks that began yesterday afternoon in Prague between the party and government delegations of the two countries.

The talks are part of the official and friendship visit that comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, chairman of the MPLA-Labor Party and president of the People's Republic of Angola, began today in Czechoslovakia at the invitation of that state's party and government. Its main purpose is the strengthening of cooperation between the two countries, peoples, governments, and parties for their multifaceted and mutual progress.

That progress is aspired to by both peoples, and its development will have to be based on mutually advantageous cooperation. The two countries, which have chosen the path of noncapitalist development, will certainly find several fields in which they will be able to cooperate for the progress of their peoples. Angola is a young country that still faces enormous internal difficulties. Because of that, it has every need to unite with the countries of the world and particularly those of the socialist community. In that context, Czechoslovakia, which is already in a stage of building advanced socialism, will be able to give Angola considerable help in taking suitable advantage of its economic potentialities so as to develop more rapidly.

The agreements on telecommunications and information, which were signed today between the ANGOLAN PRESS AGENCY (ANGOP), People's Television of Angola, and the corresponding organizations in Czechoslovakia, are more than adequate proof that the two countries are prepared to cooperate in several areas and may lead to positive results. The agreements signed in the field of journalism will represent a big step in the development of Angola's news services in the struggle to break the news monopoly held by the international agencies, which frequently distort the news from underdeveloped countries. The document provides for the exchange of programs and information and the training of Angolan cadres.

DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED IN CAHAMA RECONSTRUCTION

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 7 Oct 81 p 9

[Article by Achille Lolo]

[Excerpts] Cahama, 1 Oct--We arrived back in the municipality of Cahama in the company of Maj Ary da Costa, Cunene provincial commissioner, and the commission that he organizes and heads. The reason for this working visit was the need to rebuild that municipality as soon as possible, since the inhabitants fleeing from southern Cunene Province are continuing to arrive in Cahama. As a result, the municipality must be transformed as quickly as possible into the first assistance center for the refugees, from where they will then be sent on to the special locations that are already in operation for the purpose in Huila Province.

Maj Ary da Costa had already visited the municipality of Cahama during his trip to Xangongo and Ondjiva. Following that visit, life in Cahama began to take shape in a properly organized direction. We noted that since we had last left that municipality on 10 September, some improvements had already taken place--for example, the electricity was working, the Ministry of Home Trade's warehouses and their respective stores were being supplied again, debris had been removed from the hospital and its sections that had not been totally destroyed had been reactivated, the gasoline station was operating, and there were regular supplies of foodstuffs from Lubango.

Provincial Commissioner Maj Ary da Costa said that "we must rebuild the town in the municipality of Cahama, even though we are at war and even though the South African racists are still on the other side of the town of Xangongo along the Cunene River, from where they are threatening us with new military operations."

Discussing the situation of the inhabitants, Maj Ary da Costa emphasized that "the municipality of Cahama used to have a good 10,740 inhabitants. But now, because of the bombings by the South African Air Force, which is continuing its reconnaissance flights, the people have abandoned their villages to take refuge in the forest, where they have built improvised huts. The result is that most of the inhabitants, after losing their livestock--which scattered in the forest during the bombings--are now afraid to return to their former homes even to collect a few necessary items--especially blankets and food. These people have suffered a very great psychological shock, a fact which--especially in the near future--is going to create many problems for us in the field of health, because this situation has considerably altered the life of the inhabitants and caused great social and hygienic damage. In addition, we have refugees here from the areas south of the Cunene River (Xangongo, Cuamato, Catequero, Humbe, Kalueque, Chiulo, Chitado, and so on) who are coming to Cahama. Some stay here and build their huts, while others go on toward Lubango or Chileia. That is why we are going to expand the hospital, which was damaged, and then build another one so that the great mass of people scattered through the forest in the municipality of Cahama can have all the medical assistance they need--especially the children, who are the chief victims and who suffer the consequences of the racist invasion. And I want to emphasize that our children are now suffering very much."

Maj Ary da Costa continued: "My associates in the Cunene Provincial Commissariat are surveying the damage done by the racist air force's bombing raids, taking note of the buildings that were destroyed and, especially, establishing a timetable for reconstruction. In addition, here in Cahama we will put up new buildings to replace those that were totally destroyed so that life and work activities can be resumed as soon as possible. This applies especially to the commune's administrative structures, which must be made ready for insuring continuation of this reconstruction project."

Home Trade Operations

The activity of the Ministry of Home Trade's local structure has proved to be quite difficult. Until 10 days ago, it supplied the inhabitants through itinerant selling at the edge of the forest. Actually, that was an emergency measure begun immediately after the bombing on 23 August, when the town of Cahama was destroyed.

Herculano, the Ministry of Home Trade's provincial representative, told us: "But now we have decided that our structures should operate more rationally. To that end, we have already issued orders to fix up the Ministry of Home Trade's two stores in this town, which were partially damaged, and we have also put our warehouses in order so that once the conditions for a resumption of normal life in the town have been created, the people will find their stores already prepared to serve them.

"Actually, we are still engaged in itinerant selling, but that is an emergency solution caused by the war situation--a situation that is becoming more burdensome due to the lack of transportation and, often, the absence of our workers, who are afraid when the enemy planes make their morning reconnaissance flights and do not show up for work. The result is that supplying the inhabitants in the forest through itinerant sellers becomes quite complicated."

Herculano said: "The day before yesterday, for example, four South African planes made reconnaissance flights over the municipality of Cahama for nearly 25 minutes. That naturally frightened the inhabitants and our workers, who did not show up at their assigned spots to take supplies to the forest. Because when the foreigners show up in their airplanes, no one can guess whether they are here to reconnoiter or drop bombs. They have dropped so many bombs and the destruction is so widespread that when the people hear the sound of the planes, they stay in the shelters they have in the forest. But we want to start our structures operating permanently in the town of Cahama, and so we will do so, because the people are in special need of blankets, milk for the children, sugar, oil, canned goods, biscuits, dried fish, cornmeal, and clothing. In that way, all the people who have taken refuge in the forest will know that we are here with our stores open and ready to serve them, since we have no shortage of any products, and they will begin to come into town. That will enable all the 13,740 inhabitants, plus the many refugees, to benefit from the goods we have, since it has not been possible, with itinerant sales, to reach all the localities where the people have taken refuge."

Economic and Social Consequences of Racist Invasion

The steadfastness of the inhabitants is due to the intense sensitizing of the party structures, which have a great dynamizing personality in Sinedima, member of the Central Committee, the mobilization carried on by the mass organizations, and the political and social coordination of the Cunene Commissariat. As a consequence, South African demagoguery and the opportunistic racial phraseology of the UNITA puppets have had no results or success at all. In fact, all the inhabitants so far have been fleeing from places in Cunene occupied by soldiers from the racist regime of Pretoria and attempting to join the inhabitants protected by FAPLA [People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola] or those where the MPLA-Labor Party's structures are functioning.

Cunene Province once had about 250,000 inhabitants or more, half of whom are still in the forest. They are refusing to return to the places where the foreigners from Pretoria have passed through or are still to be found. On the other hand, thousands of refugees have passed through the area of Cahama alone over the past 10 days. They arrive in that destroyed municipality with the marks of hunger, thirst, early signs of advanced dehydration, and diseases contracted in the forest because of eating only what little they could take with them and what they could find in the savanna, which is not abundant in forest foods and fruit, as the northern forest is. The children who survive the trip through the forest reach the refugee center in Chibia with bronchial infections because of the lack of covering and with other respiratory diseases due to having slept too long in the open with no protection against the cold.

In short, the inhabitants in Cunene Province have preferred to flee into the forest and suffer the consequences of that difficult trip on foot rather than surrender or accept the presence of South Africans on their land.

Many families have become separated. There are a great number of orphans. Those people have lost everything: houses, property, clothing, and, above all, the livestock that once constituted one of Cunene Province's greatest economic resources. And it is no accident that the foreigners are now taking the livestock to Namibia or, when they cannot move the herds of cattle, scattering them in the forest, thus hampering an easy recovery in the future.

PORTO AMBOIM FUEL STORAGE--ANGOP--A fuel storage farm with a capacity of 11,600 cubic meters of fuel will be built in the municipality of Porto Amboim within 18 months. It will supply all of Kwanza-Sul Province. The site for the petroleum complex was turned over to SONANGOL [National Fuel Company of Angola] by Armando Ndembo, provincial commissioner of Kwanza-Sul, at a ceremony marking the start of work on the project, which will be the responsibility of SONANGOL and the Soviet petroleum company, TSVET METPROMEXPORT. The facility will receive its supplies by sea, and a feasibility study concerning supplies is now underway, according to Luis Silva (Tita), senior technician at SONANGOL. He regards the undertaking as being of vital importance to the province's socioeconomic development. It should be stressed, however, that the Soviet crew is already on the scene, along with some material and equipment. Building the storage farm in that area is part of a gigantic plan by SONANGOL for supplying the entire country with fuel. Known as the major storage plan, its implementation began at the start of this year. Currently under construction in Malanje is a fuel storage farm that will have a capacity of 6,600 cubic meters. Similar projects in Lubango, Lucata (Kwanza-Norte), Huambo, Lobito, Lwena, Lucapa, and Menongue are also scheduled to begin this year. In addition to the Soviets, the Petroleum Company of Romania (ROMEPETROL) is also participating in the project. [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 6 Oct 81 p 1] 11798

SPOKESMAN CLAIMS MOKHEHLE IS SABC 'POLITICAL TOOL'

Maseru LESOTHO WEEKLY in English 16 Oct 81 p 2

[Text]

A GOVERNMENT Spokesman says the latest statements by Ntsu Mokhehle in South African mass media, notably the South African Broadcasting Corporation (SABC), further comfirm that he is being used as a political tool in the destabilization policy of hat country.

The SABC has reported Mr. Mokhehle as claiming responsibility for the mortar attacks on the paramiliary Force Base in Maseru and another attack at a road works depot at Joel's Drift in Butha-Buthe, in retaliation for the death of Mr. Edgar Motuba, Editor of a Lesotho Church newspaper.

The Spokesman said all these attacks, which took place within a week, were launched from South African territory led to Lesotho's protest to South Africa and intention to take the case to the Security Council of the United Nations. He said even recent press interviews given by Mokhehle had been on South African soil in Ficksburg, inspite of the fact that he is said to be banned in that country.

Commenting on the claim that Mokhehle spoke to the SABC by telephone as a guest of a Black State hostile to South Africa, the Spokesman said this was a naive attempt to hide his presence in South Africa.

The Spokesman said it will be recalled that it was Lesotho that disclosed that Mokhehle was being harboured in Soweto, Johannesburg. After this disclosure, the South African Press published a number of interviews with him carried out on South African soil. The Spokesman added that now that his presence in that country has been positively established, the South African authorities are making frantic claims to locate him elsewhere.

"It was not surprising that South Arica is making these attempts, in the light of Lesotho's intention to place its case before the Security Council. Mokhehle can only be a guest in the satellite South African homelands or a guest of other political puppets like him being used to destabilize independent African States," the Spokesman said.

He said the African States were clear about South Africa's destabilization activities in Lesotho, and in the last OAU Summit they condemned these activities.

The Spokesman said, the claim that Mokhehle was in a Black State contrasts sharply with his earlier press statements that he was in Lesotho and moving freely into the Republic of South Africa. He remarked that it was surprising that while South Africa claims that Mokhehle is in an independent country as a guest, none of the reports about him have been carried out by the mass media of that country, instead all his interviews have been conducted by South African journalists in the Republic.

He concluded by saying, the claim by Mokhehle that the recent attacks on Lesotho were in retaliation for Mr. Motuba's death, can only add a new and interesting dimension to Mr. Motuba's death by associating him with the so-called Lesotho Liberation Army (LLA).

KOLISANG ATTACKS HIS LEADER FOR CREATING LLA

Maseru LESOTHO WEEKLY in English 16 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

THE Secretary-General of one of the three factions of the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP), Mr. G. M. Kolisang, has attacked his leader, Mr. Ntsu Mokhehle for creating the Lesotho Liberation Army (L L A) which he said was "outside the Constitution of the party."

Reacting to the accusations which had been levelled against him and other members of the BCP by Mokhehle in pamphlets which were found scattered in some parts of Lesotho, Mr. Kolisang said the LLA had been formed neither in accordance with the BCP Constitution of the party's annual conference. He said that for as long as he supported and abided by the BCP constitution, he could not sanction the formation of the LLA.

He stated that he had in the past advised Mr. Mokhehle against the use of force as that would set back the progress of the party by several years. Mr. Kolisang also criticized Mokhehle for having left Lesotho, leaving his followers by themselves and Mokhehle still owed an explanation as to why he had left Lesotho.

Mr. Kolisang was last year nominated by Ntsu Mokhehle as Secretary-General of his faction of the BCP, delivered his attack in the Leselinyana la Lesotho newspaper.

COL BORTEH ASKS SECURITY PERSONNEL TO SEEK SECURITY IMPROVEMENTS

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 23 Oct 81 p 6

[Text] The Co-Chairman of the PRC Committee on National Security, Col. Larry Borteh, has said that the Liberian Revolution would be meaningless if the lives and properties of citizens and foreign residents were left "exposed to danger".

He said it was therefore important that members of the Joint Security Forces meet periodically to review and exchange ideas to improve the security network in the country.

Col. Borteh, who was speaking Tuesday at a meeting with members of the Joint Security Forces at the Capitol Building here called on the security personnel to search for better ways to improve the security system of the country.

LABOR UNION FEDERATION CONDEMNS BANNING OF BRANCHES

Monrovia DAILY OBSERVER in English 13 Oct 81 p 10

[Article by Kanty Roberts]

[Text]

The Liberia Federation of Labour Unions and its affiliates, including plantation organizations, have condemned the banning of the Buchanan and Yekepa branches of the Lamco Mine Workers Union by the Ministry of Labour, following a strike at the Buchanan plant last week

The condemnation, contained in a statement issued by the Secretary General of the Liberia Federation of Labour Unions, Mr. Amos Gray, at the end of a 4-day workers education seminar held at the Ducor Hotel, noted that it is only through a court of law that unions can be abrogated.

As such, it is illegal and a violation of the Labour Laws of Liberia for the Ministry of Labour, management or government to ban a union.

The statement from the LFLU also criticized Lamco for what it called the multinational company's failure to honor a sacred contractual obligation to pay increments to workers agreed upon a year ago.

Last week the workers at the Buchanan branch of Lamco went on a strike, following the refusal of Lamco to adhere to a recent decision taken by the Vice Head of State J. Nicholas Podier, calling for the management to meet workers' demand for six percent retroactive pay beginning January 1980 to August 1981.

The Lamco management only paid to the workers wages for eight months, from January 1981 to August 1981, 12 months short of the agreed 20 months.

On the issue of the Head of State Doe's dismissal of the workers who number 209, the LFLU appealed to the government to reconsider its position on the termination, bearing in mind the already high rate of unemployment in the country and the unbearable suffering that would come to the dismissed workers and their families. "After all, the strike was a result of a pure provocation in the premises by the management of Lamco," the LFLU said. ●

LIBUSCO WORKERS LEAVE WORK AT GOVERNMENT REQUEST

Monrovia DAILY OBSERVER in English 15 Oct 11 pp 1, 10

[Text]

Over 1,000 employees of the Liberia Sugar Corporation (LIBSUCO) in Harper have peacefully laid down their tools in response to government's request, until the mounting financial problems facing the company are solved.

The workers were informed of their plight at the company's sight on Monday by Maryland County Superintendent, 1st Lt. Wamleh Elliott, upon his return from Monrovia.

Superintendent Elliott recently headed an 18-man delegation to Monrovia to meet with Head of State C-I-C Samuel K. Doe and PRC members to discuss the financial problems facing LIBSUCO.

Lt. Elliott, who described LIBSUCO as "the economic spinal cord" of not only Maryland County, but that of the entire eastern Liberia, expressed sympathy with the workers.

He urged them to engage in food crops farming on LIBSUCO's 5,000 acres of uncultivated land while government is exploring all avenues for the company's economic survival.

Superintendent Elliott did not, however, say when the workers would be called back to work but told the senior and managerial staff to continue to work and ensure that LIBSUCO properties were secured.

Superintendent Elliott said it was not proper for the workers to continue to work and increase the payroll while government was trying to generate funds to improve the company's operation.

He told the workers that out of the four months pay LIBSUCO was owing them, two months salaries would be given them when they are called to resume work, while the balance will be paid in two installments when the company's operation starts.

The workers accepted the superintendent's decision and hoped government would help to re-activate LIBSUCO for the benefit of not only Marylanders but the entire country. — LINA

AIR LIBERIA 'IN DEEP FINANCIAL TROUBLE'

Monrovia DAILY OBSERVER in English 13 Oct 81 p 12

[Text] Air Liberia, the nation's flag carrier is in deep financial trouble.

In the absence of immediate bail out by the Government, together with an across the board re-scheduling of the Airline's massive debt, it will be all but certain that Liberia's only Airline will stall dangerously.

This very unhealthy position at the Airline cannot be attributed to the prevailing economic situation in the country. The problem has been building up for years.

It started when Air Liberia was given clearance by the former regime to go International.

When Steve Tolbert took over the Finance Ministry in the mid-seventies, part of his composite plans with the Mansion "to put Liberia on the world map" was to choose a corporation to do part of the job.

Air Liberia, then little more than a taxi service was chosen to show the flag.

Massive capital out lay was approved, "expatriates were brought in at near ridiculous contracts to bring Air Liberia up to par with other International Airlines".

Towards the close of the decade, it became very clear that the original "plans" for Air Liberia were not only misguided but fraudulent.

Mis-management was rife, misuse of IATA--privileges to which Air Liberia belonged--became routine and morale hit the bottom line.

By 1980, the only profit posted in the books at the airline was ineptitude.

Immediately after the April 12 Revolution last year, British Caledonian, which was entrusted with managing Air Liberia, bolted away, leaving Air Liberia with over $3 million debt load and not a single cent in its account.

The alleged took away the Airline's books in order to prevent the present management and the Government from finding out what was going on at Air Liberia.

At the moment, the Airline's credit rating is nil--even on the domestic market.

The inevitable result is that Air Liberia has to purchase everything from paper clips to Jet fuel on a cash basis.

As one observer put it, "the present Air Liberia is a corporate nightmare". Indeed, it is.

To turn Air Liberia around will be like a prop Jet taking off in gale-forced winds.

The un-enviable task falls on the shoulders of the two top men in the Airline's management team: Mr. James K. Koffa, the Managing Director, and his number-two man, Mr. Michael M. Wiles.

Asked whether they will be able to make Air Liberia take off and keep her on course in this turbulent financial climate, they both registered an unqualified yes.

That unbridled optimism is the prevailing mood throughout the Company. Says a junior staffer in the Company's downtown office: "Now that we have the right people at the right time, we have no where to go but up and we will make it".

The new Managing Director, Mr. James Koffa, is a Seasoned Administrator with impressive credentials in Corporate Management. He holds a Master's degree in Finance and is also a U.S. trained lawyer.

He was brought back home from the U.S. to take over the stalling Airline. Says he: "My purpose is to make Air Liberia viable and a revenue generating national corporation, and that's exactly what I'm going to do".

Helping him in this difficult undertaking is Mr. Michael Wiles, the Deputy Managing Director for Administration, who comes to Air Liberia with impressive management credentials from the U.S. He has also logged considerable experience in corporate management locally.

At the moment, Mr. Koffa is locked in intensive talks with Government officials as well as the Board of Directors, for assistance.

That assistance should come up in two ways. First the Government must pay up the $1-1/2 million owed the Airline and second, Air Liberia should and must be given privileges accorded to other corporations like the Mesurado Group.

For this reason, it is imperative that the Government give this nation's flag carrier all out support.

To subject her to controls and restrictions under the NIC umbrella will be counter-productive.

Mr. Koffa leaves shortly for talks with IATA officials to iron out the terms under which the airline will re-gain the privilege of issuing tickets on behalf of International Airlines.

This privilege is crucial to Air Liberia coming through. In addition, if Mr. Koffa is to succeed in obtaining financing and credit abroad during his talks, it is imperative that the home Government chip in too.

Air Liberia is no longer a prestige project launched by an inept administration as was the case under the Tolbert regime.

The Nation's air carrier is very much a sound and viable corporate undertaking. It will be a calculated mis-judgement to allow the nation's only flag carrier to crash land.

There is tremendous potential for Air Liberia. All that is needed at this time is some support from the Government, reports Tom Gorgla.

BRAZILIANS CONDUCTING POULTRY INVESTMENT FEASIBILITY STUDIES

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 22 Oct 81 pp 1, 6

[Text]

A three-man team of Brazilian industrialists from the Financial consultant Company (MULTICON) currently in Liberia to conduct feasibility studies for possible investment in poultry, Tuesday called on Head of State C-I-C Samuel K. Doe to acquaint him of their mission.

The team, headed by Mr. Paulo Ayub, an agro-economist, arrived here last Thursday, and has already visited the Sangai's Farm in Bong County and several areas of interest in Kakata, Bensonville and the Bao Metal Workshop.

Members of the team, which also comprised, Mr. Helio Joris, an economist and Mr. Mauro Peres, a mechanical engineer, were introduced to C-I-C Samuel K. Doe by Major Dew Mayson, Chairman of the National Investment Commission.

Mr. Ayub assured Head of State Doe that if the Liberian Government endorsed the project, his company would adequately supply the Liberian Market with poultry farm commodities.

C-I-C Doe expressed appreciation for the desire of the industrialists to invest in Liberia and said it was the government's determination to encourage investors to participate in Liberia's economic activities.

He assured the Brazilian industrialists of government's supportive cooperation, and directed the National Investment Commission to effectively coordinate their activities.

MULTICON is expected to invest about $16 million in the project if studies are completed and the project approved.

MORE THAN FIVE THOUSAND RUBBER FARMS CLOSE DOWN

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 23 Oct 81 pp 3, 6

[Article by Klon Hinneh]

[Text] More than 5,000 rubber farms around the country are said to be closed down due to high energy costs, mounting taxes, and the escalating prices of imported rubber materials, it was disclosed by the Rubber Planters Association of Liberia meeting held here recently.

Several other rubber farmers are abandoning their farms and the number of farmers selling rubber to Firestone has decreased from 2,000 last year to 400 this year, causing a drastic decline of production in the rubber industry.

Other large rubber concessions like B.F. Goodrich the Liberia Agricultural Company are reported to be facing similar decline in the purchase of rubber from farmers.

Although the amount of money lost due to the closure of these farms was not mentioned, the association members said the situation gravely affects the nation's economy.

At the meeting chaired by former Senator William V. S. Tubman Jr., a prosperous rubber farm owner, the association's members contended that high taxes have created problems for rubber farmers, especially the small rubber farmers.

Among the many Liberian rubber producers, the RPA members noted small rubber farmers were the main victim of the current obstacles because they cannot withstand them.

A quick solution, the members pointed out, was urgently needed for these problems.

Despite the continued escalating prices of rubber on the world market, the Liberia rubber Industry had a bright future but only needed to be revitalized, one member said.

Members of the association said they were ready to assist government in terms of offering suggestions to help solve the problem, especially the tax issue.

They concluded by calling for a dialogue with government in an effort to resolve this situation to avoid future complication.

[Excerpt] RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique] President Samora Machel last night left the capital of Mozambique for a 6-day visit to the Italian Republic. Samora Machel will, after that, visit Czechoslovakia in response to an invitation from the First Secretary of the Communist Party and President of the Republic Gustav Husak. The high-level delegation which accompanies President Samora Machel included Foreign Trade Minister Joaquim Chissano, Minister of the Office of the President Oscar Monteiro, Information Minister Jose Luis Cabaco, Industry and Energy Minister Antonio Branco, and Secretary of State for Coal and Hydrocarbons Abdul Magid Osman. The group also included senior officials connected with the sectors of agriculture, finances, mining and geological prospecting, aviation and telecommunications, hydrology, and health and social welfare as well as international cooperation.

Italy is one of the principal economic partners of Mozambique in the Western world; outstanding in relations between these two countries is a loan in the amount of $22.5 million given to the RPM for the two-year term of 1981-1982.

Italian Cooperation Reviewed

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Oct 81 p 3

[Excerpts] Cooperation on the government level between the Italian republic and the RPM is characterized by the dispatch of technicians through Mozambique and investments in various domestic economic sectors in many different fields. Before taking up the specific areas in which this cooperation takes place, we might report that, for the 2-year term of 1981-1982, Italy has granted a loan to be used by Mozambique, worth $22.5 million (about 750,000 contos).

As we said yesterday in a report on the struggle of the Italian people, the first government delegation from the RPM arrived in Italy December 1975. The IPALMO (Institute for Relations between Italy and the Countries of Africa, Latin American, and the Middle East) received the Mozambican delegation and opened the way to intergovernmental relations; this institute later on began to send technicians to Mozambique.

"I also recall that the first mixed commission created by Mozambique with a capitalist country was with Italy," said Dina Forti, an Italian international affairs specialist serving Mozambique, currently involved in the international cooperation program of the National Planning Commission.

Health and Education--The First to Benefit

After independence, the first Italian technicians to arrive in Mozambique for the most part were directed to the health and higher education sectors. This cooperation in the health fields has been increasing and today we can see medical personnel both in the district hospitals and in the country's main hospitals to which material support in the health fields is also being channeled.

The agreement between Italy and Mozambique on the health level has made it possible for many Mozambican patients to be treated in Italy when the country's possibilities for certain treatments are no longer enough.

In education, various professors of Italian nationality are working especially at the Eduardo Mondlane University.

There are various nongovernmental organizations for health, education, and other sectors of technical-scientific and economic development which cooperate in recruiting technicians for Mozambique.

One of the pioneering organizations in this field, which we mentioned earlier, is the IPALMO. This institute however does not have the job of recruiting technicians. But, due to the friendship with the RPM, it was the first to take action in this field. For this purpose, we have the CUAM (University Committee on Medical Assistance) whose mission is to recruit medical personnel and to sensitize such personnel to the tasks they are going to perform.

COSV (Volunteer Service Coordination and Organization) is another Italian nongovernmental organization which has sent specialized personnel to Mozambique. For example, this organization has already sent ten or eleven technicians to the sector of ports and CFM [Mozambique Railroad].

Next we have COOPTECNICAL, an organization connected with the National League of Italian Cooperatives, which has many technicians in Mozambique, especially on the state farms and in hog raising.

We must also mention MOLIVS (Liberation and Development Movement) which sends specialists mostly to the geology sector and for the production of small species.

Private Visit

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 17 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Calane da Silva: "I Bring You Our Victory"]

[Excerpts] "I bring you, 8 years after the fact, our victory, the victory of Guinea-Bissau, of Mozambique, Angola, Cape Verde. I bring the victory of Zimbabwe," said

President Samora Machel in the Great Hall of the Regional Council of Emilia Romangna, in Bologna, 400 kilometers from the Italian capital.

The Mozambican president, who yesterday completed his official visit to Italy, spoke in the same place where, 8 years earlier, together with the leaders who were fighting against Portuguese colonialism, a conference was held in support of the liberation movement of the countries mentioned above.

The official visit by President Samora Machel to the Italian republic ended yesterday morning. The chief of state of Mozambique officially took his leave of President Pertini in Quirinale Palace.

In a short but very significant ceremony, the Italian President, accompanied by members of the Italian government, once again stressed the importance of the visit in strengthening and expanding cooperation between the two countries, especially in the social and economic sector.

The Mozambican chief of state will stay in Italy until 19 October on a private visit, inspecting areas of Red influence linked to the RPM through bonds of historic solidarity forged during the national liberation struggle.

In Rome, Ministry of Industry and Energy Antonio Branco and Secretary of State for Coal and Hydrocarbons Abdul Magid yesterday conferred with the undersecretary for Italian State Participations Delio Giacometti, with whom they discussed aspects of cooperation between the two countries in the energy field, particularly regarding prospecting for petroleum, coal, and uranium.

An announcement distributed at the end of the meeting stated that an Italian technical delegation would go to Mozambique to discuss the provisions of possible cooperation and the establishment of a mixed study commission.

Private Cooperation Viewed

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 14 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] "The visit by President Samora Machel to Italy creates conditions for increasing the volume of private cooperation between the two countries," in the opinion of Claudo Gentili, representing the COSV (Volunteer Service Organization Coordination), a lay cooperation organization of a nongovernmental character which has been supporting Mozambique in various projects.

Mozambique's liberation struggle for many years has had strong support from Italian progressive organizations, Claudio Gentili noted. Meetings, demonstrations, and other events were organized, originally in an effort to strengthen the movement against Portuguese colonialism in Italy, starting in 1968 or 1969.

After Mozambique obtained its independence, COSV decided to change the nature of its support, making it more radically political and orienting it along more practical and concrete lines.

In the beginning, COSV encountered difficulties in attaining these objectives. With the signing of the first cooperation agreement between the COSV and the RPM, in April 1980, activities took on a more intensive and regular character.

Before that however COSV had already been supporting the contacts established between the Mozambican Production Council, on the one hand, and the FLM (Federation of Metalworkers) and the Federation of Confederations of the Province of Milan, on the other hand; in 1979, these Italian labor union organizations signed a cooperation agreement with the Production Council.

CLaudio Gentili, who also represents the Italian labor unions in the RPM, for organizational and protocol purposes, pointed out that the agreements between the COSV and the RPM among other things cover the ministries of industry and energy and of surface transportation.

In this context, COSV currently has ten cooperation specialists working in Mozambique primarily on the railroads.

Regarding the Niassa Plan, COSV signed two agreements with Mozambique providing for the assignment of two Italian cooperation specialists and several specialists of other nationalities to the country. Expanding this cooperation effort to other countries, COSV will participate in a project aimed at establishing two machine shops, one carpentry shop, and one sawmill.

In the two Niassa projects, the COSV has the support of two autonomous Italian cooperation organizations, particularly the Red Cross and Africa 70.

Through COSV, 23 Mozambican metalworkers were being trained in the Italian city of Brescia between January and July of this year. Next Saturday, another four workers will leave for Milan to take courses as grading machine operators.

Claudio Gentili, the COSV representative in Mozambique, announced that this organization is cooperating with other countries, in addition to Mozambique. COSV is also cooperating with Zimbabwe and Nicaragua, in addition to supporting communities of Indians in Peru on the extragovernmental level.

Although COSV presents itself as an autonomous organization, it does cooperate with labor union movements in various countries and has the support of Italian labor unions on many international cooperation projects, especially in Mozambique.

"We hope that the visit of President Samora Machel will enable us to increase the volume of cooperation," said Claudio Gentili. At this time, COSV is of the opinion that closer intergovermental relations between the RPM and Italy will not fail to have a positive effect on private cooperation.

"There are many interesting projects but we depend on financing from the cooperation services of the Ministry of Foreign Trade."

This financing is distributed through the various cooperation projects, proposed by various organizations for different countries, we were told. "Our request for financing for cooperation projects with Mozambique, for example, must be approved by the Italian National Assembly. Here we had the support of the democratic political formations in the Assembly to get approval for these financing requests," said Gentili.

The approach on the government level between the two countries cannot fail to influence this policy of aid distribution in favor of an increase in cooperation which is already being given.

"For several months now, Italian public opinion has displayed great interest in matters concerning southern Africa," said the COSV representative. "I think that this victory comes at an excellent time to consolodate Italy's support for Mozambique."

To find out what the situation in Mozambique is really like, the COSV sent a report on the RPM for dissemination in Italy on the occasion of the visit by Samora Machel. "We must introduce Mozambique to the Italians," said Gentili.

TEACHERS ORGANIZATION ESTABLISHED; TEACHERS STATISTICS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Oct 81 p 1

[Excerpts] The constituent conference of the ONP (National Organization of Mozambican Teachers) was held yesterday in Maputo. Addressing the opening session, President Samora Machel, in the name of the Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party, formally announced the establishment of the ONP.

"Looking back at our revolutionary experience in the field of education and above all the important role of the teacher in the country's development process, fully aware of the need for upgrading the teaching profession, so that its function as an agent in the transformation of society may be given enhanced prestige, the FRELIMO Party has decided to establish the National Organization of Teachers," Samora Machel announced at the end of yesterday's morning session.

The ONP will not take over any of the functions which, by definition, must be carried out by the Ministry of Education and Culture; but, as a social and professional organization, it must supplement the training of national teaching cadres. In a recent interview given to VOZ DA FRELIMO, Education and Culture Minister Graca Machel pointed out, by way of example, that the ONP will have the job of organizing teachers' analysis and evaluation meetings, lectures and conferences, and libraries, along with the promotion and dissemination of scientific studies connected with pedagogy and didactics. The ONP must also provide incentives for socialist competition among teachers, it must project the image of the new-type teacher, and it must promote recreation through entertainment and relaxation for teachers.

As a result of the intensive ideological struggle and debate in this sector, most of the foreign teachers left the country soon after independence and their places were taken by many young volunteers who at that time did not have the necessary training and background in education.

Samora Machel hailed the devotion of the young people to the cause of education, especially the group of teachers in Cuba and the teachers assigned to the border areas where they are targets of enemy action.

Along with about 2,000 children who are in secondary school in Cuba, there is a group of Mozambican teachers on the Isle of Youth teaching Portuguese, geography, history, and political education.

Schools in the provinces of Manica and Sofala have been the targets of armed operations by the MNR [Mozambique National Resistance] counterrevolutionary group, with reports of cases of mutilations and kidnappings of teachers in the areas.

The ONP Conference will continue until Thursday. Delegations from Angola, the GDR, China, the USSR, Cuba, Bulgaria, Korea, Portugal, Vietnam, and Holland were attending as invited guests.

Mozambique has 21,647 teachers on various levels of education, according to the motion directed by the teachers yesterday to the FRELIMO Party and the Mozambican people on the occasion of the National Constituent Conference of the ONP.

That number includes 18,561 teachers in primary education, 2,991 in secondary education, 25 in middle-level education, and 70 in higher education. Furthermore, 16,989 are men and 4,658 are women. Only 21 percent have specific subject backgrounds and training in the field of education. Their ages on the average vary between 20 and 25 years.

DIFFICULTIES CAUSE MINISTERIAL VISIT

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 15 Oct 81 p 3

[Excerpt] Minister of Ports and Surface Transportation Alcantara Santos today continued on to Quelimane in the Province of Zambezia. As a member of the Mozambican government, he went there to check into the degree of implementation of the plans for the shipment of strategic products for domestic and export purposes.

The minister of ports and surface transportation will visit the district of Milange in Zambezia. Here, Minister Alcantara Santos will look into the situation regarding the shipment of tea which is still being held in that region, among other questions relating to transportation.

In Milange likewise, the STS [Ports and Surface Transportation] minister and the delegation he heads will conduct an on-the-spot inspection of the shipment of products between Mozambique and Malawi by means of the cable car line currently closed down due to damage.

In the course of his visit to that province Minister Alcantara Santos will also go into the operation of the ports. He will visit all ports from Quelimane to Nacala in the course of a trip that will in succession take him to Chinde, Pebane, Macuse, Angoche, and Nacala.

BULGARIAN FIRM PREPARES CAHORA BASSA STUDY

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Oct 81 p 3

[Text] An economic feasibility study is currently being conducted with a view to the exploration of the lake at Cahora Bassa in the Province of Tete. Carried out by "Transcomplekt Engineering" of Bulgaria, the study which now has been started includes research at the site and will be completed within 6 months. The study is being conducted under the coordination of the National Directorate of Maritime and River Transportation.

The work to survey the resources of the Cahora Bassa Lake will make it possible to put together a vast economic development program in the region.

The study was started days ago and fits into the complex of cooperation relations existing between the People's Republic of Mozambique and Bulgaria.

Based essentially on the resources of the lake itself, the economic development project among other things calls for the creation of a river transportation enterprise, the construction of small ports along the lake, and the development of fishing in which the lake is very rich.

The river transportation enterprise to be created will have the mission of coordinating passenger and freight transportation; it must be noted that this effort will be supported by the SADCC [Conference for Development Coordination in Southern Africa], particularly regarding the portion dealing with transportation.

Concerning SADCC support for the development of the economic exploitation of the Cahora Bassa Lake, it was learned that a meeting is to be held shortly between that agency and members of the DNTMF [National Directorate of Maritime and River Transportation] who are connected with the lake project.

Right now, only five whaleboats--one of which is laid up due to damage--are operating on that lake, carrying passengers and freight. These units will be insufficient to cover the vast area represented by the artificial lake at Cahora Bassa.

Each of these whaleboats has the capacity to carry 80 passengers, or 5 tons when carrying only freight.

Cahora Bassa Lake is estimated to be about 345 kilometers long, with a maximum width of 30 kilometers. The completion of the project, whose feasibility study is now in progress, is of particular economic importance, especially regarding passenger and freight transportation.

On the other hand, river transportation is very important in the specific case of Tete, where the lake is a means of providing a link between Mozambique and Malawi.

This is why the SADCC is contemplating support for the transportation development program since both Mozambique and Malawi are members of the SADCC.

REVIEW OF NATIONAL HYDROELECTRIC SITUATION

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 15 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Willy Wadcington: "Mozambique's Hydroelectric Program Aimed at 12 Million Kilowatts"]

[Text] According to initial estimates, the hydroelectric potential of the People's Republic of Mozambique comes to an enormous figure of 12 million kilowatts. This potential covers all of the ten provinces. This energy capacity means that we have almost 1 kilowatt per inhabitant (based on the 1980 census) and a little more (1.3 kilowatt) per square kilometer of surface (783,000 square kilometers).

This capacity is located above all in the province of Tete, where the powerful flow rate and the accentuated gradients of some rivers make it possible to build 15 generating stations, the biggest of which is at Cahora Bassa, with 3.6 million kilowatts, followed, in declining order of magnitude, by those at Mepanda Uncua with 1.6 million, downstream from Lupata with 1.1 million, in Lupata itself with 600,000, and in Boroma with 400,000; all of these are located on the Zambeze.

Looking at the electric energy resources in the country on the eve of independence (1973), we only had a total of just about 382,820 kilowatts installed in 813 power plants with 1,292 generators; most of them consumed petroleum derivatives; we realize the energy shortage we had at that time in contrast to the existing potential and the enormous foreign exchange expenditure connected with the import of fuels.

Now, no country can grow if it does not have abundant and cheap energy. We therefore can understand the effort made ever since independence to investigate all available energy resources, with priority for hydroelectric projects, although we do continue with prospecting for conventional resources which we also have, such as coal, gas, or petroleum.

As a result of these guidelines, major efforts are already underway to implement the first phase of the national high-voltage grid from Cahora Bassa, intended to electrify the provinces of Zambezia, Nampula, Niassa, and Cabo Delgado, over an area of about 1,600 kilometers, to which we must add about 50 kilometers for the tie-in of the current grids of Cahora Bassa and Revue.

The country's efforts to utilize hydroelectric energy must be viewed in the context of the efforts to upgrade our tremendous resources.

Rivers represent an unending potential. We have already begun to convert that potential into actual wealth, to the benefit of the entire country.

BRIEFS

ENTERTAINMENT ENTREPRENEUR--In an effort to contribute to recreation and entertainment for the young people in the capital, producer Alex Barbosa is planning to present a series of "dance matinees" on Sunday in the Boite Zambi section. This initiative has already been implemented when last Sunday afternoon a dance was held between 1500 and 1900 with a completely full house. According to the producer, he is now planning to use and improve the recreational park and lake located among the pine trees and eucalyptus trees of the Maputo high school, where he plans to reintroduce little boats for the children to have fun with, plus the establishment of a tea-dispensing stand. For this purpose he is initiating contacts to determine the conditions for the probable rental of the lake complex. [Excerpts] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 14 Oct 81 p 2] 5058

BOOK ON CIA NETWORK--NOTICIAS Publications have just put out a brochure on the dismantling of the CIA network in Mozambique in March of this year. The title of the brochure is "Operacao 6° aniversario--Como uma rede da CIA foi desmantelada em Mocambique" [Operation 6th Anniversary--How a CIA Network Was Dismantled in Mozambique]. This publication presents vast documentation on the work done to identify enemy agents, their MO, and the relations maintained with foreign bosses from whom they received gifts and money. It also contains the testimony of the traitors, the official announcements issued at that time, at the press conference given by the information minister, when it was announced that the networks had been burned, as well as various documents on the activities of the CIA and its operations under the cover of diplomatic immunity. This is an important book which is useful to all of us because it clearly shows how the Americans are trying to undermine the security and stability of other countries. The book's author is Abel Mutemba. [Excerpt] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 12 Oct 81 p 8] 5058

CUBANS SUSPECTED OF PLOTTING INSTALLATION OF SWAPO GOVERNMENT

Windhoek DIE SUIDWESTER in Afrikaans 16 Sep 81 p 4

[Editorial: "Neighboring Countries Can Help"]

[Text] The manner in which leaders of black Africa are willing to misguide themselves, or be misguided by interest groups who want to exploit them, has been clearly demonstrated once again by a statement made by the president of Tanzania.

According to news reports Dr Julius Nyerere made a statement yesterday in Paris saying that the Cuban troops will leave Angola as soon as South-West Africa is independent. They are there only for protecting Angola against South African attacks from the South-West.

He said: "It is absolutely clear that it is ridiculous to expect the Cubans to leave Angola as long as the South Africans continue to attack Angola."

This sort of distortion of facts concerning the situation is nothing new and the promulgation of such things will certainly not stop. Nevertheless it is necessary to look at the truth once more.

Angola is still being presented as the innocent victim of brutal and undeserving attacks by South Africa. But facts tell another story.

The Cuban troops now present in that country originally went there for the purpose of preserving the present Marxist regime of Angola after it took over the government by force when Portuguese rule came to an end. This is still their main task.

Since that time Angola began to provide housing to SWAPO, yet another Marxist organization, and to equip it with weapons and other accessories for unchaining an armed conflict against South-West Africa.

With the approval and help of its host SWAPO has now been waging a war for years against the people of the South-West. The security forces have repeatedly warned the Angolan government that it would pursue SWAPO bands to their hiding place, but at the same time they gave the assurance that Angola's own forces have nothing to fear as long as they stay out of the way.

Nevertheless, Angola increased its aid to SWAPO and during the latest incident has allowed its own forces (probably it gave orders) to challenge the security forces from the south.

Therefore, this is not at all the case of South Africa being the aggressor against the government of a neighboring country. But lies must be told and repeated for the purpose of inciting world opinion.

As soon as Angola withdraws its support to SWAPO and the use of Angolan territory is denied, it will no longer be necessary for the forces of the South-West and those of South Africa to enter Angolan areas and they will also abstain from doing so.

But to lend credence to the assertion that the Cubans will withdraw as soon as the South-West is independent and the South African forces have departed...that is nonsense. What will probably happen in the event that South Africa summarily withdraws from the South-West is that SWAPO, as was the case with the MPLA in Angola, will try to grab the government of this country by force of arms.

As in the case of Angola the rest of the population will not be willing to accept this and the result can be a civil war just like the one which is still raging in Angola...after years of independence.

The purpose of the Cubans' presence in Angola is then probably that of helping SWAPO to win the military struggle and to keep its Marxist friends in power.

This is the aspect of the real situation. If the black neighboring countries and the other countries further away really want a solution to the South-West dispute, grant a really free independence to the peaceful people of the South-West, they can contribute to that in a practical manner in two ways:

First of all persuade Angola to send the Cubans home, because this would remove the well founded fear of aggression from that region, being felt by South-Westerners...and

Secondly persuade Angola and other neighboring countries to withdraw their help to SWAPO and in so doing commit themselves to a peaceful stipulation of a government for the South-West at the ballot-box rather than by force of arms.

WHITE OPPOSITION PARTY SUSPICIOUS OF DTA AIMS AFTER INDEPENDENCE

Windhoek DIE SUIDWESTER in Afrikaans 21 Sep 81 p 4

[Editorial: "Independence"]

[Text] Although the United States and its Western allies have now been about a so-called "new" initiative on the South-West question for many months, in the South-West itself there is nothing known about the plans which these powers have up their sleeves for guiding this country to independence. Hopefully following this week's diplomatic consultations more information will be made available.

All indications have so far been that the settlement plan entails an election under one or another form of international supervision. A large part of the world (including all of Africa) is insisting that the United Nations must be the supervisor of this election...and this is precisely one of the most important points of difficulty.

The moderate internal parties of the South-West, and South Africa as well, have lost all confidence in the ability of the United Nations to be an impartial arbiter and it will not be easy to cut through this Gordian knot; that much is clear.

However, if such an election were to come about one fact will be indisputable: If the moderate parties want to make sure of a victory over SWAPO they will not be able to afford to get into a mutual strife against each other. That would be fatal.

The DTA [Democratic Turnhalle Alliance] is presenting itself as the winning horse against SWAPO. However, we have serious misgivings as to whether it can succeed in this without the support of other moderate parties which have already provided proof that the DTA is not an acceptable alternative. Foremost among this group are the whites and the Basters who simply cannot accept the DTA because in this alliance they see a danger for the rights of minorities.

This fear has intensified as a result of the recent constitutional changes by the DTA in which it once and for all did away with the ethnic composition of the central governing body. To be sure, for all practical purposes, the DTA can no longer claim that in fact it is still an alliance...it has quietly gone over to being an individual superparty.

The groups which we have singled out above can and want to make a meaningful contribution if it comes to show of strength against SWAPO at the ballot-box. But they want the assurance that once SWAPO is defeated they will not be forced into another type of one man--one vote hegemony.

Today the most important priority for the DTA is: Clarification of those misgivings about its objectives being held by those population groups which defeated the DTA in their own ethnic elections. In other words it should provide clear cut guarantees for protecting the interests of minority groups in a future independent South-West and these interests must be appropriately protected.

Mere guarantees of individual human rights are not sufficient. These were guaranteed in haste to every other country in Africa and the result of this is known to everybody. We will accept no constitution which endangers any minority's existence and security.

BRIGHT FUTURE FOR DIAMOND INDUSTRY FORECAST

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 18 Oct 81 p 19

[Text]

SWAZI Diamond Cutting obtained a licence to operate in March of this year. Premises were found in Manzini, and after E29000 had been spent on improvements and elaborate security equipment, business began.

As soon as it opened works here, Swaziland diamonds recruited and trained thirteen men and two girls. A further twenty people will be selected from the hundreds of applications received in response to a recent advertisement, and, eventually, the work force will be up to 120. (Only small groups of people can be trained in this highly skilled work at a time).

Swazi Diamond Cutting buys its stones from markets all over the world, choosing from wherever the prices are right. Mr. Vovos receives a weekly bulletin from the Diamond Corporation in America which keeps him up to date on these prices. He has also registered Swaziland as a diamond exporting country in Antwerp, the first time it has ever been registered as thus, (and Swaziland's Customs collects 20% on the stones coming in).

Once cut and polished, the stones are re-exported to whole-salers in the jewellery trade.

The diamond working is done in three sections: the first is sawing. The tiny stones are cut by circular saw blades, made of paper-thin copper, which are 'edged' with diamond powder. Diamonds can only be cut by diamonds.

The company already has seven circular saws and six more are on order from Belgium.

The second part of the job is Cutting, when the stones are 'shaped. This is done on metal discs which spin like gramophone records, while the craftsman holds the diamond, set in a special rod. It requires skill to know just how much pressure to exert.

When new, the discs are quite rough, but they are treated with diamond powder and glue, and industrial diamonds to smooth them down.

First, four corners are cut, called Blocking, then, up to 58 facets can be made on the stone. All shapes brilliant, marquise, pear emarald, square emerald and triangular, can be cut, though not every stone can be cut to any shape. Each must be studied very carefully.

Section three is Polishing. In all, each stone goes through thirteen processes, each one carried out by a diffferent operator.

Swazi Diamond Cutting produces work of international standards, and so, a man who completes training with them, and gains experience, is a craftsman able to work in the diamond trade anywhere in the world.

Mr. Vovos has room for twenty more craftsmen at the work benches he already has, but he has plenty of floor space for expansion.

All this represents a massive investment. The precision machinery used is very expensive and the E22 thousand already spent is only half of the expected final amount.

DEVELOPMENT OF SUGAR INDUSTRY REPORTED

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 30 Oct 81 pp 11, 14, 16

[Selections from special "Review of the Sugar Industry"]

[Text]

SUGAR is Swaziland's greatest land user.

It is the greatest exploiter of natural resources because of its use of intensive irrigation.

It is the greatest single employer in the country.

It is the greatest earner of foreign exchange for the country. (It has earned E100 million in one year).

It is a very important revenue earner for Government outside normal company taxation.

When the industry is in full production in 1983 it will be generating 52% of the total earnings of the economy.

It is predicted that 365 thousand tons of sugar will be produced during the current season, and in 1983, with full production, this should be up to 400 thousand tons. Next to South Africa, Swaziland is the biggest sugar producer on the continent.

A DIAGRAM showing clearly how sugar finds its way from the fields to the silo. From there is it exported to Europe, America and Canada, and brings considerable revenue to Swaziland.

LEGEND

- SUGAR MILLS

- RAILWAY
- RIVERS SERVING CANE AREAS

DISTANCES:
MILLS TO RAILHEADS 32 km
PHUZUMOYA TO LOURENCO MARQUES 161 km
MLAWALA TO LOURENCO MARQUES 87 km

Low rainfall in 1978 and 79 led to a fall back in the amount of sugar produced in Swaziland in the '79-80 season, a drop in fact to 240695 tonnes against the previous season's 247803. Added to this, the first quarter of the Sugar year saw depressed market prices. Then in August, the world market began to gather strength and prices increased steadily.

Because prices had started off being low in the buying season, it was due to Lome quotas that Swaziland was able to do well in the market. Free market prices were not economic to this country, though we can sell duty free to the U.S.A. under the Generalised System of preferences. (All sugar available from here for the free market was sold to the U.S.)

Cut backs in the local manufacturing industry, caused by recession in Europe, led to a drastic drop in sales on the domestic market. Also, the sale of sugar over the counter dropped, due, it seems to the fact that the price difference between here and the Republic narrowed, so cutting down the amount of sugar being taken illegally out of the country.

Local prices were increased in May, 1979 from E180 per tonne to E260 per tonne for refined and from E160/ per tonne to E240 per tonne ex-mill for Brown, bringing them close to the current South African prices of $291 per tonne for refined and $267 per tonne for Brown.

Though South African prices were subsequently raised, price differences were no where near the level prevailing before 1979. Thus, incentive for moving sugar from Swaziland to South Africa fell away.

It is now assessed that we consume about 35,42 kilograms per head of population, rather than the 44 kilograms which domestic sales led statisticians to believe previously. Sugar earned E100 million in foreign exchange within the year 1979-80 and earned over £80 million in eight years from export levys alone.

Two very important developments in the industry have been the incorporation of a diffuser at the Mhlume Mill and the establishment of the new Mill at Simunye. The diffuser will increase the capacity at Mhlame by 35 000 tonnes, and when Simunye attains full production in the 1982-83 season 126 000 tonnes will be turned out.

Sugar and people.

The Growth of the Sugar Industry has had profound social impact on the country. By 1979, 60 000 people were wholly or partly dependent on sugar for a living. It has led to large scale training of personel at all levels from semi-skilled to managerial; villages have been built to house staff, altering the traditional living patterns, schools and clinics have been established, and, with regular earnings becoming the norm, 'consumer societies' have appeared in rural areas.

Commercial enterprise has recognised this last phenomenon and the result is Simunye Plaza. The emergence of the raw new town and the Plaza itself amidst the cane fields and the retreating bush veld is slightly bizarre; but soon they will be accepted as part of developing Swaziland.

Still Going Strong 31 Years Later

SUGAR was first grown in Swaziland in the Big Bend region in the late 1950's. It was marketed through South Africa, but when the Republic left the Commonwealth in 1964, Swaziland began to negotiate direct exporting of its sugar and became an independent member of the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement in 1965.

Swaziland's quota was set at 86364 at a price which made production worthwhile at a time when free market prices were very poor world-wide.

Britains entry to the European Economic Community brought the Commonwealth Agreement to an end in December of 1974, and in 1975, Swaziland was one of the 46 nations which signed the Lome Convention, with the 9 members of the E.E.C. The provisions of Lome allowed Swaziland to export about 120000 tonnes of sugar a year to the Community on preferential terms.

"The quota under the the Lome Convention is vital. Without this assured outlet at remunerative prices for a major portion of its exports the sugar industry, efficient though it is, would not be viable. The stability of the industry was based on the long term negotiated price quota that Swaziland enjoyed under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement. When Britain entered the European Economic Community this was replaced by an assured outlet for an agreed quantity of 120 000 tonnes of sugar in Europe.

Sugarcane is a 7 to 8 years cycle crop and therefore the sugar industry is a long term one. It needs to have assurance of long term outlets. This is why the Lome protocol's assurance of an indefinite outlet is so important to Swaziland."

Sugar production in Swaziland has risen from 54641 tonnes in the 1958-59 season to an expected 370000 tonnes for the 81-82 season. Once Simunye is in full production (1982) the figure should be 400000 tonnes. The past twenty one years has also seen great changes in the ownership of the industry. In the beginning it was in the hands of expatriate private enterprise, with only about 5% Swazi participation. Now, Swazi participation is well over 50%. Mhlume Mill is owned by C.D.C. with a 50% Government shareholding. Ubombo is owned by Lonrho with a 49% Government shareholding. The Swazi Nation has direct ownership of 65% at Simunye, through Tibiyo Taka Ngwane."

85% of the sugar leaving the Mills is raw and this is all exported for further refining by its buyers. 15% is refined at Ubombo for domestic consumption. Domestic prices are kept low as outside prices are high enough to support the industry.

It is estimated that 90 000 people are employed in or dependent on the production of sugar; this is 16% of the population.

The sugar industry here felt a need for an association to coordinate its affairs, so, in 1967 the Swaziland Sugar Association was formed under the Sugar Act to act as a regulating body and trading agency. It controls the amount of sugar planted, when harvesting is to commence, quantities to be delivered to the mills and when they are to be delivered. The Association also sees to the Transportation and distribution of the sugar for the export market.

Some refining is done at Ubombo, but only for the domestic market (about 15% of local production). Domestic prices are kept low, as outside prices are high enough to support the industry.

SALIM TO REMAIN IN RACE FOR UN SECRETARY GENERAL POST

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 4 Nov 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

TANZANIAN Foreign Minister Salim Ahmed Salim, official candidate of the African states for UN Secretary-General, says he plans to stay in the race despite a veto that blocked his nomination last week.

In the first two rounds of secret balloting, he received 11 and then 10 votes but was vetoed by a permanent council member, believed to be the United States.

Kurt Waldheim, the present Secretary-General, was also vetoed — by China. The 15 council members scheduled private consultations today to seek a way out of the deadlock, which many believe will persist for some time.

In an interview, Ndugu Salim expressed disappointment over abstentions cast by Britain and the Soviet Union over his candidacy and blamed the single veto on what he termed his false stereotype, including a widely published but incorrect report that he was partly educated in Cuba.

He said if the US and others were to examine his UN record — he was Tanzania's chief delegate for 10 years — they would see it was one of constructive moderation. He cited his role in January 1976 when, as President of the Security Council he helped obtain the unanimous adoption of a Western plan for the independence of Namibia from South Africa.

Ndugu Salim recalled that Daniel Patrick Moynihan, now a US senator, was the American representative at the time. Ndugu Salim called the council resolution "a remarkable breakthrough".

Ndugu Salim, who was Chairman of the Special Committee on Decolonisation which declared Puerto Rico a colonial territory, also defended his role on that question, saying he had restrained those who wanted a much more militant approach.

"Judge me from my record", he said. "I had the conviction that the role of the committee was to support decolonisation, but that we needed the cooperation of the colonial powers".

Apart from Portugal and Rhodesia under their former regimes, that co-operation was forthcoming, he said.

Meanwhile, Ndugu Salim has dismissed as "nonsense and a total concoction" a report from Lagos that he blamed Niger, Tunisia and Uganda for his failure to secure the UN Secretary-Generalship last week.

He had been quoted by the news agency of Nigeria as saying that the three African members of the 15-member Security Council had consistently voted against him or abstained.

But Ndugu Salim said in New York yesterday that he had not given an interview to the agency and did not know its correspondent.

"More importantly, I have never discussed with the press until today what happened in the Security Council", he added.

Ndugu Salim is opposing incumbent Kurt Waldheim for the top post.

VICE PRESIDENT JUMBE ADDRESSES MINISTERIAL MEETING

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Simeon Ileta]

[Text] Vice-President Aboud Jumbe has called for unwavering commitment by Party and Government leaders to Tanzania's cherished goal of building unity and socialism.

Ndugu Jumbe, who was addressing ministers, deputy ministers and principal secretaries from the Mainland and the Isles before they started their one-day meeting at the Karimjee Hall in Dar es Salaam yesterday, warned that without full commitment to the cause of unity and socialism, they would be paying lip service to the country's aspirations.

The leaders met under the chairmanship of Prime Minister Cleopa Msuya to map out ways of cementing the 17-year old union between Tanzania Mainland and Zanzibar.

Ndugu Jumbe said although the main aim of the union was to strengthen unity, increase the country's collective capability and to spearhead African unity and revolution, at present it looked as if the responsibility of maintaining the union had been left in the hands of the Minister of State in the Vice-President's Office.

The Vice-President reminded all ministries that they all had an obligation to ensure that the noble goals of the union — the building of unity and socialism — were fully implemented.

Ministries must equally ensure that all state organs under them fully contributed in cementing this unity, without which they would be failing in their duty, he added.

This, he said, required all Party and Government leaders, state organs and the entire public to have the will, determination, mutual respect and trust to foster closer links between the people of the Mainland and the Isles.

Ndugu Jumbe asked the leaders during their meeting to make a correct assessment of how much success had so far been achieved in cementing the union.

He further asked them to question as to how much each ministry and organs under them had contributed to the strengthening of the union.

"Every ministry and organ must know its obligation. Each organ's role must be clearly charted out. In this way, you will help the country to take great strides for the future", the Vice-President urged the meeting.

He further urged the leaders to see to it that administrative and technical expertise is fully used to ensure smooth running of activities carried out under the union.

The ministers and principal secretaries had held their first such meeting in Zanzibar last October.

They were, according to the agenda, expected to draw a programme on how to strengthen the union for the future.

They were also expected to discuss, among other things, exchange of experts, training, industrial co-operation and inter-trade to ensure that what could be obtained in one part of the union is readily available without forcing the country to import the same from abroad.

Meanwhile, a three-pronged strategy to strengthen the union between Tanzania Mainland and Zanzibar has been drawn-up.

The strategy, envisaging short, medium, and short-term steps to be taken by ministries and state organs from both parts of the union, was mapped out yesterday after the one-day meeting of ministers and principal secretaries from the Mainland and the Isles.

According to a statement issued by the Prime Minister's Office, the meeting agreed that:

- Corresponding ministries should meet not less than twice a year to chart out ways of efficiently and effectively carrying out their duties as well as solving long-term and short-term problems.
- A sub-committee be formed to look into several matters related to the unity and co-operation between the Mainland and the Isles. The sub-committee should meet not less than two times a year.
- A joint meeting on co-operation be held not less than once a year to receive reports on meetings and implementation by ministries and the sub-committee.

The statement said the joint meeting would have to report to the President and the Vice-President on the various steps taken to strengthen co-operation

SCOPO ANNOUNCES NEW SYSTEM FOR FILLING VACANCIES

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 4 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

PRESIDENTIAL appointments falling vacant in public institutions will from now on be advertised in mass media to allow qualified and competent aspirants apply for the posts.

A circular issued in Dar es Salaam yesterday by the Standing Committee on Parastatal Organisations (SCOPO) said under the new procedure, if a post fell vacant in a public institution whose appointment was presidential, the institution would advertise in local mass media after which respective board of directors would scrutinise the applications together with those of others who for some reasons, could not apply for the post.

After the board's scrutiny, applicants' names will be submitted to the minister of the institution's parent ministry who will further study them before submitting them to the President through the Prime Minister's Office.

Finally, the President will appoint the person he deems fit to fill the vacant post.

Elaborating, the circular said the importance of advertising vacant posts also applied to subsidiary companies whose appointments of its key executives are normally done by respective holding companies or the companies board of directors.

The circular said the new procedure did not apply to such public institutions under whose management agreements there was a special procedure for making such appointments.

Under the old procedure, the institution's parent ministry would, through the Prime Minister's office, propose to the President several names it felt competent enough to fill in the post.

The President would then appoint one from the submitted names.

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERING FORMER KENYAN MP'S ASYLUM APPLICATION

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 4 Nov 81 p 1

[Excerpt]

THE Government is considering an application for political asylum made by former Kenyan MP for Eldoret North Chelagat Mutai, the Minister for Home Affairs, Brigadier Muhiddini Kimario, said in Dar es Salaam yesterday.

He said Chelagat, now in Dar es Salaam entered the country from Kenya on October 15 this year, adding that the former Kenyan politician did not disclose at which point she had crossed the border.

Brigadier Kimario said that in her application, Chelagat had cited "political reasons" for her leaving Kenya.

She had said the Kenyan government had become "hostile" to her because of her criticism of it.

She had said she had been jailed for thirty months in 1975 because of her political differences with the Kenyan government.

Asked how the Government would treat Miss Chelagat's application, Brigadier Kimario said: "The Government is considering giving her request for political asylum".

He believed that the granting of the asylum, an acknowledged and respected international arrangement, would neither mar nor jeopardise relations between Kenya and Tanzania.

The Home Affairs Minister said he had tried, without success, to get in touch with his Kenyan counterpart since Chelagat's arrival.

Last Thursday, as quoted by Kenya's Daily Nation, Kenyan Minister of State in the President's Office, Mr. G.G. Kariuki, told Kenyan Parliament that Chelagat had fled to Tanzania.

He added that the Kenyan government was waiting for details on how she had managed to leave the country.

Chelagat, whose car remained parked in Parliament grounds in Nairobi, was charged on September 21 this year with allegedly making false mileage claims totalling 69,345/- to the National Assembly, according to the Kenyan newspaper.

She was released on 50,000/- bail bond and ordered to appear in court for the mention of her case on October 19. But she failed to appear in court and a warrant for her arrest was issued.

LANGUAGE INSTITUTE DIRECTOR NOTES INSTITUTE'S OBJECTIVES

Dar es Salaam SUNDAY NEWS in English 1 Nov 81 p 5

[Interview with Feisal Mbamba, director of Zanzibar-based Institute of Kiswahili and Foreign Languages, by Samwiiu Mwaffisi at an unspecified time and place]

[Excerpt]

Q:— When was the Institute established and what are its objectives?

A:— The Institute was officially established by Decree Numebr 4 of 1979 though it started functioning as far back as 1976. Its objectives are inter alia to:-

- Provide facilities for the study, extension and training in the knowledge of Kiswahili and the teaching of foreign languages with a view to facilitating closer cooperation and communication;
- To engage in research on oral traditions and dialects of Zanzibar;
- To prepare and organise the teaching of Kiswahili at different levels to suit the needs of local and foreign students;
- To liaise and associate with the National Kiswahili Council of Tanzania (BAKITA), the Institute of Kiswahili Research of the University of Dar es Salaam and other institutions of learning in furthering the advancement and development of Kiswahili language;
- To establish and foster closer co-operation with neighbouring and other African countries which have interest in the use and development of Kiswahili language; and
- To arrange for the publication and general dissemination of materials produced in connection with the Institute as well important translated works translated into Kiswahili from foreign languages.

Q:— There are similar institutes in Tanzania Mainland that make the establishment of this institute seem a duplication. What necessited the establishment of this institute by the Zanzibar Government?

A:— Well this may look so at a glance. But going through the objective of the so called similar institutes you will no doubt notice that the objectives which I have just enumerated are not exactly similar though perhaps complementary.

There may be one or two places, I mean national institutions, where they teach Kiswahili to foreigners, but this is done more or less on ad hoc basis. Then again there isn't any institution which aims at teaching all the official languages of the United Nations or which aims at turning out interpreters and translators.

Lastly there isn't any institution doing any research on the oral traditions and dialects of Zanzibar. So it is perhaps incorrect to suggest that we are in anyway duplicating the activities of other institutions in Tanzania.

Coming to the second part of your question, I would say that the establishment of our Institute has been made as a result of these three areas not being tackled by the already existing institutions. Perhaps I should give examples to illustrate my point. We all agree that learning foreign languages will encourage our people to read more books which will enable them to appreciate the literature and philosophy embodied in such works which in turn helps in fotering international understanding through mutual appreciation of cultures.

And needless to add, it will also facilitate communication with not only our brothers in Africa but with the world in general. I think you will also agree with me that we have a duty to promote Kiswahili to an international status at least to diffuse the colonial myth that African languages are primitive and cannot fulfil the needs of a modern society.

And lastly we shouldn't forget that the primary dialects of most national languages have been researched, whereas with Kiswahili nothing really serious has been done. We cannot rule out the possibility of the disappearance of some of these dialects in view of greater contact now taking place between speakers of dialects and speakers of standard Kiswahili as a result of improved communications.

Now then the establishment of an institute to take care of these areas was long overdue and that somewhere somehow an institution had to be established to tackle these problems urgently and very seriously.

Q:— What is the relation between this institute and sister institutes in Tanzania Mainland?

A:— We have very good relations with various institutions in Tanzania especially those responsible for the promotion of language teaching or research. At present the two directors — of the Institute of Kiswahili Research of the University of Dar es Salaam and of the Institute of Kiswahili and Foreign Languages — are members of each other's council.

The institute is represented in the National Kiswahili Council of Tanzania (BAKITA). A representative of the Swahili Department of the University of Dar es Salaam sits on the academic board of the Institute, and negotiations are going on with the Institute of Kiswahili Research (UDS) to have a joint project on the dialects of Zanzibar under the guidance of Prof. Derek Nurse of the Institute of Kiswahili Research.

Besides we participate in all seminars organised by various departments of the University of Dar es Salaam. At present we are working towards establishing even closer cooperation with the Department of Foreign Languages and Linguistics of the University of Dar es Salaam.

Q:— What courses are offered by the institute? Is there a plan for the institute to teach Portuguese?

A:— So far the courses are of two categories. The first one is a diploma in language for full-time students; and the second is tailor made courses in foreign languages as well as Kiswahili.

The diploma course is of four years duration. Until now only Tanzanians have enrolled for the course. The first two years of the course go up to the certificate level. Students who do well in their certificate course are eligible for the diploma in languages course.

Before one is admitted to a certificate course one has to have a minimum of three credits, preferably in languages, of the Tanzania 'O' level examination or its equivalent. At both levels — I mean the certificate and the diploma levels — students major in one foreign language and Kiswahili and minor in English, the exception being those majoring in English who instead minor in French. Students also study history, Education theory and practice and political education.

The second category of courses we offer relates to foreign languages and Kiswahili. Foreign language courses are also offered for part-time students who either come in the mornings or evenings. The part-time students taking the morning course are either Party or Government employees who are sponsored by their respective organisations and are normally officers whose nature of work demands knowledge of one of the foreign languages that we teach.

As for plans to teach Portuguese I must say that the commitment has been there since the inception of this institute, but the problem is that we don't get any response from all quarters that we have approached so far on the question of teachers. Nevertheless we are still trying very hard and as soon as we get hold of one, we will start teaching this language.

Q:— One of the courses offered is a four-year diploma at the end of which successful students become teachers. Do they become teachers automatically or do they undergo a teacher training course first?

A:— Well, I have mentioned before that education, both theory and practice, is one of the compulsory subjects. This means that on the completion of their certificate for diploma course, students are counted as trained teachers who can therefore dispense with a teacher training course. But I think I must point out that the institute is not setting itself up as an alternative teacher training institution; rather we are having an eye on the employment prospects of our students.

Although we aim at producing interpreters and translators from Kiswahili into foreign languages and vice versa, the employment problem for the institute's graduates will always be there as long as no decision has been taken yet to use Kiswahili in international forums.

Again there is no certainty that the requisite international organisations will be able to absorb every single candidate we are going to produce from now onwards even if Kiswahili is to be an international language. This is where a student's training as a teacher comes in handy.

Q:— Why do you think this institute is the most ideal for someone who wants to learn Kiswahili?

A:— I think it's an ideal place for someone who wants to learn Kiswahili as a foreign language. If it is just Kiswahili then perhaps the University of Dar es Salaam may be the best place. I am saying that our institute is an ideal place for many reasons. Firstly the objectives of the institute are very clear in this respect. Secondly the institute is not taking this function on ad hoc basis like other institutions, thirdly we are using materials that have been prepared here after examining most of the material available in the market and also after consulting various experts in and outside Tanzania.

Fourthly the Kiswahili speaking environment of Zanzibar itself is an important factor for someone who needs to practise his Swahili outside the class-room.

Lastly we are not complacent about the environmental factor. We are infact doing research on how best to utilise our environment in the teaching of Kiswahili. So I think you will agree with me when I call the institute an ideal place for someone wishing to learn Kiswahili as a foreign language.

Q:— You have said Zanzibar offers a good opportunity for a non-Swahili speaker to learn Kiswahili because of the Swahili speaking society. But at the same time you teach other foreign languages such as French, Arabic and English to people whose first language is none of these. How do you account for this?

A:— It is true that those studying foreign languages in Zanzibar do not enjoy the same ideal conditions that is offered to foreigners studying Kiswahili in Zanzibar.

The acquisition of these foreign languages is a bit different in the absence of reinforcement outside the classroom situation. A very small number of the population in Zanzibar speak these languages and even then they do not use these languages in their day-to-day life.

As a result our students are a bit hindered on their way to a native speaker's competence. We are planning to tackle this problem through bilateral arrangements between say our institute and an institute in a French or Arabic speaking country wherein our students may have the opportunity to spend some time there.

Q:— What chances does Kiswahili have of becoming the lingua franca of Africa?

A:— Well, considering the present stage of development, Kiswahili has a greater chance of becoming Africa's lingua franca. First in its own country it has not suffered like other African languages. Some African countries would very much like to see their indigenous languages become national languages, but in a society with a plurality of indigenous languages each with an equal claim, such a move may bring conflict that may undermine national unity. In Tanznaia Kiswahili has a very strong base. It has been accepted and spoken throughout the country. People are proud of it as having helped in creating national unity.

I think the country has reached a stage where one can say that it is linguistically homogeneous in spite of the existence of other languages. But this is not enough to make it an African lingua franca. In fact the decision can never be made or left to any one country. It is a political decision with a continental impact and must therefore be made by an organisation like the OAU.

African governments must have language policies which encourage the present foreign languages as a medium of communication with the outside world and at the same time encourage some of their indigenous languages to grow into national languages. They should also teach regional African languages at least at the level of the departments of African languages of their universities. By regional here I mean those African languages that have transcended their traditional boundaries, for example Swahili, Hausa etc. And from this pool of Africa's linguae francae Swahili stands a very good chance.

Q:— What kind of researches is the institute undertaking and how does it use these researches to benefit the people?

A:— I have already talked about the research in connection with the teaching of Kiswahili as a foreign language. We are also concerned with the dialects of Zanzibar and the oral traditions of the islands as well. These areas are very important to us for various reasons. I will only mention a few. First there is paucity of materials in connection with dialects and oral traditions. Secondly there is a danger of the disappearance of the existing information with the passing of time and thirdly information and knowledge from these branches of language may contribute to other studies like history, sociology to mention only a few. The researches may benefit the people in a number of ways. For example from these researches people have found out their language is not bastardised Arabic or English as some people would want us to believe. They have found out it has its own grammar and is very rich in literature.

You will remember that during the colonial time Kiswahili literature was never offered in the exams because we were told that our language has none. In other words these researches help make our people understand and appreciate their culture.

Q:— Where do you get the teachers for the foreign languages and what are the problems you face in recruiting them?

A:— So far we get our teachers through grants from friendly countries like France, Britain and Egypt. As for Portuguese we have decided to recruit them using our own resources. We are still communicating with some countries as regards to their recruitment. The only problem we have so far encountered is the question of Portuguese teachers. There is some unwillingness even to acknowledge our letters.

Q:— What plans are there to localise the teaching staff?

A:— We have asked some countries to provide scholarships to promising students from our institute to specialise in those languages so as to form a nucleus of the teaching staff. But it will take some time before this is realised since at this stage none of our students has even completed the institute's diploma course.

Q:— What are the future plans of the institute?

A:— In the next five years, the institute plans to teach the existing official languages of the UNO. We are also planning to start a centre under the umbrella of the institute to teach translation and interpretation skills so that we are able to produce in the next seven years interpreters of international standard in all the existing official languages of the UN. A Swahili/Arabic dictionary is also envisaged.

The projects are reflected in the aide momoire between Tanzania and UNESCO as a result of the visit last year of the director general of UNESCO; and negotiations are going on very well.

We are also planning to teach one or two African languages. This will surely help in the mutual recognition of other people's culture. We are also planning to organise specialized training in teaching Kiswahili as a foreign language. There is a big demand for teachers throughout the world and many are taking the challenge with the sole qualification that Kiswahili is their mother tongue. I think you will agree with me that Kiswahili like any other language has to be taught systematically and scientifically as well.

THIRTY STUDENTS SENT TO PAKISTAN FOR THREE YEAR COURSE RECALLED

SPM Manager's Statement

Dar es Salaam SUNDAY NEWS in English 1 Nov 81 p 1

[Article by Mkumbwa Ally]

[Text]

THIRTY Tanzanians sent to Pakistan for a three-year course leading to technician certificates returned home in August this year after spending fourteen months at a Lahore training institute.

The trainees, sponsored by the 2.1 billion/- Southern Paper Mills Company (SPM) of Mufindi, were attending the Lahore Ali Industrial Technical Training Institute (AITI) before they were recalled home.

Confirming this, the SPM General Manager, Ndugu Juma Lweno, told the Sunday News that AITI had failed to meet "the objectives of sending the trainees to Lahore."

Before their recall, the trainees, all Form Four leavers, had complained about inferior education and training offered by the Pakistani institute. They even boycotted classes to drive their point home when it appeared to them that both SPM and AITI were dragging their feet over the matter.

They wrote to the Education Counsellor at the Tanzania High Commission in New Delhi, explaining that AITI usually trained Form Two leavers and was awarding trade certificates — the lowest award in the engineering field.

The institute, they said, had old and defective machines for practical training, adding that much of the equipment was "out of order and unserviceable."

They added that instruction sheets were out of date, dating back to the sixties.

The thirty trainees had been enrolled for a three-year technician certificate course according to an SPM advertisement in the Daily News of March 31 last year.

SPM General Manager Lweno said his company had inspected AITI (established with Swedish assistance), studied its prospectus and had recommended it for a technician certificate course for the trainees.

He added that AITI had been picked with the expectation that the trainees would simultaneously obtain practical training at a nearby paper mill, Packages Limited.

A report now with the Sunday News says most of the AITI instructors were Form Two leavers who "find it a torture to communicate in English."

In most cases, it says, instructions at the institute were given in Hindu, to the disadvantage of the SPM trainees.

Ndugu Lweno said half of the thirty withdrawn trainees had been reselected for a three-year technician certificate course in India starting next month.

He said fourteen others were with the National Development Corporation (NDC) companies for in-plant training leading to Government trade testing, adding that another had been dismissed on disciplinary grounds.

However, it is understood that SPM is yet to recover 1,563,680/- (US dollars 192,960) paid out for the first two years of the trainees' stay.

The money had been given to Packages Limited to administer on behalf of SPM under "a gentlemen's agreement," according to sources.

Two senior SPM officials sent to Pakistan in April this year to study the situation criticised the gentlemen's arrangement, urging the necessity of a written agreement.

In their report, the two said, "This (written agreement) is very important because the sum involved is very big. There should be some sort of written agreement to replace the gentlemen's agreement in force."

Ndugu Lweno conceded that AITI and Packages Limited had been paid the training fees for the two years but said that SPM had signed an agreement with Packages Limited.

He said there were now negotiations to reclaim "all unused funds" and explained that AITI would be asked to refund the fees for the useless 14 months spent there by the SPM trainees.

SPM Management to Blame

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 3 Nov 81 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE latest publication of the sister newspaper, the Sunday News, carried a very disconcerting story on its first page — that of the recall of thirty Tanzanian trainees from Pakistan.

One of the country's biggest industrial investments, the Southern Paper Mills Company (SPM), had deemed it fit not only to send the trainees to a questionable Lahore institute but also to pay in advance the fees for the first two of the three-year course.

There is absolutely nothing wrong with sending Tanzanians to study in Lahore, provided that the training facilities therein were competent.

But, the facilities were not competent. The thirty trainees had even to boycott classes to drive the point home that the training was not only useless for them but also for the whole country that was footing the training bill.

Even more worrying, is the difference in perception as to the value and significance of the Lahore training institute in the eyes of the top and lower echelons of SPM.

The top management conceded that it had to recall the trainees home because the Lahore institute had not met "the objectives of sending the trainees to Lahore".

The top management was only — belatedly — reinforcing the views of the two-member probing team sent by the SPM to investigate the appalling training facilities in the Pakistani town.

Yet, the very same top management has admitted that it had sent the thirty hapless Tanzanians after having "ascertained" that the Lahore institute was worthwhile investing in some 1.5 million shillings in hard currency.

This being the case, the top SPM management must explain to the Tanzanian public why the thirty trainees had to be sent to that particular Lahore institute and why the advance payment.

Even if the money paid out in advance to the Lahore institute and Packages Limited were to be returned to SPM (a very unlikely proposition), this would not exonerate the SPM management from blame.

Of course, there is nothing wrong with sending Tanzanians abroad for training in as many diverse fields as possible. There is no doubt that we need skilled Tanzanians to run our production and service bodies.

The mere numbers of expatriates, nearly all of whom must be paid in foreign currency, attests to the importance of giving advanced training to our own nationals.

But, we have to ensure that only reputable institutions are the recipients of our nationals. Equally important, we must ascertain that only the best students are sent abroad to receive the training.

FAMILY WELFARE-WORKERS' EDUCATION TO BE INTEGRATED

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 4 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by Simeon Ileta]

[Text]

GOVERNMENT and workers' representatives yesterday endorsed the integration of family welfare education into the country's workers' education programme.

Representatives of several institutions including the Prime Minister's Office, the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, the Tanzania Workers Organisation (JUWATA) and the Association of Tanzania Employers (ATE) agreed at their two-day meeting which ended in Dar es Salaam that family welfare education was relevant to Tanzania.

The participants, who also included experts from the Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) and the International Labour Organisation (ILO) observed that since emphasis in Tanzania's workers' education programme had so far been on workers themselves, it was now time it involved the families of the workers.

Family welfare education has been the subject of a three-year study under the Population/Family Life Education (PFLE) project, assisted by the UN Fund for Population Activities (UNPA), executed by FAO and co-ordinated by the Prime Minister's Office.

The meeting directed the PFLE project to liaise with the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare (Workers' Education Division) to ensure that family welfare education was fused into the existing workers education programme.

A small committee, to function a sub-committee of the project's executive committee, has been formed to advise the project on the details and factors involved in integrating this education into programmes for workers' education.

Members of the sub-committee will come from the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, JUWATA, the Social Welfare Training Institute, ATE, the Tanzania Women Organisation (UWT) and UMATI.

Others will be drawn from the Ministry of Health, the Group Occupational Health Project, the Tanzania Food and Nutrition Centre and the Prime Minister's Office.

In a keynote address to the meeting on Monday, the Minister for Labour and Social Welfare, Ndugu Alfred Tandau said in a speech read on his behalf by the Ministry's Principal Secretary, Ndugu Horace Kolimba, that family welfare education, if effectively imparted, could contribute to better living conditions and quality of life.

Ndugu Tandau revealed an alarming situation facing Tanzania at present whereby children (aged below 15) who constitute a dependant section of the country's community were greater in number than the labour force — those aged between 15-64.

He warned that unless this was checked through increased labour productivity by the productive labour force, the standard of living of everyone and the economic growth of the country faced a danger of negative growth.

He said increased productivity could be achieved through the creation of better working conditions for workers both at places of work and at home. Family welfare education, he stressed, could play a big role in achieving this goal.

The PFLE Project's National Manager, Ndugu Hadji Konde, said at the end of the meeting that they were satisfied with the proposals.

"It is now a question of the mechanics of integrating this education. We will follow up on the decision of the meeting", he added.

TANZANIAN, GDR EXPERTS REACH UNDERSTANDING ON STUDENT EXCHANGE

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 2 Nov 81 p 3

[Article by Emma Faraji]

[Text]

TANZANIAN and German Democratic Republic (GDR) educational experts recently reached an understanding on possibilities of exchanging of students.

The understanding was reached during a twelve-day visit to the GDR by representatives of the Ministry of National Education who held "good talks" with educational experts in the GDR, the Commissioner for National Education, Ndugu M. Muze, said in Dar es Salaam yesterday.

Ndugu Muze who was accompanied by the Principal of Dar es Salaam Technical College. Ndugu S. Mutasa, to the GDR, said the two sides had indicated fields for possible future exchanges.

For Tanzania these were sending students for technical, medical, veterinary and agricultural studies.

The GDR was interested in sending its students to study Kiswahili in Tanzania, Ndugu Muze said.

He said more details on technical exchange, including possible numbers of students to be involved, would be worked out in future.

He indicated, however, that the number of students exchanged would invariably change from year to year according to each country's needs.

Ndugu Muze said they were impressed by the GDR's educational policy and particularly provisions made for students to undertake practicals in industries.

"They have a very good system of binding contracts between colleges and industries so that students have easy access to practicals", he said.

He said although there was a system to allow students in Tanzania to do practicals in industries, there was no bond between college and industry, adding that sometimes a student could report at a factory and be told there was no vacancy.

The discussions, held with representatives of the GDR ministry of higher technical education, also dwelt on the differences in educational levels such as certificates and diplomas in the two countries.

During their visit, the Tanzanian education officials toured various higher technical training colleges in Berlin, Dresden, Leipzig, Magdeburg and Postdam in southern and western GDR.

They also conferred with Tanzanian students in the GDR. Over forty students are undertaking courses which include engineering, medicine, physical education and languages.

CUSTOMS DEMANDS TAFICO ANSWER CHARGES RELATING TO MARINE EXPORTS

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 2 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

THE Customs and Excise Department of the Ministry of Finance has demanded that the Tanzania Fisheries Corporation (TAFICO) answer charges in connection with marine resources exports.

Customs officials, who have been carrying out independent investigations on the TAFICO/Atlantic Fishing Company (AFC) joint fishing venture, said in Dar es Salaam at the weekend that marine resources exports worth 4,624,220/- were uncustomed.

In the process, the officials said, the Government was deprived of 150,962/- in royalties. It is understood that 184.540 tonnes of table fish, prawns and shrimps were shipped uncustomed between April 3 and July 7, this year.

According to the officials, the uncustomed exports include the whole of AFC's share of the proceedings agreed upon under an "unconscionable" contract signed in July last year.

AFC, managed by Greek businessman Theodor Penessis, appropriated 75 per cent of the exports before the deal was "ammended" last March, allowing him 65 per cent of the share of exported catches.

TAFICO is required to answer three charges of loading uncustomed cargo, exporting restricted goods without licence and making or causing to make incorrect application for diversion of Government royalties amounting to 150,962/-.

TAFICO, the officials have said, is held as the local agent of AFC. If found guilty of the offences, TAFICO would be required to pay the royalties to the Ministry of Natural Resources and Tourism and recover the undeclared value of exports under the Customs and Management Act.

Customs investigations indicate that TAFICO and AFC loaded onto a Greek vessel, m.v. Archangelos on April 3, this year, 12.84 tonnes of ordinary fish, but declared only 6.44 tonnes to customs officials at the Dar es Salaam port.

This implied a difference of 6.40 tonnes of fish worth 371,910/-. The same ship loaded 130 tonnes of shrimps, but only 36.29 tonnes were declared, a difference of 93.70 tonnes worth 2,248,920/-, the investigations revealed.

The officials said the shipload included eight tonnes of craw fish valued at 192,000/- which were not declared to customs officials at the port.

M.v. Archangelos, they added, hauled away 15 tonnes of table fish and 89 others of shrimps last July 7, of which only 4,809 and 23.15 tonnes, respectively, were declared in Dar es Salaam.

Some 10.191 tonnes of fish worth 92,228/- and 66.249 tonnes of shrimps valued at 1,719,169/50 escaped export levy and customs documentation, the investigations revealed.

The officials said the calculation were based on the lowest export price of 24/- per kilogramme claimed by TAFICO.

It is understood that an initial price index prepared by TAFICO put the highest export price at 78/60 and the lowest at over 30/- per kilogramme according to the classification of different types of the marine resources.

The investigations revealed, however, that the corporation's payment vouchers claiming the export earnings, did not indicate the classifications.

The TAFICO-AFC contract was rescinded by the Government early last month because it was contrary to established procedures. The Ministry of Natural Resources and Tourism said in a statement that the contract was not ratified by the TAFICO Board of Directors, nor was it approved by relevant Government institutions.

The decision to nullify was prompted by a report by a team appointed to probe investigative reports by the Daily News expressing fears that the Government could have lost up to 200million/- in foreign exchange under the unsconcionable deal.

However, the team dismissed this fear, maintaining that TAFICO earned a total of 224,484 US dollars (about 2,095,872/- from the exports without investing in the operations of the joint venture.

The TAFICO authorities were at the weekend unavailable for comment on the customs charges and findings.

TRIAL PROGRAM OF INCENTIVES FOR SISAL CUTTERS ANNOUNCED

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 4 Nov 81 p 1

[Article by Charles Kifunta]

[Text]

AMBONI Limited, a group of sisal estates in Tanga Region, has launched an ambitious incentive-giving programme, including monthly salary increase, generous gifts and prizes to its sisal cutters.

Under the programme, a sisal cutter can now earn up to 1,040/- per month instead of the maximum 635/- now offered to sisal cutters in the country.

The programme, known as Mkato Bora (Super Cutter Category), began last Saturday and is aimed at encouraging daily attendance and work efficiency for the benefit of the worker, the company and the nation as a whole.

The programme is contained in a brochure circulated to all the company's sisal estates.

The Amboni Limited General Manager, Ndugu A. Turrian, said in Tanga yesterday that the move to introduce the "Super Cutter Category" had been taken to encourage people who are willing to work hard. It was also introduced after seeing that a lot of sisal leaf was rotting in the field.

Ndugu Turrian said the move was aimed at boosting the country's badly needed foreign exchange.

Ndugu Turrian added that the move followed talks recently between the Prime Minister, Ndugu Cleopa Msuya, and the company's board of directors from Europe.

According to the programme, a worker who cuts 110 bundles of sisal leaves is paid 700/-, 120 bundles 770/-, 130 bundles 850/-, 140 bundles 940/- and a cutter who achieves 150 bundles daily for the whole month will get 1,040/-.

However, Ndugu Turrian stressed that the new wages do not fall under the official contract signed with JUWATA and could be withdrawn should the system fail.

The programme also says if a worker reported for duty each day he would get a kilogramme of sugar and one toilet soap at mid-month and another kilogramme and one bar of washing soap at the end of the month.

It further says that the cutter would be paid an advance payment of 100/- in the first week after getting his previous month's salary, 200/- advance payment at mid-month and another 100/- on the third Saturday of the month.

The programme also guarantees a worker to get all his provisions from a company shop within the estate on special loan terms and is guaranteed that such a shop would always be fully stocked with essential items, including clothing.

It also says that, a worker who reports for duty daily for three consecutive months, would be given a free plastic bucket inscribed with his own name — and if he does so for six months he would get free clothing worth 100/- or 160/- if he works continuously for nine months.

According to the programme, a worker would be granted a one-week leave in addition to his normal annual leave after working for 11 months.

He would also qualify for a lottery which offers various prizes, including a bicycle and a radio set.

Ndugu Turrian said the programme would start on trial basis for six months.

TANESCO SEEKING TO CURB OVERLOADING OF POWER LINES

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 29 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

DAR ES SALAAM residents living in areas affected by frequent electricity cuts could experience more constant, uninterrupted flows following efforts by the Tanzania Electrical Supply Company (TANESCO) to curb lines overloading.

According to TANESCO's spokesman, an on-going programme to erect sub-stations in various areas of the city is intended to alleviate the problem of over extension of low tension lines (ltl). One such sub-station has recently been set up in Laibon Road, Oyster Bay.

Low voltage problems experienced in some of the city's areas have been attributed by TANESCO experts to lack of adequate and prompt information from individuals on their future expansion programmes.

In many cases smooth flow of high powered electricity is hard to come by in the city's residential areas because domestic consumers increase their power consumption through acquiring new electrical appliances without informing the company.

The spokesman said the exercise to increase the number of sub-stations in the city is also to be extended to Chatto Street, Migamboni Street in Regent estate, Haile Selaisse Road in Msasani, Mwananyamala, Buguruni and Diamond Jubilee area.

Other areas to receive new sub-stations are Lugalo pumps, Drive-In and Mwaya Road.

The exercise to relieve transformers of overloaded distribution started in September but it is not known how long it would take to complete the exercise, the spokesman said. . .

He said areas to be worked on during the on-going process are Mwananyamala dispensary, Binti Matola Street, Uhuru Street, Chang'ombe, and Mburahati.

GOVERNMENT INTRODUCES MEASURES TO ENSURE FAIR MEAT PRICES

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE government has introduced measures geared at ensuring fair prices of cattle meat to consumers in the country, the Minister for Livestock Development Ndugu Herman Kirigini said in Dar es Salaam yesterday.

The Minister said the measures, would include control and supervision of the cattle industry from the stage when cattle is brought for auctioning from villages to slaughtering and selling to consumers in urban centres.

He said the move has been necessitated by the irregular and exorbitant prices of meat sold to customers in the country. Of late a number of consumers particularly in Dar es Salaam city have complained of irregular prices, with a kilo of meat selling at more than 35/-.

Ndugu Kirigini revealed that steps were being taken to ensure that cattle at auction centres in villages were weighed and graded, and sold to licenced buyers.

"There are 300 cattle auction centres in the country and we expect to equip each centre with a weighing scale. So far we have already purchased 120 scales. This year we expected to purchase some 50 more scales. The rest would be purchased in future", he said.

The Minister said the steps were part of recommendations presented by his ministry to the government in efforts to reach fare meat pricing in the respective zones of the country.

He said in most regions the price of meat was being controlled by the district authorities with the District Development Director in his capacity as Assistant Price Commissioner, Supervising them.

However in Dar es Salaam, he added, the prices were quite irregular since the demise of the Dar es Salaam Development Corporation (DDC) — run butcheries a few years ago.

TRADE OFFICERS' SEMINAR PASSES RESOLUTIONS ON TRANSPORT, PRICES

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 30 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

THE fixing of prices on a pan-territorial basis was criticised here yesterday by the national trade seminar participants, who said the system overlooked the high cost of transporting goods to the rural areas, resulting in hiked prices of commodities in the villages.

The country's trade and weight and measures officers, who ended the seminar yesterday, said in a resolution that transport charges should be controlled at national level as a matter of urgency.

They stressed that the National Price Commission should consider transport costs when fixing prices because in the absence of this, prices in villages went high.

The commission should fix prices up to regional headquarters level from where the regions could fix the prices up to village level after considering transport costs to the rural destinations.

Regions should be given powers to fix prices of essential goods like sembe, salt, sugar and soap, they recommended.

They asked the Price Commission to send copies of new prices to the regions in advance before publication in the mass media.

The participants also called upon the commission to educate people in the regions on how prices are fixed.

The seminar considered the question of encouraging inter or intra-regional trade for crops which no specific authority dealt with. The participants proposed that a special committee be formed to discuss the matter.

But during discussions this afternoon, participants agreed that the trade should be cordinated and people dealing in this business should be registered so that they traded openly.

The participants also said failures which impeded trade between regions should be removed.

In their resolutions, they also asked the government to prepare another timetable for implementing the internal trade policy in view of the current problems. Such problems include the closure of some of the opened shops and the problems facing Regional Trading Companies (RTCs). They further agreed that:

- The Ministry of Trade should introduce a radio programme to educate Tanzanians on the policy;
- Industries should use standard packaging materials;
- The office of the Registrar of Companies should open offices in the regions to speed up registration;
- Regional trade officers should inform the Board of External Trade on problems of moving goods from the regions to facilitate implementation of the National Economic Survival Programme;
- The Ministry of Trade should prepare trading licences application forms before the end of December every year.

Closing the seminar, the Shinyanga Regional Party Secretary, Ndugu Gwasa Sebabili, asked the participants, as implementors, to understand the Party policy.

He said the Ministry of Trade should prevent the selling of confined items which is now taking place in regions with large industries like Dar es Salaam and Arusha.

The seminar which had opened on October 19 was attended by 78 trade officers and weights and measures officers from all over the country.

AGRICULTURE MINISTRY DIRECTS TAT TO REDUCE COSTS

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 27 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

THE Ministry of Agriculture has directed the Tanzania Tobacco Authority (TAT) to reduce costs, improvise efficient inputs supply, improve marketing arrangement, extension services and financial control in order to revamp the tobacco industry in the country.

The directive made available to the press yesterday, says the measures are geared to improve the authority's operational performance so that it can provide better services to tobocco growers and the national economy as a whole.

It says that TAT should immediately cease operations in areas where it has been operating at a loss and where there has been no increase in output towards a break-even level.

In such areas TAT has been directed to hand over responsibility for extension to Kilimo extension staff at district level. The areas involved include Liwale, Biharamulo and for the burley tobacco production areas in Morogoro and Handeni.

In regions where TAT's operations are unprofitable but where output is growing rapidly, the directive says TAT should either make operations profitable within three years, by reducing costs and increasing turnover, or cease operations there.

The areas include Mpanda where there has been an increase from 2 per cent of total output in 1975/76 to five per cent in 1979/80 but costs in the area were at 5/88 per kilo which is well above the break-even point.

TAT has also been told to identify the high cost areas within other regions and either cease operations there or reduce costs or increase production to a level that makes operations profitable.

The directive says that the authority would have to reduce the number of staffs to an acceptable level. "In 1979, 38 per cent of the total staff were in the administration department and 15 per cent in the finance department.

On higher prices to growers, the Ministry directed TAT to concentrate on improving efficiency and reducing costs, so as to benefit growers.

The Ministry has further directed the authority to inform the Ministry immediately if foreign exchange shortage limits the supply of necessary inputs and reduces exports.

"For example, it has been estimated that shortages of Hessian, due to non-availability of foreign exchange, lost Tanzania 33 million/- in export earnings from tobacco last year," it explains.

It has also been directed that authority should establish its own seed farm at Urambo. "In the past seed has been produced, from impure strains, at Tumbi where seed production has been seen as an unwelcome distraction from research."

The Ministry has directed TAT to establish tree planting programme to ensure that one hectare of trees is planted for every three hactares of tobacco in areas where wood is in short supply.

The directive says shortage of wood is already a major constraint on tobacco production and may bring flu-cured tobacco production to a halt in many villages. "In 1980, the area of new trees planted was only 2½ per cent of the area used by tobacco industry," it says.

It also calls for improved marketing arrangements which would include the establishment of a commercial grading operation and establishment of communal grading sheds.

The directive states that punitive action should be taken against growers and those villages whose tobacco is consistently mixed, or deceptively packed or is downgraded at Morogoro.

"In 1979 TAT lost 41 million/- because tobacco bought at one grade had to be sold at a price lower than the announced grade price," it explains.

TFC ASKS GOVERNMENT TO SPEED UP WORK ON LOCAL PHOSPHATE PROJECTS

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 28 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

THE Tanzania Fertiliser Company (TFC) currently facing problems of raw materials, has appealed to the government to speed up work on local projects that would feed the plant.

The appeal was made in Tanga on Monday by the company's Acting General Manager Ndugu J. Milinga in the wake of mounting difficulties in getting imported raw materials.

He called on the government to spead up exploration work at the Minjingu rock phosphate deposits near Lake Manyara in Arusha so as to substitute imported phosphate in the manufacture of fertilisers at the plant.

The 193.8 million shilling Minjungu phosphate mine whose foundation stone was laid by President Nyerere in August this year, is expected to start commercial production towards the end of next year.

TFC, the principal customer of the Minjungu phosphate would save about 70 million shillings in foreign currency by utilising the local mineral, Ndugu Milinga noted.

For normal production, the plant requires some 200 million shillings in foreign currency annualy for the importation of raw materials — an amount which the manager said was not obtainable, following the current shortage of foreign exchange.

Ndugu Milinga observed that only a local alternative to the problem would save the factory from further production snags.

The West Germany aided plant was shutdown last week for annual machine overhauling and is expected to resume production later next month.

The manager has assured farmers that the factory had enough stock of fertilisers and there should be no cause for alarm.

TRADE MINISTER'S ADDRESS CONCLUDES TIB SEMINAR

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 25 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Wonceslaus Mushi]

[Text]

SUCCESS of the National Economic Survival Programme (NESP) will depend on the flexibility of plans and fast decision-making by implementors to respond to changing situations.

The Minister for Trade, involved in the day-to-day running Ndugu Ali Mchumo told over a 100 participants of industry and agriculture to work out serious plans and implement them on this basis. He was closing the week-long seminar of the Tanzania Investment Bank (TIB) which discussed planning, agricultural development, taxation and monetary policies and the role of the Tanzania Legal Corporation (TLC) in the execution of contracts.

Ndugu Mchumo said the programme, which among other objectives, sets an export target of six billion/- during this financial year could only succeed if enterprises translate the goals and objectives into workable programmes.

He said the establishment had to work out serious plans and implement them as soon as practicable, bearing in mind the need for flexibility.

"For instance if the price for export of raw cashewnuts should appear higher than the price for cashew kernels processed at the factory in Masasi where you are likely to face diesel problems due to transportation bottlenecks, then a decision needs to be made fast to export the raw cashews so as to earn the country a badly needed foreign exchange", he told the participants.

He said that would enable the country to import other critical inputs including the diesel which was a handicap in the processing factory.

"It is up to you to bring up to the government with proper argumentation such cases so that appropriate action can be taken", he told the executives of enterprises.

Ndugu Mchumo also stressed the need to improve capacity utilization in the existing enterprises before embarking on new ventures. He said the surplus which may result from the improved utilization can then be used for creation of future assets.

He said projects whose implementation had been delayed for a long time should now be completed to enhance economic efficiency.

The minister said future TIB seminars should focus on the problem of co-ordination and distribution within the economy as well as with neighbouring countries.

"I have a feeling that even information flow is lacking among manufacturers within the country as well as with our neighbours", he said.

Meanwhile, participants to the seminar have recommended that senior Party and government officials be invited to take part in future seminars of the bank.

They stressed that this was necessary because of the importance of the topics discussed at such seminars, and the presence of the people involved in direct implementation.

The resolution, one of the seven adopted at the end of the week-long seminar, was prompted by complaints by the participants that their many quarries on issues of policy went unanswered because representatives from the government or party, were absent.

The resolutions cover calls mainly to streamline economic and financial policies to raise performance in all sectors of the economy.

They for instance a call for detailed sectoral planning for better coordination of activities of different ministries but also on the ministry to engage qualified staff to monitor project implementation and recommend corrective action.

ZANZIBAR GOVERNMENT AMENDS 1967 TRADE ACT

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 25 Oct 81 p 3

[Article by Salim S. Salim]

[Text]

OVER the past few years Zanzibar and Pemba have experienced turns of plenty and shortages. A particular commodity fills the shelves at the shops and the godowns. Its disappearance, however, is guaranteed to be just around the corner.

This cycle in man's war against commodities in the isles has again and again puzzled both the authorities and the public.

As a result, some people (the better off) have been forced to buy some commodities in bulk for fear that the items might run out. In turn, the panic buying has contributed to the sudden disappearance of the same goods from the shops.

Goods disappearing from the Isles' shops have been those produced within Zanzibar and those imported from the mainland and from outside.

The group of people who have been taking advantage of the situation to make big profits is none other than the so-called petty traders.

These are mostly young men and women who ply to and from the mainland carrying with them small items such as needles to such huge expensive equipment like refrigerators and television sets.

Items brought in from the Mainland — such as cooking oil, toilet soap and tooth paste — are being carried in abundance from Zanzibar for "re-export" to the mainland once a shortage is experienced in Dar es Salaam for sale at exorbitant prices.

Some of these Petty traders" have been regular passengers aboard the Zanzibar government steamers which make twice a week trips between the two parts of the United Republic, and twice a day by Air Tanzania flights. But the well-established traders prefer chartered flights.

It is in the light of this situation with a complicated background that the Zanzibar Government decided to act last week. It introduced an amendment to the 1967 Trade Act.

The amendment which will culminate in the establishment of a General Council of Trade and the establishment of a Tender Board is expected in the long run to take care of the situation and to streamline trade within and outside Zanzibar.

The Bill which sparked off a lively debate in the House of Representatives before it was passed, now awaits the consent of the President of Zanzibar, Ndugu Aboud Jumbe, who returned from England last week where he underwent successful ear operation.

There has undoubtedly been some concern among members of the public that a firm control of the import and export trade may bring inconvenience to the consumers.

Some people were worried that a clause banning re-exportation of goods may irk those with relatives on the mainland and would like to send to them some "presents".

But it was evident during the winding up of the debate by Trade Minister Idi Pandu Hassan that the clause banning re-exportation would not actually cover people who carry with them three kilogrammes of wheat flour or a piece of suiting material with them out of Zanzibar.

Those who took with them hundreds of kilogrammes of rice and dozens of suiting materials for sale in Dar es Salaam and carried back with them items in short supply in Zanzibar for sale at a high profit in Zanzibar were the target, the minister said.

During the debate in the House, some of the members suggested that the number of ministers in the proposed General Council of Trade be reduced from four to one and their places be taken by representatives of the People's Bank of Zanzibar, the Board of External Trade and the Zanzibar State Trading Corporation.

This would ensure that the organisations directly involved in trade became part of the new system and would thus not escape responsibility for any poor implementation of the new trade system.

Other members were worried that neither the representatives of the police nor of the anti-smuggling squad (KMKM) were to be involved in the Council of Trade.

A clause providing for the setting up of a sub committee to issue import and export permits if the need arose also came under fire in the House although all the members supported the bill as timely.

But, summing up the bill, the Minister of Trade promised that the suggested formation of a sub committee would be dropped, adding that the advice given by the representatives would be seriously considered.

Parallel with the formation of the General Council of Trade will be the setting up of a Tender Board.

The proposed tender board is expected to take care of reports of some irregularities and cheatings experienced by the people of Zanzibar in both import and export trade.

Welcoming the establishment of the tender board, the representatives said there should in addition be a special team to inspect the quality and quantity of an imported item before it was offloaded at the Zanzibar harbour.

Past experience with substandard imports gave rise to this suggestion of quality control.

As the Isles await the new trade act to come into force, many hope that the system will not only minimise the shortages but will also help Zanzibar to conserve its foreign exchange.

It is understood that a shipment of rice once estimated to last nine months took only two months before the stock ran down and suiting materials which could have, under normal circumstances stayed in the shops for four months took only a week before the shopkeepers pronounced the most hated word to the consumer — "finished".

The setting up of the General Council of Trade to take care of the export and import trade, the setting up of a tender board and the definition of penalties for the culprits (this was not spelled out in the 1967 Trade Act) is a step in the right direction.

The "petty traders" and racketeers will grumble because their area of manipulation will be minimised.

But everything will remain on paper if every islander will not co-operate to ensure the successful implementation of the system. After all, they will suffer if the new system fails.

NAFCO INCREASES WHEAT, RICE PRODUCTION 1976-1981

Manager Notes Trends, Prospects

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 4 Nov 81 p 1

[Article by Seth Kamuhanda]

[Text]

PRODUCTION of wheat and rice at the National Food Corporation (NAFCO) farms has been steadily increasing over the past five years and at times surpassing the projected targets, the NAFCO General Manager, Ndugu A.S. Kaduri, said here yesterday.

Speaking on trends and prospects of NAFCO's activities at the on-going managers' conference, Ndugu Kaduri noted that between 1976 and this year wheat production rose at an annual average rate of 2,963 tonnes or 16.6 per cent.

He said whereas in 1976 when wheat production started to shoot up only 8,203 tonnes were harvested from 7,984 hectares, the figures had been increasing over the following years up to last season (1980/81) during which 25,981 tonnes of wheat were produced from 7,984 hectares.

He told the conference that wheat produced by NAFCO now accounted for 90.6 per cent of the total National Milling Corporation (NMC) estimated local purchase for 1981/82 which stands at 28,600 tonnes, for 19 per cent of the national wheat demand.

About 99.6 per cent of all the wheat produced by the corporation comes from the Basuto wheat complex in Hanang District, Arusha Region, Ndugu Kaduri said.

On rice production, Ndugu Kaduri explained that despite operational problems, such as lack of funds and spare parts, the production of the crop had been recording a steady increase during the same period and that last season it surpassed the projected target.

"A major success was scored in rice production in 1980/81 season when a total of 23,696 tonnes were harvested from 3,247 hectares to a projected target of 21,226 tonnes from 3,103 hectares", he noted.

This means that the total output of rice during the season surpassed the projected target by 12 per cent, Ndugu Kaduri said.

He added that the Mbarali farm in Mbeya Region, which alone contributed 21,596 tonnes of the total output last season, made a record average production of 8.15 tonnes per hectare.

NAFCO, he said, this year would contribute 14,350 tonnes of rice to the national food demand after making some reservations for seed. This is 47.5 per cent of the total NMC's local purchases in 1980 which was 30,200 tonnes, he pointed out.

On maize and sorghum production, Ndugu Kaduri said large scale production of the two crops was still at the initial stage, with only a slight increase in their output.

He, however, added that the Mbozi maize farm whose production has been growing at a rate of 17.7 per cent a year, would be expanded from 600 hectares cultivated this year to 2,000 hectares.

Concerning bad weather conditions, Ndugu Kaduri explained that NAFCO planned to turn to irrigation agriculture.

NAFCO Must Help Increase Peasants' Output

THE challenge for self-sufficiency in food production is ever more real and the government is sparing no effort to encourage food crop production in peasant holdings and state farms.

Over the past few years, agriculture has suffered a serious setback mostly due to adverse weather conditions and the country has been forced to import food to meet the deficit.

Since food imports encroach on our meagre foreign currency resources, it is imperative that we do everything in our power to produce enough food to feed our population.

The overall economic position of the country, like elsewhere in Africa, is pathetic. It means our capacity to generate enough foreign exchange to meet food imports and other priority needs is most handicapped.

Highest concern right now is to utilise whatever available foreign exchange to meet such needs as medicines and essential raw materials. Government commitments made must be only for projects intended to yield foreign exchange in the shortest time.

It is threatening to learn that the National Food Corporation (NAFCO) is embarked on a programme to expand the acreage of food crop farms.

Work is already underway at the Gawa wheat farm in Arusha and Dakawa Rice farm in Morogoro where production is expected to start before the end of this financial year.

In its other projections, NAFCO plans to open up a maize farm at Namtumbo in Ruvuma Region next year along with consolidating production at its existing farms elsewhere in the country.

The contribution of NAFCO to the national food basket, however, must go hand in hand with increased productivity and production in peasant farms — village farms as well as those belonging to individuals.

This further means that we have to be ever more methodical in the choice of crops that can be grown in specific areas of our vast country.

NAFCO has spread its activities throughout the country. Therefore, it should be utilised as a ready reservoir for modern agricultural methods to be passed on to the people so that they can improve farm produce.

In this way we can attain the goal of self-sufficiency in food production and reduce the unnecessary burden of having to import food with scarce foreign exchange.

NAFCO TO START THREE MORE FARMS TO INCREASE FOOD OUTPUT

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 3 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

THE National Food Corporation (NAFCO) is to start three more large-scale farms and expand the acreage of its existing farms in a bid to increase food crop production.

Briefing Shihata on its activities at the opening of a one-week managers' conference, which started in Tanga yesterday, a NAFCO spokesman said two of the three farms are to start production this year.

These are the Gawa farm in Arusha Region, which will undertake wheat production, and the Dakawa rice farm in Morogoro Region.

The Gawa farm will have 2,000 hectares of wheat and its average production has been estimated at 7.1 tonnes per hectare.

The Dakawa rice farm, whose establishment has been financially assisted by the African Development Bank (ADB) has 2,000 hectares.

The spokesman said the third farm would be started next year at Namtumbo in Ruvuma Region to undertake maize production. It will initially have 180 hectares of maize but it will be expanded to 4,000 hectares after five years

The Namtumbo farm will be launched with assistance from the Soviet Union and is the second maize farm under NAFCO. The corporation already runs a large scale maize farm at Mbozi in Mbeya Region.

The spokesman said plans were underway to start production of rice in the Madibira and Kapinga farms in the near future.

On wheat production, the spokesman said the corporation was currently carrying out a survey in the Loliondo area of Arusha Region with a view to starting wheat farms there.

He noted that already a preliminary survey of the area has indicated that it was suitable for wheat production.

The corporation also expects to explore more areas in the country suitable for large scale food crop irrigation farming.

PREPARATIONS FOR DRILLING OF SEVENTH COAST TEST WELL START

Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 3 Nov 81 p 1

[Article by Nkumbwa Ally]

[Text] Preparations for the drilling of the seventh test well on the Tanzanian coast in search for oil have started at Kimbiji on Mafia Island under an agreement between the Tanzania Petroleum Development Corporation (TPDC) and Sonatrach of Algeria.

The TPDC General Manager, Ndugu S. Barongo, said in Dar es Salaam yesterday that Sonatrach had already moved to Mafia a drilling rig they were using on Songo Songo island. The project was scheduled to start last August.

Ndugu Barongo could not say how much had been done on the Kimbiji Well — East-1. "Some TPDC officials are on site to see the progress made, and before they report back, I cannot give a definite answer," he explained.

The General Manager said, however, that work on the well had been delayed for "a couple of weeks" which he attributed to logistic complexities, but added that efforts would be made to recover the lost time.

"Everything seems to be under control although the reality (of the work) appears to be slightly different from earlier expectations", he said.

The Algerian government has extended an 80m/- (10 million dollars) loan to Tanzania to finance the drilling and seismic survey on Mafia Island to determine future drilling activities. Both projects are undertaken by Sonatrach.

Ndugu Barongo explained that the survey, earlier scheduled to commence last month, had been delayed on financial grounds. The four-month project, he said, "has encountered some problems on the financing side".

He said TPDC was negotiating with donor agencies for an additional 36.8 million/- (4.6 million dollars) to finance the seismic survey.

"After breaking the 10 million dollar Algerian loan into nuts and bolts, we have found out we need an additional three to 4.6 million dollars to finance both projects", he explained.

The 4,000-metre well, the first serious attempt at oil prospecting on Mafia Island, was preceded by six others on Songo Songo island. Ndugu Barongo said drilling of the sixth well — SS-5 — had been completed, but he could not give further details.

The off-shore well was scheduled for completion last July. The Minister for Water and Energy, Ndugu Al Noor Kassum told the last Parliamentary Budget session that the outcome of SS-5 would determine further drilling activities on the island.

"There are good signs that we could get oil in the coastal belt, but drilling is the best way of ascertaining its quantity and quality", he told the House.

The Minister cautioned MPs that it took Canada 50 years of prospecting; 75 years in Australia and between 20 and 30 years in West African countries to ascertain their oil reserves.

Out of the five test wells drilled on Songo Songo (excluding SS-5), only one has confirmed existence of natural gas deposits.

DEVELOPMENT PROJECT SHELVED--Development of 10,000 ha. in the Mkomazi Va-ley in Korogwe District into a modern irrigation scheme at a cost of 400 million/- have been dropped, it was learnt in Tanga on Friday. The Co-ordinator of the West German-sponsored Tanga Integrated Rural Development Plan (TIRDEP), Heinz Esche told Shihata the idea had been dropped because the project was not economically viable. The decision to shelve the project was made recently in West Germany at a meeting between West German officials and a Tanzania delegation led by the Principal Secretary in the Ministry of Agriculture, Ndugu D. J. Masanja, he said. The project would have been jointly financed by the West Germany through TIRDEP and Tanzania. [Text] [Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 1 Nov 81 p 1]

SCANDINAVIAN AID--Denmark and Norway have decided to accord more assistance to developing countries despite their own problems of unemployment and economic recession. The Minister for Finance, Ndugu Amir Jamal, said in Dar es Salaam yesterday that neither of the two governments were allowing their domestic problems to affect the proportion of income they have decided to allocate to developing countries. Arriving from a six-day visit to the two countries, Ndugu Jamal said the Scandinavian governments had invited him to go there and give them a precise picture of Tanzania's economic situation. "We have an obligation to keep our longtime partners informed of the economic changes that occur in the country', Ndugu Jamal said. Under an agreement signed last December, Denmark is to grant Tanzania 970m/- for the next three years. Norway also agreed to grant Tanzania some 360m/- for the next five years effective March, 1981. Norway has also helped offset balance of payments short-falls by giving Tanzania 204m/- last month. [Text] [Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 2 Nov 81 p 1]

COTTON GIN REHABILITATION--Four Dutch experts have arrived in Mwanza for an economic appraisal of rehabilitating cotton ginneries in Mwanza Region. According to an official who accompanied the experts from the Tanzania Cotton Authority, the team was visiting a number of ginneries in the region to see whether they could be rehabilitated and at what cost. The official said that after the experts had completed their work, another team would also come for an engineering appraisal of the project. The Dutch government has given 85 million/- to help in the rehabilitation of ginneries in Tanzania. Most of the cotton ginneries in Mwanza Region are too old to function, causing pile ups of cotton in the ginneries stores as well as in the villages where the cotton can no longer be bought for lack of storage space. Meanwhile another team of American experts has arrived in Mwanza to undertake the same exercise with a view of recommending to the government how best the ginneries could be rehabilitated. [Text] [Dar es Salaam DAILY NEWS in English 4 Nov 81 p 3]

AIRPORT SECURITY TIGHTENED--Security at the cargo and baggage handling sections of the Dar es Salaam International Airport will be tightened to reduce theft incidents, Air Tanzania General Manager Bakari Mwapachu said in Zanzibar yesterday. In a press interview, he said the situation was now so serious that it called for immediate remedy before it eroded the business reputation of the national flag carrier. He said the ATC management was presently evaluating its security system at the airport in order to locate and remove the bad elements among its staff. "Recent investigations have shown that some of the employees were deeply involved in theft incidents. Normal procedures to remove such staff has begun", he said. JUMBE WARNS NEW APPOINTEES--The President of the Zanzibar Government, Ndugu Aboud Jumbe, has sternly warned leaders against taking advantage of their official posts for their own benefits. Doing so, he pointed out, was acting contrary to the government's policy which requires every leader to work for the benefit of everybody. Ndugu Jumbe was addressing the newly-appointed 12 heads of government departments and parastatals at the State House in Zanzibar town on Saturday. Ndugu Jumbe, who had appointed the 12 leaders last Friday, noted that while the government was doing its best to import essential commodities for the people, the goods never reached the masses as expected. He, therefore, urged the newly-appointed leaders to ensure efficiency in the distribution of essential goods up to the most remote areas of the Isles. He pointed out that the government was duty-bound to supervise importation and distribution of essential goods particularly at this time when the country was facing economic problems. MOZAMBICAN REPRESENTATIONAL SYSTEM PRAISED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Nov 81 p 8

[Editorial]

[Text]

ONE of the constraints of the Westminster type of democracy is that it denies poor people full participation in the affairs of their country. That is why Zimbabweans have found the Mozambican method of electing their representatives more appealing because it leaves out people who have been associated with imperialism, colonialism or reactionary elements, or anyone who has engaged in anti-patriotic or counter-revolutionary activities or in operations against the people.

The suggestion by the Speaker of the House of Assembly, Mr Didymus Mutasa, that there should be more contact between Members of Parliament and the people only goes to show some of the pitfalls of Westminster democracy. Parliament in its present form denies people full participation at local level and some of our elected MPs are not in direct contact with party cells. What is needed for Zimbabwe is a parliament in which the people elected will have undergone public scrutiny at every level.

ROMANIAN INTEREST IN TRADE REPORTED

Salisbury THE FINANCIAL GAZETTE in English 30 Oct 81 p 3

[Text]

FOR Mr George Dobran, 44, the Romanian trade representative in Salisbury, Zimbabwe is only his second posting overseas. But he is no novice to the job. He has been involved in trade for the last 20 years and he is an expert on Africa. He also takes his job very seriously.

"Foreign trade is a sophisticated exercise", he says. "Business promotion is long-term and is not based on chance but scientific work."

"You have to come to the aid of your partner; you must give him what he wants and you must also represent your country."

INTEREST

Mr Dobran says he has always been interested in trade and economic matters. He took courses in business administration while still a high school student in his native village in North-Eastrn Romania, and he spent a total of seven years in university doing both graduate and post graduate work in economics and foreign trade.

He spent three years with the Romanian foreign trade company to get hard practical experience and then joined the Ministry of Foreign Trade's Asian and African trade section.

GHANA

In 1970 he was posted to Ghana where he remained until 1977 before returning to Romania. He was posted to Zimbabwe in December last year.

Romania, he says, is very interested in trading with this country, but realises that the competition is very strong. Nevertheless, there are a number of areas where trade is possible.

Romania is interested in obtaining cotton, coffee, tobacco, asbestos, ferro-chrome, nickel and tea from Zimbabwe, and would like to sell agricultural equipment not manufactured here; road vehicles manufactured in Romania under a MANN licence; mining equipment, including mining locomotives; water and geological drilling equipment, and chemical plants and products.

Zimbabwe and Romania have already signed two trade and economic co-operation agreements, and Mr Dobran says Romania is also very keen on entering into joint ventures with this country.

ACCOZ REPLIES 'HOGWASH' TO ZUCCO CLAIM

Salisbury THE FINANCIAL GAZETTE in English 30 Oct 81 p 1

[Text]

"Hogwash!" was the single word reaction of Mr Abner Botsh, president of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Zimbabwe, to allegations made this week against the organisation by the rival Zimbabwe United Chambers of Commerce.

Mr Vera Mushaninga, ZUCCO's president, had said on Monday that ACCOZ intransigence was keeping the two organisations from merging, which is the Government's wish, because it was afraid that ZUCCO, members would "investigate (ACCOZ) sabotage." He said that ZUCCO was the real spokesman for rural businessmen, representing over 14 000 licensed premises, while ACCOZ "followed the railway line."

Mr Botsh said that he was on record as stating he would not engage in "negotiations through the press." He dismissed ZUCCO as being "full of aspiring businessmen," with only a smattering of real businessmen. While describing the ZUCCO claims as "hopeless", he said that the organisation was "welcomed to day dream."

He accused Mr Mushaninga of trying to win cheap popularity and attain a position for which he was not qualified. He said that Mr Mushaninga was unwilling to submit to open elections, such as that which he had successfully contested for the ACCOZ presidency.

To the allegation that ZUCCO had tried on seven occasions to contact ACCOZ without results, Mr Botsh said that only two days after his election a special negotiation committee had been initiated for this very purpose. The committee, headed by the ACCOZ vice-president, had held a number of discussions with other bodies, but ZUCCO had purposely made it difficult to make any contact.

Mr Botsh said that he was not interested in engaging in any mudslinging with Mr Mushaninga. He suggested that anyone wishing to form an opinion about the two organisations should ask to see the respective membership lists, records and amounts charged in fees.

He said that ACCOZ had never been restricted on the basis of race, and had always been open to all bona-fide businessmen. Countering the claim that, for some, membership is prohibitively expensive, he said that the minimum membership fee for a businessman in Salisbury with at least five employees was $45 a year, but that this varied in other areas.

It was also learned that, in a special meeting held in May, the members of the Zimbabwe Chambers of Commerce, one of the three bodies which merged to form ZUCCO, had passed a unanimous vote of no confidence in ZUCCO, and had elected to withdraw from the organisation.

PROMOTE WORKER EDUCATION, ILO URGES UNIONS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Nov 81 p 5

[Text]

A LEADING trade unionist yesterday urged the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions to make workers' education its top priority and establish a centre for this purpose.

Mr Francis Chogo, the International Labour Organisation's expert on workers' education, said the ZCTU must seriously consider the idea of establishing a centre to educate workers on labour matters.

EDUCATION

He said it would soon be necessary for trade unions to establish workers' education departments within their organisations.

The centre should be manned by well-trained trade union education tutors and administrators and the ILO would favourably consider requests by the ZCTU to train instructors.

"Once such a centre is established, I can assure you that trade unions will be able to attain their objective of safeguarding the interests of their members effectively."

Trade unions, through the ZCTU, should take part in national development plans like their counterparts in Kenya, Ghana and Zambia.

"In other countries, unions are represented on the national planning bodies and Zimbabwe's young labour movement should start now to be involved in the national development plans."

Mr Chogo said workers' education would also be used to promote sound industrial relations.

The establishment of such relations would reduce the risk of strikes and promote higher levels of productivity.

SEKERAMAYI FIRM ON NEED FOR ORDERLY RESETTLEMENT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

THE British government has given money to the Zimbabwe Government to buy land for resettlement and development and will be expected to grant more if necessary.

This was said last night in a statement by the Minister of Lands, Natural Resources and Rural Development, Dr Sydney Sekeramayi.

He was correcting remarks on land attributed to the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Dr Eddison Zvobgo, in an interview with the Mozambican news agency, AIM, published in Monday's Herald.

The statement reads:

"There is no truth in the allegation that the Government has no money to buy land on which to resettle people. The British government has granted the Zimbabwe Government funds for land acquisition, resettlement and development.

"It has been made clear to the British government that should the funds for land acquisition which they have granted prove inadequate, we will expect them to increase the funds.

"The British are fully aware of the fact that if we do not have enough funds for land acquisition and resettlement, we will be forced to expropriate land for resettlement.

"The Government has embarked on a systematic programme of planned and orderly resettlement — with the provision of the necessary physical and social infrastructure to make the resettlement schemes economically and socially viable.

"People are being dissuaded from moving on to land randomly and it has been made clear that people moving on to farms under production will be evicted and that those meriting resettlement will be considered alongside others who have registered through the district councils.

"And to imply that the Government encourages or condones random movement of peasant farmers on to farms is a falsification of the Government's principles and practices.

"To date the Government has resettled 4 312 families. The logistical and personnel problems which were inevitable at the commencement of the resettlement programme have been largely overcome. The resettlement programme is now progressing at a speedier pace than before.

"We will continue to acquire land on a willing seller, willing buyer basis and resettle people in an orderly pattern.

"The Government is not trying to neutralise the Constitution by devious means. Should the Government want to amend the constitution it will do so boldly in broad daylight. Should the Government decide to expropriate land, for whatever reason, the nation will be informed.

"It will not do so by cowardly indirect means."

MANGWENDE: WE SHALL STAY NON-ALIGNED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

ZIMBABWE will refuse to enter into any military or political commitment with any of the major powers or permit the establishment of foreign military bases on its territory, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr Witness Mangwende, said in Salisbury yesterday.

Addressing 10 newly qualified diplomats yesterday, Dr Mangwende stressed that Zimbabwe would "not automatically take sides on the critical issues of world politics—and the country's position would be dictated by its own national interests first and foremost".

The minister added that economic independence often imposed constraints on the extent to which an under-developed country could genuinely pursue a policy of non-alignment "without compromising some of its most cherished ideals".

"It is also an accepted fact that while nations are free to choose their friends, they cannot, however, choose their neighbours," the minister said.

Dr Mangwende said Zimbabwe had involved itself in the policy programmes and economic projects of the SADCC "in the context of the struggle for economic liberation and the ultimate objective of the elimination of all forms of dependence on South Africa".

Congratulating the diplomatic trainees who finished their course at Ranche House College yesterday, the minister reminded them that in performing their duties "the interests of Zimbabwe are always paramount because the Government and people of Zimbabwe have invested their fullest trust and faith in you".

"You will therefore be their eyes and ears outside Zimbabwe as well as being the custodians and guardians of their values and interests," the minister added.

Dr Mangwende urged the new diplomats to "project Zimbabwe's image in the world community" and contribute decisively to the development of the Zimbabwe foreign service.—Ziana.

USE OF LAND--Bulawayo--Land must not be used as a "political weapon", the chairman of the Natural Resources Board said yesterday. Speaking at a regional meeting here to discuss the problem of squatters on farmland, Mr Lance Smith criticised the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Dr Eddison Zvobgo, for his reported remarks that the Government did not intend to do anything about squatting. "To use a threat to the natural resources to remove constraints the Government finds objectionable is a wrong approach and destroys our nation,' Mr Smith said. "The whole future of our country depends on the maintenance of the bread basket. There is no other source of wealth except that which comes from the soil. We must not carelessly use it as a political weapon," he told delegates. At the meeting yesterday, the deputy chief inspector in the Ministry of Natural Resources and Water Development, Mr R. E. Jenkins, said the squatter problem was a national issue. In Manicaland, he said, there had been "mass destruction of the catchment areas". "The minister (Senator Joseph Msika) made it clear he would not tolerate destruction of natural resources," he said. There was a glimmer of hope that the lands inspectorate would soon be able to control the situation. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Nov 81 p 3]

MILK SUPPLIES--Bulawayo--Milk production has increased for the first time in 18 months, it was announced here yesterday. The increase is only about 0.5 percent, but the extra litres are sufficient for a quiet mood of optimism in the dairy industry. Farmers gearing up for the new national bulk milk collection scheme in 1982 were praised for the happier situation by the Dairy Marketing Board. The deputy general manager, Mr Gerald Hunwick, said the board believed the growth in milk yields were the result of the planned introduction of a bulk milk collection scheme by April next year. Confidence in the dairy industry was beginning to "manifest itself". "We have had a good response from producers anticipating the collection scheme and gearing up for it by either buying or producing more milk cows to fill their bulk milk tanks." He also confirmed that cheese rationing in Bulawayo had been temporarily relaxed and that a little more was being allocated to the stores and shops. He stressed, however, that until national bulk milk collection was in full swing--the scheme is being phased in over the next three years at a cost of $7 million--the situation was only a "one-off". Once the shelves have been emptied of cheese supplies, the rationing will revert. But the board hoped to release a little more near Christmas. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Nov 81 p 3]

DOUBTS EXPRESSED ABOUT SOME CONTACT GROUP MEMBERS' GOALS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 23 Oct 81 p 14

[Article by Henrique Matos: "Who Is Manipulating the Independence of Namibia?"]

[Text] The five Western countries making up the so-called Contact Group decided at their meeting held in New York recently to send a consulting mission to inform the Frontline governments and racist South Africa about the "addenda" to UN Resolution 435.

This delegation, headed by U.S. Undersecretary of State for African Affairs Chester Crocker, is now in Africa. Together with the foreign affairs ministers of France, Great Britain, Canada and the FRG, he will explain the reasons for additions to Resolution 435/78 drafted by the UN Security Council, which includes the acceptable procedures for the independence of Namibia, whose territory is illegally occupied by the Pretoria government.

There are five points advocated by the United States to--as Washington sees it--defend "its" interests in Namibia:

1. Sending NATO forces, especially American, on behalf of the United Nations.

2. Prohibiting the military presence of SWAPO in Namibia, before and during the election period.

3. Retaining the racist police and the "territorial forces," the repressive instrument created by Pretoria, to intimidate the Namibian people during elections.

4. Approving a constitution before proclaiming independence--contrary to the UN plan--in order to favor the white minority.

5. Keeping Walvis Bay under the jurisdiction of racist South Africa to serve as a launching point for destablizing maneuvers by NATO against the progressive nations of the African continent.

Any and all changes capable of jeopardizing the efforts made by the African countries, in particular, will not be accepted. This, moreover, is the position of the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

It now appears that the Contact Group, instead of fulfilling the mission it must carry out, prefers to submit to the orders of the United States. That explains the warning by the French minister of cooperation, Jean-Pierre Cot, during his visit to Washington at the end of last month, to the effect that "France would withdraw from the Contact Group if the United States does not pressure South Africa to accept the prompt independence of this territory." As a matter of fact, since the socialists have been at the head of the French Government, they have been taking a realistic position, not only regarding the Namibian problem but also in condemning the aggressions perpetrated by the racist South Africans against the sovereign Frontline states, especially the People's Republic of Angola, where the trained killers continue to massacre defenseless populations in the southern part of our country, in open connivance with the Washington government.

It is known that UN Resolution 435 provides for organizing free and democratic elections supervised by the United Nations. The racists disagree, in the true meaning of the term, with applying this point because they know in advance that SWAPO, the sole and legitimate representative of the Namibian people, will be the winner, due to the popularity and support this nationalist organization enjoys in the interior of Namibia, despite the repressive measures unleashed by the Pretoria rulers against the Namibians.

Among the maneuvers initiated by European partners of the United States in the Contact Group we should not fail to mention the statements of FRG Foreign Affairs Minister Hans Dietrich Gensher during his meeting in Bonn with UN Secretary General Edem Kodjo. In the (mistaken) view of the chief of FRG diplomacy, the puppet groups in Namibia should be consulted. We have yet to learn the reason for this insistence, since everything had already been settled regarding representation of the Namibian people in the continental and international arena.

Lord Carrington, in turn, saw nothing other than the presence of Cuban troops in Angola "impeding" solution of the Namibian question. The British official left out a very important detail: the economic, political and military cooperation between the United States and the Pretoria stooges as the principal cause of the climate of tension in southern Africa. This British official has yet to learn that the internationalist Cubans do not constitute a threat to anyone, whoever they may be; in fact, quite the opposite.

WATER SHORTAGES, POWER BLACKOUTS PLAGUE LUANDA

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 23 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Joao Serra: "Shortages of Water and Light"]

[Text] The increasingly frequent interruptions in the supply of water and electricity to the city of Luanda, whatever they may be attributed to, constitute factors extremely prejudicial to all social and productive activity of this region.

Naturally, whenever the supply of water for the nation's capital is interrupted, those responsible nearly always have a perfectly logical technical explanation to give the public as the cause of this irregularity. Perhaps they forget, however, that the ordinary citizen can neither take a bath nor cook with technical explanations. Factories cannot produce using technical explanations instead of water as a raw material.

When there is a blackout in a certain area, even if it is immediately explained to us in great detail that it was caused by an unforeseeable accident in the facilities of a particular area, it happens that this event causes complications in many business firms whose normal activities are affected and in many residences where foodstuffs are at times spoiled in the refrigerator due to prolonged preiods of electrical failure.

Many examples of enterprises seriously affected by the constant interruptions of water and electric power could be mentioned here. But it would not be worth the effort because it would never be an exhaustive list, no matter how hard we tried. One need only consult the UNTA [National Union of Angolan Workers] reports to note that all enterprises in the nation's capital contend constantly with this problem.

But we have fresh examples. Breweries have been shut down for several days due to lack of water, which has already caused many Luanda restaurants to close during the last 3 days, with the resulting hardship for persons who must go there for their meals.

Another equally recent example that can be given is the fact that the power outages the city experienced last Tuesday burned out many home appliances, including a refrigerator in this newspaper's editorial office.

One might ask: Who is going to pay for all these damages for which the consumer is not to blame?

One cannot fail to acknowledge that the companies responsible for providing and maintaining the electrical and water systems certainly have innumerable difficulties in their daily activity. The distribution systems are very old and generally overloaded, which is the cause of the frequent irregularities to which we have become accustomed. But, on the basis of that observation, perhaps the most logical and advisable approach would be to view the situation in a farsighted manner and begin immediately to take the steps that permit avoidance, in the future at least, of this state of affairs.

There is only one overriding fact: the constant problems of water and electricity shortage cannot be allowed to continue indefinitely because, after all, the citizen is entitled to enjoy these social benefits under stable conditions.

The latest electric power outages in Luanda showed everyone the damage that is caused to home appliances. As an official responsible for these services told our newspaper a few days ago, the recent damages were due to a short circuit in an apartment in the "Gomes and Brother" building, which seems to be a plausible technical explanation. However, situations of this nature must be foreseen sufficiently far in advance to provide needed repairs before the damage is done.

SUPPORT FOR RETURNING REFUGEES--Cabinda--More than 1,500 returning citizens--men, women and children--returned to their former home in over 20 villages since the month of September, it was learned by ANGOP [ANGOLA PRESS]. These refugees returning from republics bordering on the province of Cabinda are mostly settling in the Sandamassala area, about 300 kilometers from the province capital. Because it was looted during the second liberation war by lackeys of imperialism, Sandamassala has an abandoned appearance. As a matter of fact, the province's government and party authorities devote special attention to this locality, both by mobilizing all state organizations for the purpose and by opening highways, schools and bridges, as the region has a vast system of waterways. In order to learn about the socio-economic situation of the returning refugees, Adjutant Provincial Commissioner Jose Sumbo visited the region recently and for about 12 days interviewed the returnees and urged them to work. Besides visiting Sandamassala, Jose Sumbo was very busy in the municipalities of Buco-Zau, Cacongo and Belize. [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 30 Oct 81 p 4] 8834

WHO DELEGATION TOUR--The WHO delegation that is in our country to learn from Angolan authorities about the wartime situation caused by racist aggression returned to Luanda yesterday after having visited the provinces of Huila and Mocamedes, where they came in contact with current conditions there. Roberto de Almeida, Central Committee secretary for economic and social policy, and Health Minister Mendes de Carvalho, of the party Central Committee, accompanied the visitors. In Huila Province the distinguished delegation from the WHO was able to see the effects of racist agression against sovereign Angolan territory. Besides visiting Chibia, where there are hundreds of refugees from the heroic province of Cunene, the WHO delegation was at the Humpata Hospital, where it talked with the wounded, casualties of the aggression, confined there, and in the Serra da Leba resort center, which has also been assaulted in the recent past by the criminal action of the soldiers of apartheid. In Mocamedes, the WHO delegation, made up of the health ministers of Ghana, Ethiopia, Zambia and Sao Tome, a representative of Zaire and other specialists of the health organization, visited the mining port of Saco-Mar, the Frio SOMAR complex and the Ngola Kimbanda Hospital. PALAPYE POWER STATION TO BE BUILT NEXT YEAR

Gaborone DAILY NEWS in English 28 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Monty Letshwiti]

[Text] A NATIONAL power station would be built next year in Palapye at a total cost of P230 million.

Speaking in a briefing session at the Palapye Sub-Landboard Office, the BPC Chief Executive Officer, Mr Edward Bell said the plant would be built between Morupule Colliery and the Palapye/Serowe road.

The session was attended by government consultants, Morupule Technical Officers, Tribal Administration and Village Development Committee (VDC) representatives under the Chairmanship of the Senior Administration Officers, Lands, Mr Pius Mokgwati.

Mr Bell told the meeting that Botswana's needs for energy have gone up and the country has to replace imported fuel in order to maintain a balanced foreign exchange record by all possible means.

The plant, which is expected to resume full operation in 1986 will supply government and private sector industries throughout the country with coal electricity.

Mr Bell said it was for this reason that the Botswana Power Corporation decided to put the plant adjacent to the Morupule Colliery Corporation fancy in order to use more coal at less transport expenses.

The first phase of the project will employ 15,000 men when the work gets off the ground on January 1 next year who will later be increased by 200 permanent staff members at the end of the construction period.

The meeting was also told that water will be piped from Paje some 50 kilometres North of Serowe to be used in the national plant operations.

The BPC official told BOPA after the meeting that the plant would need about 10 boreholes to pump enough water for the whole complex.

He also disclosed that the corporation spent P1 million on water exploration at Paje human settlement area and seven boreholes are already in operation stage.

But negotiations are still going on between the corporation and Bangwato Landboard officials to lease a 50 metre wide strip of land for the pipeline from Paje to the Power station in Palapye.

They will also lease an area of 2 square kilometres for the whole power station complex which will include 20 houses for the permanent staff members of the corporation.

However the question of housing in general was discussed at length and later the officials resolved that the subject be left to the Botswana Housing Corporation (BHC) as it is the legal responsible body for the employees accomodation.

The National Power Station is only one project out of many National Infrastructural Development Projects to be built in the Central District during the last half of the current six year National Development Plan, said government officials.

So far it has been announced that the establishment of a coal mine with a town between Serowe and Palapye is in the pipeline and the preparations are already at an advanced stage.

There are further reports that coal mine exploration work has already started at Mookane, an area North of Dibete. The coal will be for both local and European market consumption.

An International Building Road Contractor McAlpine has started physical work on a road leading from Palapye to Serowe, and which will later link the eastern part of the country with Orapa. BOPA

REMARKABLY HIGH GROWTH RATE DISCUSSED

Gaborone DAILY NEWS in English 27 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Bapasi Mphusu]

[Text] BOTSWANA's growth rate is one of the greatest in the world, the Resident Representative of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), Mr Manzur Zaidi said that last Friday.

Mr Zaidi, who is also the Resident Co-ordinator of the United Nations Activities in Botswana, said this at the University College of Botswana where he was one of the panelists in a discussion marking the United Nations Day. The UN Day was on Saturday October 24.

He told his audience, comprising mostly of secondary school students that the hunger of developing countries was increasing more than ever before.

Mr Zaidi described the North-South conference going at Mexico as a land-mark for the global development negotiations. He stressed that it was important for all industrialised countries should participate in such a conference.

He explained that the North-South dialogue, which had been going on for a long time was "a dialogue between the industrialised and the developing countries".

Mr Zaidi told the students that all the member states of the United Nations contribute to the United Nations development system.

Other panelists were the Minister of External Affairs, Mr Archie Mogwe, Deputy Secretary for External Affairs Mr Mogami and Professor Oommen, from the University.

Answering a question on the importance of the United Nations, Mr Mogwe said it provided a forum for contacts, helps difuse conflicts and it was largely responsible for the decolonisation process.

He added that although it may not claim a 100 per cent performance "it has something to show."

Mr Mogwe also spoke on the lobbying system at the United Nations. He explained that lobbying starts at home as a single country issue until it grows up to an issue of a group of nations.

He illustrated his point by giving the example of Mr Salim Salim, the Tanzania Foreign Minister who is one of the candidates for the UN Secretary General.

He said that it first came as a Tanzanian issue by the Tanzanians presenting their man to individual African countries, then to the Organisations of African Unity (OAU) and "he is now a candidate of the Non-Aligned countries... the developing countries."

Professor Oommen, on the point of the poverty of the developing countries, said that if industrialised countries could reduce their expenditure on the building of arms and share their wealth, the povarty could be improved. BOPA

KOLINGBA ADDRESS FOLLOWING RETURN FROM PARIS

AB101159 Bangui Domestic Service in FRench 1830 GMT 9 Nov 81

[Address to the nation by CAR President Andre Kolingba on his return to Bangui from the French-African summit in Paris 3-4 November--live]

[Excerpts] Fellow CAR citizens--I thank the people of Bangui for the welcome accorded me on my return from the French-African conference. In an international context of rivalry and perpetual conflict, all forces should unite as a generous humanity to support the Third World in its development efforts. Concerning the conference, it took place in three parts: the first part was the speech of French President Francois Mitterrand; the second part was the reply speech of Felix Houphouet-Boigny, president of the Ivory Coast; and the third part was the adoption of a two-part agenda.

About the second part of the conference on the speech of Ivorian President Houphouet-Boigny in his capacity as elder statesman, immediately recalled how attentive the French president was to African sensitivities by stressing his readiness to deal with and his openess to the problems of the third world. He also called his readiness to greatly increase France's aid to the developing countries. He used the concept of a trilogy--the producer and his product: the middleman, that is the industrialist; and the consumer--to talk about the eternal problem of the deterioration of trade terms and the speculation of which the third world is a victim because of the famous law of supply and demand which can be justified only between developed nations and not between developing and industrialized countries which impose their prices on our new materials.

In the face of this picture, President Houphouet-Boigny, like President Mitterrand, called for solidarity without which development is impossible. There is the need for the stabilization of the prices of agricultural and industrial raw materials, the evolution of agriculture and security in the face of the consequences of climatic hazards.

The third part of this Franco-African summit was the agenda. The participants were given the possibility to address the meeting on two topics. The first concerns political problems generally, while the second concerns problems peculiar to each country. For my part, I talked about security and peace which are indispensable conditions for the development of any country and I also launched another appeal to the friendly countries in order to make them aware of our country's cause. President Mobutu also made an appeal on behalf of Chad. Moreover, the heads of state present at the conference also appealed for the regulation of the prices of raw materials.

During my stay in France, I held talks with the president of the French Republic who received me on Thursday, 5 November, at 0930. I was able to inform him of the difficulties facing our country in the economic and political sphere. The meeting took place in a perfect climate of mutual understanding. The outcome was very satisfactory.

I was also received on this same Thursday at 1100 at the Paris chamber of commerce and industry, which demonstrated its desire to contribute to our country's development. I also received some other industrialists. I gave interviews. I wish to mention in this regard the press conference which took place on Thursday at 1500 in the presence of the Parisian press.

To conclude, the conference of heads of state of France and Africa was for us the occasion for Frank, serious and friendly contacts. As it was a meeting of leaders, it was an occasion for reflection on the strenghtening of mutual understanding in the interest of future prospects.

KOLINGBA INTERVIEWED BY NEWSMEN IN PARIS

AB061941 Paris AFP in French 0908 GMT 6 Nov 81

[Text] Paris, 6 Nov (AFP)--The Central African army intends neither to confiscate power nor keep it for ever. But it must put the economy on its feet again. This statement was made in Paris on Thursday by CAR Head of State Gen Andre Kilingba.

In an interview with newsmen, President Kolingba, who attended the Paris Franco-African conference, indicated that the resumption of political activities will be achieved gradually and will depend on the recovery of calm and peace.

General Kolingba reiterated his intention to meet in the near future the representatives of the various political parties and the active elements of the nation, with a view to finding together solutions to the problems facing the country. He did not rule out the possibility of setting up a national front some day.

President Kolingba then reiterated his appeal to all friendly nations to help his country out of its present economic chaos. He added: our ambition is to make our country a huge works site.

General Kolingba, who was referring to his talk on Thursday morning with President Mitterrand, observed that it was centered on the catastrophic situation of his country. France is still willing to grant us assistance, he said.

Lastly, President Kolingba said allegations that Central African elements from the Libyan Islamic Legion were inside Chad along the border with the CAR, were not proven by the facts.

MOOD OF CITIZENRY TERMED 'MIXED CONCERN'

AB061457 Paris AFP in English 1408 GMT 6 Nov 81

[By Jean-Eudes Barbier]

[Text] Ndjamena, 6 Nov (AFP)--With the Libyan military withdrawal from Chad now in its fourth day, the reaction of many people in the capital about the troops departure is satisfaction mixed with concern.

The airlift of Libyan men and equipment out of Ndjamena has not produced any spontaneous scenes of joy in the streets, but everyone has praise for President Goukouni Oueddei's courage in asking the Libyans to leave 11 months after he asked them to come and help crush his civil war opponents.

Now people are thinking of the days ahead.

All we want is to eat, drink and sleep in peace. Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi has reconciled us to these essentials of life, one trader said in a district which during the civil war was occupied by the rebel armed forces of former Defence Minister Wissen Habre.

Only a dozen or so families were left in this part of town in the middle of December last year, as Mr Habre's troops moved to safety after losing the battle for Ndjamena. The rest had been killed, or had already fled, leaving behind them streets destroyed by a rain of shells and rockets.

Less than one year later life is almost back to normal in this part of town. Houses have been rebuilt, and many of the refugees have returned, bringing with them their music, their habits and their urge to live.

It is the same in all the most populated districts.

The Zimbabwe rendez-vous bar does a good trade in the early afternoon as groups of civil servants sit at outside tables under the full sun drinking the local beer.

Nearby, two cinemas have reopened for business, and street vendors jostle for customers. But these scenes are in stark contrast with the desolation and silence that exist in the administrative areas.

Nagging questions remain about whether the president will be able to fulfill his goal of building a unified army and whether fighting will break out again.

I approve of the Libyans departure but I recognize all they have done for Chad, one Chadian civil servant said in echoing the sentiments of mnay of his colleagues.

It would be an act of hostility if I rejoiced openly at their departure--I refuse to do that, he said. But I place all my confidence in my government to guarantee the peace.

No one in Ndjamena plays down the enormous task now facing the Chadian Government, and most Chadians seem to want close cooperation to continue between their country and Libya.

Libya was the first country that came to our aid after the war...and we will always need its support, said one Chadian, expressing a sentiment often heard here.

Many put much of the blame for the current situation in Chad. [As received] France pulled the last of its troops out of the former colony last year during the height of the devasting civil war.

With the evacuation, Libya is thumbing its nose at France, one young teacher said. France must undertake fundamental action in Chad otherwise war threatens to resurface in our country.

1,500 REFUGEES PER DAY RETURNING TO NDJAMENA

AB101335 Paris AFP in French 1209 GMT 10 Nov 81

[Text] Ndjamena, 10 November (AFP)--At the rate of 300 families per day or about 1,500 people, Chadian refugees have for a month now been returning to the Chadian capital, Ndjamena, which they abandoned about a year ago during the civil war. They are returning mainly from Kousseri, a northern Cameroonian town facing Ndjamena on the opposite bank of the Chari River, as well as from the car, Nigeria and the southern region of Chad.

Thus, they come every day to increase the number of a population bruised by the ravages of war and who are finding it difficult to feed themselves properly.

How many of them will agree to return home? More than 100,000, according to the high commission for refugees (HCR) office in charge of the repatriation operation. Less than 50,000, according to the Cameroonian authorities in Kousseri. In fact, it is not possible to give an official figure because some Chadians were able to obtain more than once the status of refugee, which confers the right to receive food and various materials designed to facilitate the repatriation of each family.

Most of the refugees go to their prewar houses when they return to Ndjamena. Built with mud, these houses generally suffered little damage as a result of the fighting. The Chadian military police often have to expell from these houses the soldiers who had taken refuge there since the end of the war. The HCR is participating financially in repairing the houses.

A 50-year-old Chadian with a wife and seven children thus recently returned to his house in a maze of small streets scorched by the sun. He left home in February 1979 because of his fear of the men of former Defense Minister Hissein Habre, who had imprisoned him for a month because of his support for the soldiers from the south of the country. As far as he is concerned, the war has already been forgotten. He has returned to Ndjamena with the conviction that it is impossible to resume the fighting. People are fed up with the war, he said. He did not quite understand the reasons for the war. He now considers himself lucky. In fact, he has been able to resume his work as a driver and mechanic at the presidency of the republic, which pays him a monthly salary of 52,000 CFA francs (fr 1,040). This is a veritable windfall in a country in ruins where the monthly minimum wage is 10,000 CRA francs and where civil servants received only one paycheck in 6 months.

The return of the refugees to a normal life can be seen everywhere in Ndjamena and small workshops and bars are being opened every day. There are abundant goods of all kinds in the market; only money is lacking.

An Air Afrique airline technician, who was for 10 months a refugee in Kousseri, has just reopened the bar and restaurant which he had managed for 3 years and which, before the war, was patronized by senion Chadian officials. He too has to ask that the soldiers who were occupying his house be expelled. He is now afraid. He is afraid of a new eruption of violence, he scrupulously closes his bar and restaurant at midnight--the curfew hour--, refuses to accept people with arms and has a tough team of bouncers. He also deplores the fact that people have little money to spend with the result that there are few clients. Should the war resume, he would return to Kousseri to resume with the beer traffic he established between Cameroon and Chad, although he was afraid every day of being caught by the police, but one had to live, he said.

LEGAL BASIS FOR OAU FORCE--Ndjamena, 9 Nov (AFP)--A legal basis for the inter-African neutral force for Chad, whose first elements are expected soon in Ndjamena, was drawn up last week in Paris by Chadian President Goukouni Oueddei and OAU Secretary General Edem Kodjo. According to a document entitled "Accord on the Status of the OAU Peace-Keeping Force in Chad," signed by Goukouni Oueddei and Edem Kodjo, a permanent committee of OAU heads of state should be set up to act the supreme organ entrusted with insuring the smooth operations of keeping the peace in Chad. The list of members of the permanent committee, which will act under the responsibility of Edem Kodjo and the moral authority of Goukouni Oueddei, has not yet been published. The accord on the status of the neutral force is valid for a period of 6 months, according to that document. It ends at the request of one of the signatories, Chad and OAU, and is renewable by tacit agreement. Still according to the document, it is the OAU secretary general who appoints the commander of the neutral force with the consent of the Chadian head of state. The secretary general is also responsible for the implementation of the directives of the OAU permanent committee. He submits the budgetary estimates necessary for the running of the force and is the official coordinator of the funds of the budget. Finally, the document make the role of the peace-keeping force official. Its functions will be to prevent, to contain and to temper and to end hostilities in Chad and to ensure the security of the Chadian state. It will also help the government of Chad in the training of an integrated national army. [By AFP Special Envoy Jean Eudes Barbier] [Text] [AB091525 Paris AFP in French 1426 GMT 9 Nov 81]

FIGHTING IN CHAD NOTED--No sooner had Libya withdrawn its troops from Chad than fighting resumed. Apparently, civil war is raging in the east of the country between the armed forces of Mr Hissein Habre and the government troops. Al-Qadhdhafi, who has for the first time confirmed that his troops have evacuated the country, has specified that they would not longer be defending this region in spite of the continued fighting. FUTURE OF MAYOTTE-Addis Ababa, 6 Nov (AFP)--An organisation of African unity committee starts a three-day meeting in Moroni, capital of the Comoros, on Monday on the future of the Island of Mayotte, the OAU secretariat announced here today. The committee of seven is expected to study how best the island, which the OAU insists falls under the sovereignty of the Comoros, is to be integrated into the republic. The people of Mayotte chose continued attachment to France in two referenda in 1976, two years after the Indian Ocean archipelago became independent. The meeting of the committee, representing Algeria, Cameroon, Gabon, Madagascar, Mozambique and Senegal as well as the Comoros, will be attended by OAU Secretary-General Edem Kodjo. ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, MILITARY PROBLEMS SAID TO PERVADE COUNTRY

London 8 DAYS in English No 43, 31 Oct 81 p 60

[Text] 'POOR GUY, he's got nothing from the revolution except slogans,' was the comment of an Ethiopian friend as we passed a ragged man in Addis Ababa's vast central market shouting battle cries in the language of the Oromos, the largest of Ethiopia's many nationalities.

The 1974 revolution, for all its undoubted achievements in land reform and in paring down an illiteracy rate of 93 per cent, has left deep social problems. Outside a bible centre in Addis on a Monday evening, young people wait their turn to enter the packed assembly rooms. The church is experiencing a huge revival, as the ancient Coptic traditions provide a familiar sense of moral belonging which the official doctrine of 'scientific socialism' cannot.

The need for something to replace the bygone bourgeois morality is also attested to in the huge rise of prostitution and alcoholism in Addis over the last few years. In one quarter of the city we counted more than 500 'bunabeits', small neon-lit bars staffed mostly by women. The beverage industry is booming, unlike most sectors of Ethiopia's struggling economy.

Ethiopian contacts in Addis say a mood of political apathy has taken over the city. The army dominates everything, although officers who now staff most of the top positions in the embryo party, the government, regional administrations, state farms and health centres have mostly dropped their former rank, donned civilian suits and are referred to as plain 'comrade'.

Ethiopia's revolution was launched on a tide of mass student and peasant outrage at what they saw as the corrupt, hugely exploitative and feudal regime of Haile Selassie. But it was the army which edged the emperor out of power, and it was Colonel, now Comrade Chairman, Mengistu Haile Mariam who managed to consolidate the present power structure.

In the countryside, the first two years of the revolution saw a huge, and in large measure successful, land-to-the-tiller programme. The situation is not so happy now. The large state farms have not been a success.

Agriculture has suffered from the predominance of the military in the system. Sources told of one 80,000-hectare state farm covered with ripe, but worthless teif, a cereal unique to Ethiopia which forms the base of the country's pancake-like bread. The first administrator, on being ordered to plant the crop, had reported to Addis that the soil was not suitable. He was promptly replaced by an army man who went ahead and put down teif seed all over the farm.

The Ethiopian government takes justified pride in its campaign for literacy, launched in June 1979 and for which it received a UNESCO prize last year. Aimed primarily at giving basic reading and writing skills to Ethiopians in one of the country's five main languages, it had reduced illiteracy from 93 to 65 per cent. However, its long-term effects have still to be seen. Addis Zemen, the leading newspaper in a country of 32m people, has a circulation of only 100,000.

If information on the literacy campaign and new, highly-publicised, moves to stamp out corruption in the government is readily available, news of Ethiopia's foreign military advisors or of the armed conflicts within the country, is not.

Diplomats estimate the number of Cuban troops in Ethiopia at around 15,000. Their largest base is at Tatek, closer to the capital than any major Ethiopian army garrison. The Cubans' function, therefore, is seen to be to protect the regime from any uprising within the army itself. Several thousand Soviet advisors instruct Ethiopia's quarter of a million strong armed forces; and the intelligence services are run by East Germans. Under the emperor's time, it was the West Germans who did the job.

The presence of the Cubans is said to cause some discontent in the armed forces, which dwarf the Cuban contingent and in some cases possess better weapons. Ethiopia received the MiG23 combat aircraft before Cuba did. However, more than 150,000 Ethiopian troops are engaged in maintaining stalemate in the conflicts with Eritrean, Tigrean, Orome and Somali guerrillas in the north and east.

According to sources in and outside Ethiopia, the strongest guerrilla forces — the Eritrean People's Liberation Front, the Tigre People's Liberation Front, the Orome Liberation Front and the West Somali Liberation Front — have now established a corridor linking their territories from Nakfa in Eritrea to the WSLF's zone of operations in the Ogaden. This has made the guerrillas' supply lines more flexible and consequently immune to shifts in policy by Sudan, whose territory adjoins northern Eritrea.

However, the prospect of any of the movements achieving the national liberation to which they aspire seems remote, given the enormous size of the Ethiopian army and the Soviet commitment to support and upkeep it. David Butler.

Addis Ababa THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD in English 20 Oct 81 pp 1, 5

[Text] Addis Ababa (ENA)--Socialist Ethiopia has been elected as Bureau and Council member of the International Women's Democratic Federation (WIDF).

This was disclosed by Comrade Tiruwork Wakeyo, COPWE Central Committee member and head of Women's Affairs in the COPWE Organizational Affairs Department, upon her return here on Sunday after attending the WIDF conference and a Women's Congress held in Prague, Czechoslovakia.

Comrade Tiruwork was leading a delegation of Socialist Ethiopia to the World's Women Congress and the International Women's Democratic Federation conference which took place in the Czechoslovak capital.

In a statement at the Bole International Airport, Comrade Tiruwork said that not only has Ethiopia been made a member of the federation, she has also been elected council and bureau member. By contrast she added, Somalia had been ousted from the bureau of the federation.

Speaking in connection with the World's Women's Congress, Comrade Tiruwork said that it was attended by delegation from 132 countries, 274 mass organizations, 96 international and regional organizations and representatives of United Nations agencies. Altogether there were more than 1,000 participants, according to Comrade Tiruwork.

The conference was addressed by 788 delegation leaders, said Comrade Tiruwork adding that the members of the Ethiopian delegation had taken an active part in the different commissions of the conference. She stressed that the Ethiopian delegation had explained to the participants the progress and process of the Ethiopian Revolution and the role played by Ethiopian women for the maintenance of peace and security of the world.

According to Comrade Tiruwork the World Women's Congress had condemned imperialism, particularly American imperialism, for its intention to produce the neutron bomb and turn Europe into a warehouse of its destructive armaments. She said the congress had sent an appeal to the United Nations declaring its support for peace, detente and the efforts to ease tension in the world.

A special meeting which convened to discuss the problems prevailing in particular areas in the world also passed relevant resolutions.

Comrade Tiruwork disclosed that 120 countries and 144 organizations had been represented at the eighth conference of the International Women's Democratic Federation. She said the conference reviewed its five year achievements and adopted a new plan for the next five years as well as electing new office bearers. Comrade Tiruwork said that the Ethiopian delegates had met their counterparts from Czechoslovakia and USSR and had exchanged views on mutual interests and bilateral relations.

Comrade Negash Dubale, COPWE Central Committee member and head of the General Services Section of the COPWE Finance and Property Administration Department, welcomed the delegation at Bole International Airport.

Meanwhile, it was learnt that Comrade Abezash Wolde-Michael, Chairperson of Revolutionary Ethiopia Women's Association (REWA) proceeded to Sofia at the head of a two-member delegation for a working visit to the People's Republic of Bulgaria.

MINISTRY ORGANIZES SEMINAR ON COFFEE PRODUCTION

Addis Ababa THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD in English 20 Oct 81 pp 1, 4

[Text] Addis Ababa (ENA)--A three-day seminar on coffee production opened at the assembly hall of the Addis Ababa Chamber of Commerce yesterday morning.

The seminar will review what has been accomplished in the area of improving the quantity and quality of coffee in the 1980/81 year and will explore ways of implementing the 1981/82 year programme.

Attending the seminar are managers of corporations and farms in the Ministry of Coffee and Tea Development, representatives of workers' unions, departments of planning and programming, finance, agriculture and administration, and production and political cadres. Officials of the Coffee Plantation Corporation are also taking part in the seminar.

Opening the seminar, Comrade Yehualashet Girma, Minister of Coffee and Tea Development and COPWE Central Committee member, said that a ten-year programme has been drawn up to improve coffee production and that preparations are underway to translate the programme into deeds.

The Minister noted that the plan envisages the increment of coffee farms belonging to the state to 100,000 hectares. The aim of the expansion is to increase the country's coffee production and in the process create employment opportunities, build savings and ensure accumulation of wealth and reduce the gap between areas with rapid progress and those of relatively lower pace of economic growth.

The Minister further indicated that according to the 1981/82 plan, a total of 18.06 million improved coffee seedlings would be planted in Bebeka, South-West and Arba-Gugu Farms. He also pointed out that pesticides would be sprayed to overcome coffeeberry diseases on existing plantations.

Comrade Yehualeshet gave further details on the programme of the ministry in 1981/82 and pointed out that it comprises the improvement of seven coffee cleaning machines and the establishment of three others, the building of 110 kms of new road and the improvement and repair of an old road stretching for 13 kms.

Measures on 200,000 hectare plantation presently owned by peasants have been envisaged so that the plantations will have a modern and up-to-date form by the end of the ten-year plan period, according to Comrade Yehualashet.

The Minister also stressed the priority attached to the task of up-grading peasants' associations engaged in coffee production to the producers' level.

In conclusion, Comrade Yehualashet said that those working in the field should struggle with determination to implement the long-term programme so that the expected results could be realised.

Jimma--The Ministry of Coffee and Tea Development is sponsoring a 10-day refresher course for its 139 extension workers to help in the efforts to help improve the quality and quantity of coffee.

This is the ninth course of its kind. It would deal with subjects such as the improvement of coffee quality and higher yield of the commodity and familiarization of extension workers with new technology.

Comrade Asrat Mitiku, head of Coffee Improvement Project Administrative Services opened the seminar at the Jimma Agricultural Institute. He said on the occasion that the participants should employ in the field the new methods they would be learning during the course. Comrade Asrat urged the group to help boost the quality and quantity of coffee in order to help meet both the demand at home and in the international markets.

Comrade Shiferaw Worku, representative of the training section of the Ministry, said on his part that the course would be conducted by experts who have long and thorough experience on the subject.

PRACTICAL, VOCATIONAL EDUCATION FOR YOUTH--[Article by Makaya] We in Gabon are quite proud of our literacy level. We are among the best on the African continent, and this is good, because this is how the future is prepared. For all young Gabonese, education is compulsory from 6 to 16 years of age. This is official, and it is written in the law. But for those young people who fail the sixth grade entrance examination at the age of 12 or 13, a serious problem exists. What to do with them? Most often, the solution is to send them to private schools. But, of course, this requires quite a bit of money. And we poor Makaya cannot find such amounts, which can easily represent two or three of our SMIG's [Interoccupational minimum guaranteed wage] for the entire school year. Therefore, the public sector must find the solution, in the form of practical or vocational education or something on that order, which could allow them to get employment without difficulty. I believe that the Ministries of Education, Professional Training, Youth, Planning and Finances should get together on this problem. Otherwise, it would be like ostracizing these young people under 16 who have been unable to find a place on school benches! [Text] [Libreville L'UNION in French 21 Sep 81 p 1]

'ABUSE OF POWER' CHARGED--The All People's Party (APP) has asked the Limann government to explain immediately why it retired the Inspector-General of Police, Mr. F. P. Kyei. It also said the government should explain why Mr. P. N. Cobbina, the Deputy Commissioner of Police in charge of the CID, was indicted. A statement signed by the APP general secretary, Mr. Obed Asamoah, suggested that the retirement and interdiction of the two top police officers, coupled with the dismissal of Dr. Ekow Daniels, former Interior Minister and recently Minister of Education for a few days, raised the spectre of abuse of power and was a reminder of the Nkrumah days. It said such dismissals revealed a state of panic and confusion which did not augur well for the future. On the "frequent" Cabinet changes, the APP said these were meaningless since no new talent was brought into government: "Junior ministers who have not shown any special ability have been promoted while ministers who have been ineffective in one ministry are being sent to other ministries for which whatever talents they have are even less suited." REPORTED TRIBALISM--Alhaji Mumuni Bawumia, chief executive of the Cocoa Marketing Board (CMB) told the press in Accra that an anonymous caller had threatened him with assassination over the telephone. He said the caller had warned him that the office of CMB chief executive was not for northerners. Alhaji Bawumia said the threat was unfortunate at this stage of Ghana's nationhood because of its tribalistic element. "I prefer to die as a Ghanaian rather than a northernor," he said. PFP, APP OFFICIAL'S RESIGNATION--Mr. Saki Scheck, a leading member of the Popular Front Party, has announced his resignation from the party as well as from the newly-formed All People's Party. In a press statement issued in Accra recently, Mr. Saki Scheck said he was disgusted at the growing attitude of intolerance and the use of intrigue and other base methods that had crept into the affairs of the PFP. He was particularly disturbed by what looked like a conspiracy to impose on the rank and file of the PFP a leadership that "is clearly unacceptable to the overwhelming majority of the people", he said. Mr. Saki Scheck was the first private secretary to the late Dr. Kwame Nkrumah and later the government's Chief Whip in the Busia regime. Mr. Scheck said: "The problems of this country are enormous, but they can be solved with proper planning and organisation and the right kind of leadership. He added that "the task of rebuilding the country from the present mess called for a leadership that commands a certain degree of loyalty and support from the people. Consequently, to elect a leader without taking into account the feelings of the rank and file can be politically disastrous for the whole nation". CANCUN VIEWED AS 'SMALL STEP FORWARD'

Conakry HOROYA in French No 2890 1-7 Nov 81 p 42

[Excerpt] The proceedings of the international conference on cooperation and development, better known as the "North-South Dialogue" ended in Cancun in Mexico with the adoption of a final document promising to continue global negotiations through the UN between the developed and the developing contries.

During the 2-day debates, the chiefs of government and state of 22 countries, of which 14 belonged to the developing nations, proceeded to an exchange of views on the future of international cooperation in favor of development and the renewed launching of the world economy. They concentrated their efforts mainly on the review of food security and agricultural development, on basic products, on commerce, industrialization, energy and monetary and financial problems.

In the view of observers, the results of the Cancun summit, while rather slim, constitute a small step forward in relation to recent years, when certain countries systematically opposed global negotiations.

Indeed, the complexity of the problems presently affecting the world economy had brought about a continuous deterioration in the relations between the so-called "rich" countries and the developing nations. Because of the impasse reached in recent years in the negotiations held in various places at an international level aimed at establishing a new international economic order, it was not expected that the Cancun summit would achieve such results. Thus, the fact that both groups of countries agreed to continue the negotiations through UN organisms has helped to open the way for a future dialogue centering on development and international cooperation.

HOUPHOUET-BOIGNY SPEECH AT FRANCO-AFRICAN SUMMIT

AB051808 Abidjan FRATERNITE MATIN in French 5 Nov 81 p 26

[Speech made by Ivorian President Houphouet-Boigny at the closing session of the Franco-African summit in Paris on 4 November]

[Excerpts] Mr President, in your brilliant speech you stressed one point: Capital for us. In Cancun you defended, with faith and determination, the problem which sets the conditions of our development: i.e., the stability of the prices of our raw materials. As you have by your side Minister Claude Cheysson, who for several years faithfully and eloquently defended our interests, I would like--since all of us here are associate members of the EEC which you have just mentioned in connection with the plan for the guarantee of our export earnings and the plan for a price stabilization system [STABEX], and since all of us here are among friends--to tell you the truth, confidence calls for the truth.

Of course, in this hard, difficult world we have considered the EEC as one of the biggest forums for possible and useful cooperation between the poor and the rich countries. We must admit that if in the Yaounde I and II and Lime I and II conventions our European partners made the solemn pledge to guarantee our export earnings, unfortunately they were not the only ones interested in these markets. All of Europe, America and the East are interested in these markets and we are sorry to say that the commitments made by the European countries toward our countries do not affect the other countries.

I would like to take this opportunity to refute some plausible arguments when I defended the price of cocoa. This is valid not only for cocoa but also for all mineral and agricultrual raw materials.

A Farmer in Front of You

Some are asking for an increase of 2, 3, 4 percent, others want 5 to 10 percent increases and precautions have been taken in order to conclude these steps successfully. I am referring to high officials of the EEC, of which a most brilliant former member is in President Mitterrand's government today as minister for external relations. When they could not agree on prices, the matter was sent to agriculture ministers of EEC member countries. And if, as often is the case, the ministers cannot reach an agreement the issue is sent to the summit. Through a political will, because it is in the interest of the EEC, a compromise is reached to satify both parties. But as for us, the associate members of the EEC, what process do they follow? They reject the real prices of our agricultural products, while there is no way we can talk about the prices of wheat, wine or milk, without taking their production cost into consideration.

Enlightening Opinion

I do not like to go into this controversial issue. What I know to be true is that our African peasants are made to bear a very heavy burden. So what are we asking? What we are asking is that our production costs should be taken into consideration. Since we do not have the means to use force, we demanded that the minimum prices imposed on us should be adhered to, at least, throughout the same harvesting period. Our recurrent and even investment budgets are based on our export revenue. Yet what do we see introduced: the systematic reduction of prices within the same harvest period. I want to enlighten the opinion of those who like President Mitterrand, defend the work of our farmers and workers. I will let other friendly voices talk about industrialization during our meetings, but I would like to stress that even STABEX, which we welcomed with a lot of hope, does not have the means to give us satisfaction: only 36 billion [currency not stated] for all the ACP countries for 5 years.

When the Ivory Coast's revenue fell by half to 350 billion from our two major products, what did STABEX, thanks to French representatives, offer us--only 5 billion. I will, therefore, ask during our meetings that we come together and ask our European friends to be more enthusaistic in defending our interests. I know it is very difficult. We are dealing with the East, the state-employer, but we are also dealing with the West, an extremely powerful economic and financial group which imposes its laws on us. What can we do? They speak to us of producers and consumers.

We have never dealt with consumers, but with intermediaries acting between the production they do not pay for and the consumption which is very costly. From year to year our coffee and cocoa cost less and less while coffee and chocolate consumers pay more and more money for the items. We have to deal with anonymous but powerful intermediaries. We are, henceforth, appealing to France to help us. We have spoken of destabilisation. But our brothers in this gathering know that there is a background. Poverty has been spreading because our raw materials--whether agricultural or mineral--are not being paid for. This is what very often brings about the policy of destabilization.

Some of our friends will have the opportunity to stress these major realities; that development implies prerequisites: peace and security. We do not want to elaborate. But my brothers, we must be conscious of this fact; having been asked to undertake negotiations on your behalf for fair prices for our raw materials, I met the same attitude both in the East and in the West. Apart from France and its friends, they all agree not to pay the fair price for our efforts. We are asking our French friends to help us to train our cadres.

When the day comes and we stop selling our iron ore and copper ore; when the day comes and we stop selling our raw materials as we are doing now, and when, thanks to you, we have our own technicians to ensure domestic manufacturing using all or part of our raw materials, there will then be another language, the language of respect for all interests concerned, and this is the appeal I am making to France for the training of our cadres.

Certainty To Succeed

Our pointing out the deterioration of trade terms would be in vain and besides, this would not be new to those who benefit from it at our expense. As long as we are unable to transform our products into finished or semi-finished products we will be subjected to the sad law of supply and demand. We are full of hope. I will add that we are approaching this conference with the certainty that we will arrive at decisions and at the hope for a better life through your understanding and also through our desire to progress within 10, 20 or 30 years. What is 30 years in the life of a people? The old man here is addressing the youth and asking them to gird their hearts and make the education and training of cadres the salvation of Africa. The old man's call would then not appear as any empty call in the desert. But then, even in the desert one must never despair: if you shout the dunes will reecho your voice.

Excuse me for having been a little long but I was bent on informing my brothers of the difficulties that we are facing in our negotiations with these money powers, these selfish intermediaries. With the hope that France is building in us, and also with the determination to see a change in the present state of affairs we hope that our children will see better days and this is the wish of all.

Thank you.

'AFP' LOOKS AT DIFFICULTIES FACING DOE REGIME

AB121835 Paris AFP in English 1731 GMT 12 Nov 81

[Text] Monrovia, 12 Nov (AFP)--Eighteen months after seizing power in Liberia, head of state Samuel Doe has a double fight on his hands: to strengthen his still fragile regime and overcome an extremely worrying economic situation.

The 29-year-old leader has weathered two serious political crises since toppling President William Tolbert in Liberia, independent since 1847, on 13 April last year. But an indication of lingering worries is the 5-hour curfew that is still in force in Monrovia each night.

Last June Mr Doe--he has dropped his original rank of master-sergeant--foiled a plot against him and had 13 military personnel involved sentenced to death. Only 2 months later General Thomas Weh Syen, considered the second most powerful man in the government, and four other members of the ruling Peoples Redemption Council were accused of attempting a coup and shot.

In order to strengthen his own authority the head of state does not hesitate to strike hard at the roots of trouble. During the last few weeks, there has been a widespread purge against corruption which has not spared his own immediate circle.

Thus on 21 October former Justice Minister Chea Cheapoo was arrested as he tried to flee across the border to Ivory Coast after a warrant had been issued against him for alleged illegal appropriation of property.

Mr Cheapoo was dismissed a month earlier for behaviour incompatible with the administration of justice and imprisoned for allegedly building up a private arsenal, but released soon afterwards.

Also on 29 October Finance Minister George Dunye and his deputy for social matters were dismissed in an investigation into embezzlement of public funds.

On the economic front a 4-year development plan was launched in the middle of this year and what Mr Doe called a survival budget adopted.

This budget envisages expenditure of $431.1 million against revenue of 390 million--more than 43 million up on the previous budget. The extra cash was planned to come from a special national reconstruction tax on income, an increase in fuel and beer prices, and especially a rise in the price of the staple food, rice, from $20 to $24 for a 100 pound (45 kilo) bag.

Of the money raised $230 million is to be spent on the rural sector, where two-thirds of the population live, 109 million on road improvements, energy (41 million), the development of small and medium-size industries (31.3 million), education (50 million) and health (31.5 million).

When the budget was introduced President Doe said the government was faced with difficult choices by an economic and financial situation which remained serious.

The head of state said that apart from difficulties inherited from the Tolbert regime the world economic crisis had seriously affected Liberia. Fuel prices had not stopped rising and Liberian exporting industries had not performed satisfactorily.

One such industry is iron ore, of which Liberia is Africa's principal supporter. Rising production costs and a drop in demand for steel are to blame.

Similarly the fall in world prices of coffee and cocoa have affected the agricultural sector.

Strikes have also broken out from time to time, in spite of a government ban on such protests. In September some 1,000 teachers struck, followed in October by 600 workers of the largest iron ore mining company, Lamco, and 900 nurses at the John F. Kennedy Medical Centre in Monrovia. All were demanding higher wages and better working conditions.

At the moment Monrovia is calm, and internal business appears to be thriving, but problems persist. Last week President Doe decided to freeze all government expenditures apart from salaries, and forbid ministers and public services from buying new vehicles for the next 6 months. And to show that every little helps on the long and difficult road to economic stability the states only Boeing-737 airliner is to be put up for sale.

DOE SHUTS DOWN PAPER FOR SECOND TIME THIS YEAR

AB041703 Paris AFP in English 1646 GMT 4 Nov 81

[Text] Monrovia, 4 Nov (AFP)--The military government of Liberia today suppressed the independent newspaper THE DAILY OBSERVER for the second time in a year for what it called not working in the interests of our revolution and country.

The move follows a report today by the newspaper about a group of exiles from Guinea in Liberia and elsewhere, in which the exiles called for immediate abolition of the one-party state in Guinea, Liberia's northern neighbour.

Liberian head of state Samuel K. Doe told the paper's proprietor Kenneth Best that he was closing down the OBSERVER until it produced the man who had been identified as spokesman for the group.

The OBSERVER report quoted teacher and journalist Cheik Mohamed Kone, who spoke of GWPP members of concerned citizens of Guinea in exile.

Mr Doe said in a letter to the OBSERVER's owner that after repeated warnings to be responsible in dealing with issues in your paper, you have failed to take my advice.

He added that in view of the Guinea-Liberia relationship to which I attach great importance, your paper would remain closed until such time I deem necessary to remove the ban.

The DAILY OBSERVER was closed temporarily in July after it published a statement from students in support of a national student leader who had been declared banned.

OBJECTIONS TO U.S. BASE ON DIEGO GARCIA OUTLINED

Saint Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 16 Sep 81 p 13

> [Text] Yesterday's current events hour on the radio at 1330, presented by Jean Philippe Roussy, dealt with a subject which is of the greatest interest to Reunion and its people, and which TEMOIGNAGES has repeatedly discussed. The Diego Garcia military base, the history of how it came to be installed there, its role in the Indian Ocean, these were the themes clearly presented by Andre Oraison, a professor of international law at Saint Denis University.

The broadcast was well condensed, giving a good picture of the background of the question. Many listeners undoubtedly learned a great deal in three quarters of an hour about the history of the Chagos Archipelago, of which the island of Diego Garcia is a part.

The population was brought forcibly to the island after having been snatched from Africa, to meet the needs of the copra plantations for slaves, then "exported" a few centuries later, still by force, for the "needs" of the Anglo-Americans for military bases.

To force the "Islanders" to leave, the British power, whose colony Mauritius then was, stopped supplying them. A radical procedure that threw hundreds of them into the shantytowns of Victoria and Port Louis. Compensation, which was ridiculous, was not paid until years later, in 1978. Uprooted and miserable they became, in the apt words of Andre Oraison, "the Palestinians of the Indian Ocean."

The dealings between Great Britain and the United States resulted in a statutory order of 8 November 1965, which "excises the Chagos Archipelago from the territory of Mauritius," to put Diego Garcia at the disposal of the United States. Oraison, who is a jurist, stressed the fact that this measure constitutes a flagrant violation of the principle, which is fundamental in public international law, by which any colonial territory--in this case Mauritius--must move toward its independence with its integrity respected.

Blackmail

The formula for the broadcast provided for questions from listeners and answers by the guest. One listener pointed out that the autonomous Mauritian government had itself agreed, some time before the country's independence, to the amputation of its territory. The answer made it very clear that the "agreement" had in fact been forced by Great Britain in return for blackmail relative to the granting of Mauritian independence.

Generally, this current events hour has honestly and objectively informed Reunion public opinion about a hotly-debated subject with major implications for our country--the militarization of the Indian Ocean. FR3 had invited a researcher from the university for yesterday's show, one who for a year and a half has been working on "the military implantation process in Diego Garcia." We were treated to well-organized reports, solidly supported by the facts, removed from any political passion and safe from the usual anti-Soviet schemes.

This was undoubtedly too much for some inveterate victims of the usual brainwashing on the subject, and they rushed to their telephones.

This gave us several collected "questions," a good sampling of the crude propaganda that is ordinarily handed out, but which FR3 was able to avoid yesterday. These speakers spoke agitatedly of "Russians in Port Louis, in Diego Suarez and from the top to the bottom of Africa!"

A Natural Presence

These wild imaginings at least had the merit that they allowed the broadcast to get to the bottom of things and refocus them clearly. The basic points of the question were clearly established. The Soviet presence in the Indian Ocean, Andre Oraison explained, is "natural" because that ocean is the maritime connection, the inevitable and natural path of transit between the European and Far Eastern parts of the territory of the Soviet Union. This presence was nothing but peaceful until 1965.

It was the United States, said the Dionysian from the university, which for economic reasons "was led to come to the fore." The arms race in the Indian Ocean was /launched by the Anglo-Americans in 1965./ [in boldface].

Finally he stated--an affirmation supported by J.-Ph. Roussy himself--that Diego Garcia is the only military base in the Indian Ocean* and that the Soviets do not have a base. Of course, as a result of the Americans' military implantation, they do have mooring facilities in some ports. But the reality, which no propaganda can distort, is this: the North Americans are responsible for the arms race and the threats of nuclearization that are weighing heavily upon our region.

The Reunion Communist Party and its secretary general, Paul Verges have been stating all of these irrefutable facts forever. That FR3 today is informing the Reunion public about these facts is a positive move, it is the path to honesty, the only possible path if Reunion is to move ahead. There is still much, much to be done along that path.

---

*It is the only base in the world having the authority to control the whole region. This is not the case, Oraison said, with the French base at Djibouti.

DAKAR REPORTS ON CONTINUING DIOUF VISIT

AB132226 Dakar Domestic Service in French 2000 GMT 13 Nov 81

[Excerpts] President Abdou Diouf this morning made contact with the interior of Gambia. The head of state's visit continues in a triumphal way, according to the reporters of the Senegalese Radio and Television Broadcasting Service. His passage from one locality to another is marked by an identical stamp of warm welcome. Bassang and (?Bassei) were no exceptions to this manifestation of warm welcome.

The Senegambian confederacy will be a reality very soon. The will of the people will be transformed into reality by President Abdou Diouf and Sir Dawda Jawara. In this way, a new leaf will be turned in the history of Africa. Looking through the archives it will be found that Senegal and Gambia have always formed one and the same people, one and the same country which the colonial masters arbitrarily divided up by treading upon the interests of the populations. But then, this hypothesis notwithstanding, the valiant sons of Senegambia who, following the examples of (Lath) Dior, (Mawan Diangou) and Kore Doumbia, have always said no to fear and humiliation and yes to national (?unity), peace and sincere friendship.

The dates of 12, 13 and 14 November 1981 will go down in history as important in the evolution of [words indistinct]. This already historic visit of the president of the republic and Mrs Abdou Diouf to Gambia is the living symbol of the will of two peoples united by the same ties, the determination of two leaders inspired by [word indistinct], and who mean to redress the errors of colonial history while at the same time showing to Africa that without regional groupings no economy can be developed.

All this is to show you that the head of state is more than satisfied with his visit. Moreover, there is no problem at the level of the two political parties. There are only identical views since a political confederacy (?pact) was signed some months ago.

As I told you yesterday talks between the two heads of state took place in a familiar atmosphere without any protocol. There is no doubt that before leaving Banjul, President Abdou Diouf will sign, along with President Dawda Kairaba Jawara, the Senegambian Confederacy Pact. Three meetings are scheduled for tomorrow in Kaworr, Makalensing and Marasenye before President Abdou Diouf and Mrs Abdou Diouf's departure for Dakar at about 1700 hours.

FINANCIAL BACKERS APPROVE ORIENTATIONS OF DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 24-25 Oct 81 p 17

[Excerpt] Senegal organized a meeting of backers in Paris from 19 to 21 October 1981, to study the possibilities for long- and medium-term financing for the Fifth Economic and Social Development Plan (1981-1985).

The meeting brought together representatives of the governments of the German Republic /sic; probably FRG/ , Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Spain, the United States, France, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom and Switzerland, as well as the African Development Bank, the Arab Bank for African Economic Development, the European Investment Bank, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank), the Islamic Development Bank, the West African Development Bank, the West African Economic Community, the European Communities Commission, the Inter-State Committee to Fight the Drought in the Sahel, the United Nations Conference on Commerce and Development, the Sahel Club, the International Agricultural Development Fund, the Kuwaiti Fund, the International Monetary Fund, the Saudi Fund, the Iraqi Fund, the Guarantee Fund of the Joint African and Mauritian Organization, the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, and the United Nations Development Program and World Food Program.

After analyzing the current situation of the Senegalese economy and presenting the adjustment program undertaken by the authorities with the support of the World Bank and the IMF, the delegation from Senegal reported on its needs for financing for the national equipment budget for 1981-82 and 1982-83 and the additional financing necessary for the period of the Fifth Plan. In addition the delegation presented to the sponsors a list of new projects included in the plan.

The representatives of the participating countries and institutions were aware of the courageous recovery efforts undertaken by the government of Senegal, and expressed their desire to continue to support the action of the Senegalese authorities. They were eager to express their agreement with the general directions of the plan, the total volume of investment anticipated, as well as with the sectoral distribution favoring the directly productive sectors.

The pledges by various participants are a positive contribution to the solution of the problems of financing the Senegalese plan, especially with respect to its first two years. They will be outlined and made concrete on the occasion of later bilateral contacts which the Senegalese authorities intend to conduct as soon as possible. This meeting, then, is a first important step toward financing that is better adapted to the priority objectives of the recovery plan.

NETHERLANDS RICE DONATION

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 24-25 Oct 81 p 4

[Article by Pape Sedlkh Mbodje: "A Gift from the Kingdom of the Netherlands: 1,800 Tons of Rice for Senegal"]

[Excerpts] The Kingdom of the Netherlands has just offered our country 1,800 tons of white rice, worth over 300 million CFA francs. The ceremony took place yesterday morning at the SOCOPAO [expansion unknown] warehouses on the Km 4 road from Rufisque, attended by the Netherlands charge d'affaires, M. W. J. Witkam and the Food Aid commissioner, Souleymane Ndlaye.

The rice, which is destined especially for the Casamance region, is the result of a request of the Senegalese government to make up for part of its food shortage.

In his speech Souleymane Ndlaye, after recalling the 7,500 tons of wheat which the Netherlands government had made available to Senegal in 1978 and the 3,400 tons of wheat sent in 1980, as part of the fight against the harmful effects of the drought in Senegal, then indicated that the Kingdom of the Netherlands has never failed to make a contribution in difficult times and in several fields.

According to the charge d'affaires, one of the things that encouraged the government of the Netherlands to contribute to Senegal's food shortage was the agricultural policy of our country, which aspires to food self-sufficiency. Speaking of the measures taken at the conference organized by the Senegalese National Food Committee, Mr Witkam said that they include a food investment plan covering the years from 1977 to 1985, at the production level. He also indicated that the government of the Netherlands also wished to contribute to this plan through financing and executing a plan for the irrigated small-village outskirts in the River region.

SUPREME COURT GIVEN NEW POWERS--The National Assembly this morning unanimously adopted a bill which increases the powers of the supreme court. According to this bill, the Supreme Court is vested with new powers to check the regularity of the electoral campaign and also to control voting procedures during presidential and legislative elections, this new bill is aimed at guaranteeing the sincere, objective and democratic character of elections in Senegal. It empowers the Supreme Court to supervise the equality of candidates and the use of campaign publicity, and to check regularity in the appointment of supervisors to monitor voting, electoral operations and the counting of ballots. The Supreme Court is also charged with counting the votes, the announcement of the results and also control of the validity of the election of members of parliament. It can also issue injunctions against administrative authorities in attempts to maintain equality among candidates without resorting to any jurisdictional procedure, point which constitutes an innovation in Senegalese public law. Moreover, this new bill raises the number of parliamentarians in the national assembly from 100 to 200 and specifies that candidates obtaining less than 5 percent of the ballot in presidential elections lose their cash deposits. CLOSER TIES LINK SEYCHELLOIS, SOVIET WORKERS

Victoria NATION in English 29 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] FURTHER contact between the Seychellois National Workers' Union and the Soviet All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions has led to the strengthening of cooperation between the two workers' organisations, particularly in the field of training.

The latest contacts were made by the NWU's Secretary for Education and Research, Mr Shelton Jolicoeur, during his vist to Moscow earlier this month to attend the Soviet-African scientific and political conference "for Peace and Social Progress". The conference was also attended by the Minister of Education and Information, Mr. James Michel.

AUCCTU, which has been helping the education programme for Seychellois workers since 1978, is willing, according to Mr Jolicoeur, to provide more materials, including a projector for use on Praslin and La Digue and films on trade union education.

The Soviet council also wishes to continue the 35-day training course for Seychellois trade unionists in the USSR Higher Trade Union School — "a form of training course which has already taken on a traditional character", says Mr Jolicoeur's report on his visit.

Trade union officials from Seychelles may also benefit from a ten-month training course in Moscow.

EMPLOYER-LABOR RELATIONS DISCUSSED

Victoria NATION in English 29 Oct 81 p 1

[Text] THE first education seminar for the new sector secretaries of the re-organised National Workers' Union ended yesterday with a call for them to keep up good relations both with workers and employers.

Closing the eight-day seminar at the union headquarters in the Maison du Peuple, the Secretary General of the SPPF, Mr. Guy Sinon, himself an experienced trade unionist in the past, explained that the sector secretaries' success would depend largely on their approach to their job.

Recalling his extensive experience, Mr. Sinon also gave hints on the best way to keep fruitful and mutually respectful relations with employers as much as with the workers.

However great the difference of opinion or feeling between the sides involved in a dispute, it should naver be a barrier to rational and constructive behaviour, he said.

Mr. Olivier Charles, the NWU Chairman, had cautioned earlier that sector secretaries should at all times maintain good contact with the rank and file of the workers.

The sector secretaries' time was now dedicated to the workers they represented and with whom they would have to share the knowledge gained over the past week or so.

Looking at the union as a whole, the Front Secretary General pointed out that such seminars were important in educating trade unionists in the path chosen by the Party.

Speaking on behalf of his ten other colleagues, Mr. Jean Pointe, the sector secretary for education, health, labour and social security, said that although the seminar had helped them considerably in preparing themselves to better carry out their responsibilities, there was still much to learn.

Mr. Pointe called on the workers to co-operate here and looked forward to fruitful relations at grassroot level.

During the seminar, the participants, under the guidance of senior trade union officials, discussed the history of the labour movement in Seychelles and the relations between the SPPF, the Government and the NWU.

PAY INCREASE REFLECTS GOVERNMENT EFFORT TO IMPROVE LIVING

Victoria NATION in English 30 Oct 81 pp 1, 2

[Editorial]

[Text] THE lowest paid Government worker this week carried home a fatter pay packet — and no doubt there was a silent nod of satisfaction from members of his family.

In a move aimed at improving the standard of living of the lower paid and narrowing the gap in incomes between higher and lower paid Government workers, the Government has increased by 14 per cent the minimum wage for workers in the public sector, who will now draw over R. 1000 per month.

The increase in wages is only part of a continuing Government effort to raise the standard of living for the people in this country.

The revaluation of the rupee with its intended effect of controlling the rate of inflation, coupled with the move to control prices of consumer goods, are significant milestones towards this goal.

What do all these steps reflect? Essentially they underline the superiority of our socialist system where the development of man is the cornerstone.

Under Socialism, the people are guaranteed enough food, proper housing, adequate health and a sound education. These amenities are provided through a planned and balanced economy.

A healthy economy, bringing in continuous rewards and a better standard of living is built, however, upon the active participation of the people themselves. And that is where all of us — whatever our contribution in the building of our country — come in.

Increased wages reflect a healthy economy, yet they also call for increased productivity.

For our country to develop and bring progress for everyone, all of us must be prepared to work hard to create that prosperity.

We need to produce more in order to advance, and every worker must contribute to bring about the necessary increase in productivity.

The recent increase in our wages therefore, must inspire us to more hard work and we must here and now resolve to wage war against those fellow workers who believe in getting paid for doing nothing.

POLICE SATISFIED WITH LATEST DISASTER PLAN EXERCISE

Victoria NATION in English 24 Oct 81 pp 1, 2

[Text] ABOUT 150 people were mobilised or put on action standby during the peak traffic hours yesterday afternoon for the country's third Major Disaster Plan exercise.

According to Deputy Police Commissioner Max Fontaine, the Incidence Officer, everything worked well, though that is no cause for complacency.

The "accident" involved a "jumbo jet with 442 people on board which undershot the runway and hit the sea while coming in to land at the Pointe Larue international airport at 3.15 p.m. yesterday afternoon."

Within minutes the police and ambulances were weaving their way through the traffic which had deliberately been kept at its normal pace, while calls went out to all the other departments, parastatals, organisations and individuals involved, either at the "scene of the accident", hospital, reception centres or on action standby.

Using school children as the "passengers", the exercise also involved the use of the airport dinghies and police boats as well as medical staff, firemen and other airport staff to rescue and treat the "passengers" and rush the "casualties" to Victoria hospital.

As the work progressed details of the "dead, injured and saved" were recorded at the Incidence Post at the airport and sent down to the Casualty Bureau at Police headquarters. And to make the exercise more real as well as to check the efficiency of the Bureau, calls were made and details of casualties sought by officials involved. The Bureau was functioning efficiently.

The efficiency of the rescue teams and other workers, including firemen, were also tested at sea and on land at the temporary mortuary and reception centres, so that just over an hour after the "call" first went out, all "those on board" had been accounted for and the "search for the Black Box" was under way. (It was found some 20 minutes later).

Commenting on the exercise, Deputy Commissioner Fontaine expressed satisfaction with the response time of all those involved as well as the rescue work. But he added: "Of course there are some things that have to be improved to make us more efficient".

These will be discussed at an evaluation meeting later.

SEYCHELLOIS ISLAND NAMES CLARIFIED

Victoria NATION in English 30 Oct 81 pp 1, 2

[Text] THE Seychelles archipelago is made up of no less than 115 islands and 30 prominent rocks. The inner islands total 43, with the 72 others being classed in the outer group.

These are the figures from a revised official list of Seychelles islands recently approved by the Council of Ministers giving official names for all of them.

Up to now many of the islands had two or even three names. Sometimes these were English versions of Creole or French names or vice-versa, as in the case of Ile Ronde and Round Island, and sometimes they had completely different English names such as Remire and Eagle.

Now all the islands have one official name. None of the islands with one name has been affected, but all alternative English names have been dropped.

Among the more well-known examples are Ile aux Vaches instead of Bird Island, Ile Seche and not Beacon and Ile aux Fous instead of Booby.

In the list are such unusual sounds as Zavé, Boudeuse, Manaha, Malabar, Ilot Yangue and Ile du Trou.

Of the outer islands, 25 are in the Amirantes group with 13 of these in St. Joseph's atoll, three in Poivre atoll and two in the African Banks.

The Farquhar group has 13 islands, ten of which are in the atoll of the same name and the rest in Providence atoll.

The largest island group as far as numbers are concerned is that of Aldabra with 27. Fourteen of these are in the huge Aldabra atoll and the rest in the expansive Cosmoledo.

The 30 largest rocks in the archipelago include names such as Trois Dames, Trompeuses, Roche Grand Maman, and Cheminée. The list also gives the location of these potential menaces to shipping.

The lists were drawn up by a special committee which included survey staff. The next step is for the list to be legally attached as an amended schedule to the country's constitution.

PRESIDENT STEVENS ADDRESSES APC CONGRESS

London WEST AFRICA in English No 3352, 26 Oct 81 pp 2544-45

[Text]

President Stevens said recently that there was no lack of discussion inside the one-party system and maintained that there was full freedom of expression within the party ranks.

Speaking at the opening session of the national delegates' conference of the All People's Congress, APC, on 16th October, in Port Loko district, the President cited the impending general election as an example in which arrangements have been made for constituencies to put up two or three candidates instead of one, to give the people a chance to make a choice.

Turning to the economy and development, the President reminded the people that the major part of the economy in Sierra Leone was outside their control. He explained that there was a fall in the prices of diamonds and in agricultural products such as coffee, cocoa, ginger and palm kernel. These commodities, he said, used to bring in the bulk of foreign exchange while oil took up most of the meagre foreign exchange. The President, however, noted that if the people had not been able to adapt themselves to changing conditions, things would have been worse than they are at present.

The President asked delegates to give serious consideration to the fact that the little foreign earnings left after payment for fuel oil was all used to import rice, while those who should plant rice were migrating to big towns. Dr. Stevens said that the situation gave cause for Africans to pay Europeans to provide them with rice to eat, and warned that if serious attention was not given, people would be starved by outsiders.

The President cited smuggling as another area of the economic field which Sierra Leone suffers, noting that about 50 per cent of the goods imported found their way outside the country without equivalent returns in foreign exchange. He urged the government to give full attention to the attending economic problems of the free movement of people advocated by the OAU and ECOWAS.

President Stevens said that arrangements were now being made to make it possible for civil servants and other public officers to contest general elections, but he believed many civil servants and other public officers would not be expected to take advantage of this new arrangement right away. He assured them that the way was now open to them to do so in the future.

The President also spoke of the recent industrial unrest and the declaration of the state of emergency resulting in the detention of 180 people all of whom had been released. He called on all to pull together for the common good. Dr. Stevens reminded all that there was provision in the Constitution to make fresh laws to redress grievances and to improve the country, and warned people not to take the law into their own hands.

BOTHA, BUTHELEZI COULD MAP OUT NEW APPROACH

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 26 Oct 81 p 24

[Article by Wilf Nussey: "Steering Away From Disaster"]

[Text]

Next month South Africans will see events at opposite ends of the national spectrum which jointly could have a powerful influence on where this country goes: to a bright future, or down the drain.

One of the events has been initiated by the black moderate quarter and the other by the white right and at first glance they would seem to have very little in common.

But dig a little deeper and you find a great deal of mutuality, in their motives at least.

Both will seek to plot a course away from the rapidly looming, disastrous collision that threatens between black aspirations and the determination of whites, especially Afrikaners, to preserve their rights, status and quality of life.

Both want to find a formula which will escape the crippling political and economic extremes into which so much of decolonised Africa has plunged.

And both want a free enterprise system in which opportunities will be equal for all.

On November 12 the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, will speak in Cape Town at the "second Carlton" conference he has called to follow up the one of two years ago at Johannesburg's Carlton Hotel, when he announced his scheme for a total economic strategy in which Government and private enterprise would combine their might to try to cure the national ailments.

In the week or two after that Chief Gatsha Buthelezi is expected to make public the blueprint, by a commission he appointed a year ago, for a new system of regional government covering Natal and kwaZulu in which blacks and whites will share power under a constitution protecting minorities.

Even were they not timed so close together these two events would have to be read together in the overall South African context. And if either proponent ignores the other's case, both could suffer.

When he stands up in Cape Town to talk to the galaxy of industrialists, businessmen and professional people he has invited, Mr Botha will have to disperse a fog of disillusionment, cynicism and mistrust surrounding him.

It results from his having marked time for two years, from his failure to fulfil the glossy hopes of action and reform he raised at the first Carlton conference — and two months earlier when he pointed out in a fiery speech to the National Party's Transvaal congress that God was not a solely Afrikaner institution and that South Africans of all colours defended our borders.

He certainly knows that he has to come up with something solid on November 12 if the fast declining euphoria he generated is not to die altogether. So he is expected to produce some positive action, real meat for the private sector to get its corporate teeth into.

He is playing it very close to the chest, obviously to give it the greatest impact on the day, and there are no leaks. But the issues he is almost certain to tackle include:

● The lot of the urban black — whom the Government now accepts as an ineradicable fact of life — his status, rights and possibly his political channels.

● The desperate shortage of black housing, the red tape bogging down progress, and how the might of free enterprise can be used to help.

● Influx control versus a man's right to sell his skills where he wishes, the rational use of labour, and the considerable impact of the Wiehahn and Riekert reforms.

● National education, the urgent need for more technical and less academic training, and possibly aspects of the controversial De Lange blueprint for education.

● The sensitive issue of whether central business districts should be freely opened to Asians and coloured people.

● Possibly that most pertinent matter of all— the much-mooted confederation of states in South Africa.

All of these are probable because all are integral parts of the slowly coalescing "total strategy" to counter internal upheaval.

One thing that is certain is that November 12 will not be a general symposium with various magnates orating their views after the Prime Minister as they did at the first Carlton.

It will be a down-to-earth working meeting at which Mr Botha is expected to make a forthright statement — partly a report back, partly an account of plans and policy, all of it a challenge to his guests — followed by questions and discussions, not polemics.

Of course, all of Mr Botha's grand planning will be inside the fences of separate development, which confine him politically. The major interest will focus on how far he is prepared to stretch those fences to accommodate the change and reform vital for South Africa's survival.

Hopefully, he will go at least far enough to admit at least serious negotiation on the formula drawn up by the Buthelezi Commission and already in the hands of the kwaZulu Government.

As the commission's chairman, Professor Denys Schreiner of Natal University, has said, this formula simply cannot be ignored by the Government and the rest of South Africa.

One of the commission's 42 members, Professor Marious Wiechers, the director of the Institute of Foreign and Comparative Law at the University of South Africa, describes the Buthelezi Commission report as the most important constitutional development in this country for 30 years.

Firstly, it is the first time in South Africa that a black-initiated constitutional scheme has been produced—and it is a highly moderate one which seeks to peacefully accommodate all races in a system which avoids the pitfalls of the rest of Africa.

Secondly, it covers a great deal of the same ground that Mr Botha is manoeuvring on: constitutional and political, planning and administration, economics and development, social services and health, and education.

Third, the commissioners include some of South Africa's most powerful and influential figures, although the National Party refused an invitation to join in.

The warning has been given to the Government that it will ignore these people and their thinking at the nation's peril. Rejection of the Buthelezi Commission formula would further polarise black opinion and reduce the ranks of the moderates who still believe peaceful answers can be found.

Blacks and whites are searching for better means of communication and negotiation and next month's developments could just provide new channels.

That the Government is relaxing in this respect (without yet conceding an inch of separate development, however) is indicated by two items.

One is that the Cabinet has decided to drop once and for all the label "constellation" for the new dispensation it seeks. This originally envisaged the co-operation of neighbour states like Botswana and Zimbabwe and is now stone dead because they have rejected it outright.

Now the Government talks of "confederation" — meaning some sort of loose federal system of co-operation within the borders of the original South Africa.

Its seriousness in this is shown by the other item: that the concept of federation has been written into the still unpublished constitution for the Ciskei, which gets independence in December.

So the will is there, if only in embryo. It is up to Chief Buthelezi and Mr Botha to make it grow.

FORMER RHODESIAN TROOP TRAIN TRANSKEI FORCES

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 25 Oct 81 p 7

[Article by Ray Smuts: "A Crack New Fighting Force Is Emerging in Transkei"]

[Text]

INFLATION as measured by the seasonally adjusted consumer price index rose to an annual rate of 17,7% in the third quarter of this year, according to Dr Gerhard de Kock, the Governor of the Reserve Bank.

This followed a decline from 22% in the last three months of 1980 to 10,4% in the second quarter of 1981.

Dr De Kock made these points in his chairman's address in Pretoria to the National Finance Corporation.

He said that although the economy was on the downswing, this did not mean it was about to experience a depression.

Dr De Kock said: "Indeed thus far in 1981 the economy has remained much more buoyant and total monetary demand much stronger than many experts had predicted.

"Nevertheless in the months ahead the rate of increase of real gross domestic product, currently running at about 4,5%, will probably decline further and many of the economic indicators which increased sharply during the upswing will either rise at a lower rate, level off or actually decline.

"It is an inescapable fact that the economy as a whole, the balance of payments and the exchequer are all being adversely affected by the sharp decline during the past year in the gold price and by the recessionary conditions in many industrial countries which have had a marked contractionary impact on the value and volume of some of our major exports.

"Since the beginning of 1981 the rand has depreciated by about 23% against the rapidly rising United States dollar and by about 12% against a weighted average of all South Africa's main trading partners."

Referring to the surge in money supply in 1980 and in the first four months of this year, he said: "The root cause of this monetary expansion is to be found in the simultaneous existence during 1979 and 1980 of a record surplus on the current account of the balance of payments and the continued application, despite a number of relaxations, of extensive exchange control."

TIME-SPAN FOR BLACK TAKEOVER IS 15 YEARS

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 13 Oct 81 p 25

[Article by Derrick Thema: "SA's 'Time-Span' Is 15 Years"]

[Text] Unless a third world war breaks out, the time span for South Africa's survival without necessarily inferring a black majority takeover will be 15 years, argues Professor Paul Moorcraft.

And for the country to survive, the South African Defence Force must "politicise its own soldiers at all levels."

"The white soldiers must know what they are fighging for because survival is no substitute for a clear political strategy," he says.

The total strategy is a citizen army with all the soldiers enjoying citizenship. All conscripted soldiers must be given a vote and black volunteers must be given a franchise within South Africa and not the homelands.

This does not mean one man, one vote because it is the militarisation of the co-option of the modern theory.

"But this is only a mid-term strategy. White South Africans must accept either a peaceful transition to black majority rule or fight a long-term war which will result in an Israel-style war."

Professor Moorcraft predicts that South Africa will become a battlefield like the Middle East with the homelands becoming ideal military sanctuaries. There would also be conventional pressure on the country's borders and the cities would be turned into battlefields like Ulster, he predicts.

A military government would be installed in five years if the present government fails to understand the need for a political dimension in its defence policies.

South Africa should learn a lesson from Zimbabwe, he says. "The Smith government fought a 90 percent military war and 10 percent political whereas the black force of Mugabe and Nkomo fought a 90 percent political war and 10 percent military war.

"To survive, South Africa must fight a political war: there is a lack of ideological indoctrination in the army."

If a Third World War does not break out in Europe, an inevitable war in South Africa would escalate leading to white garrison states in the Cape and parts of the Orange Free State.

General Magnus Malan, Defence Minister, recently warned that the next five years would be crucial for the survival of the country.

He warned of a revolutionary threat which had reached an "extremely dangerous phase" with an increased tempo of sabotage attempts on key industries and the transport network.

General Constand Viljoen, Chief of the Defence Force, speaking at Potchefstroom University, said that the strategy of anti-South African terrorist organisations was different because they operated countrywide in scattered actions which made great demands on the security forces."

Major-General Johan Coetzee, Security Police Chief, has also warned that while Angola and Mozambique are host countries to the African National Congress, military wing, Lesotho would also be used increasingly as a launching pad for insurgency against South Africa.

Professor Jack Spence, head of political science at Leicester University, recently told the Institute of International Affairs that South Africa, like Northern Ireland, would have to put up with increasing instances of violence. To cope with insurgency, the Government should think in military and political terms because apartheid would hardly do.

In their book, "Why South Africa will survive," authors L.T. Gann and Peter Duignan argue that strength and durability of South Africa makes external guerilla assault or internal rebellion belong "in the realm of military fantasy."

The Organisation of African Unity, they say, is unable to put together a formidable force because most of its members lack a common military organisation, military doctrine, training methods and deployment plan or a general staff.

They also point out that the neighbouring states of Zimbabwe and Mozambique are economically dependent on South Africa.

Gann and Duignan consider the danger potential of industrial strikes, civil disobedience, protest marches, riots and sabotage to be minimal.

At present, they say the labour force is heterogeneous in character, too poorly organised and too unstable to stage the equivalent of the British general strike of 1926. Besides, the homelands and the neighbouring black states provide South Africa with a great reserve army of migrant labour.

School boycotts merely limit the education obtained by students, thus making their struggle for a good job even harder than it was in the first place.

Observers who expect white morale to collapse, they say, seem to be "oblivious to the fact that similar predictions have been made for a generation." Violent outbreaks, they argue, may, in fact, strengthen government control by cementing white unity across class lines.

The Language of Terror

More than 40 terrorist incidents have been reported in South Africa since the beginning of the year: The major incidents were:

--May 7: A hand grenade is thrown at Mr David Thebehali's "mayoral" car in Soweto.

--May 25: A hand grenade is thrown through the window of a Fort Jackson police station; part ot the rail line is destroyed by an explosion between Merebank and Reunion in Durban; the rail line near Mzimholphe station, Soweto is destroyed by an explosion; a pamphlet bomb explodes in Leopold Street, Durban.

--June 28: A goods train travelling between Empangeni and Durban is slightly damaged by an explosion.

--July 21: Five transformers are blown up by limpet mines at Arnot power station, Eastern Transvaal.

--July 21: Two transformers are destroyed by 2 limpet mines at Camden power station.

--A bomb explodes in Smith Street, Durban causing R350 000 damage. A second bomb explodes nearby.

--August 6: Seven business places are damaged by a bomb at Central Square, East London.

--August 12: The Voortrekkerhoogte military base is hit by a rocket; a young Indian boy was wounded.

--August 13: Two blacks are killed and a policeman seriously injured in a shoot-out near Elliot.

--September 3: A death squad of about 30 men with AK-47 rifles attach the Mabopane police station, killing three people.

--October 10: A powerful bomb explodes in central Durban injuring five people.

ASSESSMENT OF BLACK POLITICAL ATTITUDES

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 24 Oct 81 p 7

[Article by Chris Freimond: "Today's Blacks Detect Cracks in Apartheid's Monolith"]

[Text]

THERE has been a dramatic change in black political awareness over the past 10 years — but white attitudes have altered only slightly to accomodate this shift.

This has emerged from research by Professor Lawrence Schlemmer, director of the Centre for Applied Social Sciences at Natal University.

In a paper presented to the business outlook conference of the National Development and Management Foundation in Johannesburg this week, Prof Schlemmer said the "anger and impatience" of blacks on the Witwatersrand with life in South Africa had increased from 39% in 1977 to 54% in 1981.

However most blacks were still prepared to negotiate with whites for change and, as an ideal, white-black power sharing options were more favoured by blacks than black majority rule.

But the response of whites to the new situation was essentially to discourage black belief in the possibility of moderate or evolutionary options. Prof Schlemmer outlined the events that led to renewed black political consciousness.

"In 1972 the dominant (black) sentiment was one of political apathy. The white power system seemed to be massive, rock-like and immovable. The major political response among all except the better-educated minority was one of helpless acquiescence.

"Ten years later the mood has changed dramatically. Whereas black subjects in 1972 were far less concerned with politics than whites in answer to questions about daily affairs, today they are significantly more politically conscious than either whites, Indians or coloureds," he said.

The major and most significant change was that blacks no longer saw the white system as immovable or rock-like in its security as they did in 1972.

They perceived possibilities and opportunities, they were no longer apathetic and there was a great deal more hidden determination and sense of confidence, he said.

Prof Schlemmer listed four main reasons for the change in attitude:

- The success of black nationalism in neighbouring states.
- School boycotts which have tested and defined for blacks the limits and capacity of the internal security system.
- The independence of two major homelands — Transkei and BophuthaTswana — have caused legal disadvantages or the threat of legal disadvantages for urban blacks and migrant workers, and revealed a perceived need for action to counter the erosion of black rights.
- The symbolic effect of sabotage.

But this did not mean the situation South Africa had reached a point of "pre-revolutionary political tension", although Prof Schlemmer said he was "all but confident" in this belief.

"In many respects the white South African employer and the authorities are fortunate in that the basic values and attitudes of South African blacks are moderate and very compatible with key aspects of our institutional system — excluding apartheid," he said.

Three main factors contributed to this:

- About 75% of blacks valued the private enterprise system more than socialist alternatives.

They disliked bureaucratic regimentation — including the highly controlled system of public administration for blacks in South Africa.

- Roughly two-thirds of blacks — even those who were highly discontented — maintained consistently non-violent attitudes.

Generally most blacks believed in dialogue and placed their hopes in a form of leadership which would be able to engage the white authorities in dialogue.

- Seven out of 10 blacks were prepared to accept second-best political options if they improved access to the labour market and basic need-provision services, tended towards equality of opportunity and involved black leaders in meaningful shared decision making.

This was, however, a "very tenuous" advantage which could be shattered in Natal, for example, if

Chief Gatsha Buthelezi stated publicly that peaceful change was impossible.

It should be remembered that about one-third of blacks were consistenly militant in their attitudes. This group contained a core of hundreds of thousands of people who could be revolutionaries seeking an opportunity, Prof Schlemmer said.

It had also been shown in surveys that nearly 50% of blacks in Natal believed that many or most people would co-operate with or shelter African National Congress insurgents if asked to do so discreetly.

The response from the white authorities to the new situation was in effect to tighten — not loosen — constraints on blacks, for example in the application of influx control laws.

Prof Schlemmer said his impression was that where reforms were instituted — such as in housing, community circumstances and education — promises preceding reforms had been larger than the reforms themselves and improvements seemed to be "agonisingly slow".

"It must be considered that our formal approach comes close to what a textbook on destabilisation would prescribe. Are we not raising hopes and then systematically frustrating those expectations with elaborate foot-dragging?"

However, there was a positive response to the new situation from "high-level and prestigious", mainly academic, white groups outside party politics, and they seemed to be achieving increasing consensus about rational and necessary paths of reform.

While very little of this seemed to penetrate through to official policy, it had to be asked for how long the Government could ignore or side-line legitimate expert opinion, he said.

There were also indications that the main body of rank and file white voters had developed an acceptance of reform including the possibility of limited black-white power sharing.

Theoretically there was enough common ground between the majorities in the black and white groups to compromise and negotiate reform — even at constitutional level.

"From the black side this theoretical opportunity is tenuous. There is very little time to waste, but there is some leeway in time available," Prof Schlemmer said.

But theoretical possibility meant little unless the leadership took advantage of it.

White leadership could be swayed by lobbies or influence groups from within the business and professional sectors. These groups could counterbalance pressure from the Right.

Black leadership was a more complex problem involving areas such independent homelands, spokesmen with no formalised following and mass movements.

Prof Schlemmer said leaders like Chief Buthelezi had chosen the only avenue available for negotiated reform given the inevitability of polarisation in South African society, and they deserved support.

BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS GROUPS CALL FOR UNITY

Johannesburg SOWETAN in English 28 Oct 81 p 5

[Article by Sello Rabothata: "Calls To Unite To Fight the Enemy"]

[Text]

BLACK consciousness and non-racial organisations should forget their ideological differences and work towards unity in fighting a common enemy, members of the different organisations said yesterday.

The rivalry in the different black consciousness organisations became public during the Steve Biko commemoration day service at the Jiswa Centre in Lenasia with speakers defending and attacking other organisations and their ideologies.

At anti-rent hike protest meetings in Soweto and another to commemorate the death of Mr Ahmed Timol in detention 10 years ago and the State bannings of black organisations and two newspapers in 1977, speakers called for steps to be taken in unifying the people's organisations.

Mr Douglas Lolwane, former executive member of the Committee of Ten and now member of the Soweto Civic Association, said at a meeting in Tladi: "The Rev Jesse Jackson at Regina Mundi said: 'We can disagree without being disagreeable, we can be unified without being uniform.' These were great words which we can learn from. "It is no use having different organisations who will hold meetings differently and reaching different conclusions. The SCA should accept Azapo, and Azapo should talk to Azanyu for instance. We should have the different leaders of these organisations meeting to work out a common strategy in dealing with issues affecting the people like the rent issue," he said.

The Lenasia Youth Unity (Azanyu) said: "We of Azanyu have noted with alarm and concern the uncalled-for clashes among the black consciousness organisations and the non-racial organisations caused by ideological differences. This type of situation will retard the struggle whereas on the other hand our enemy is busy preparing himself.

"Therefore Azanyu endorses the stand taken by other black consciousness organisations in calling for unity. Through this unity we can be in a position to plan a common programme of action which will enable us to plan our strategies in advance so as to avoid reacting to situations which cause a lot of confusion among the people and thus alienating the leaders from the people resulting in mistrust and lack of confidence."

Azanyu concluded that all organisations should always be ready for action to realise the ultimate goal which is liberation.

NEW PARTY LINES EMERGE ALONG WEALTH, NOT LANGUAGE LINES

Braamfontein FRONTLINE in English Sep/Oct 81 pp 39-40

[Article by Craig Charney: "The New Divisions"]

[Text]

South African politics used to be nice and simple. If you were an Afrikaner you voted Nationalist, if you spoke English you voted for the United Party, and if you were black you didn't vote at all.

In the wake of the 1981 General Election, it's not so simple anymore. It's increasingly clear that the old ethnic blocs which formed the basis of the white party system are unravelling.

In their place could come a class realignment of white political forces. Such a shift would mean more than the collapse of the old rigid structures of white politics: it would probably herald some form of political rights for blacks as well.

Even a glance at this year's election results shows how badly the old Boer vs Brit split explains the new realities.

In scores of seats where Afrikaans farmers, workers, and civil servants live — until now the bedrock support of the National Party — there were swings of 20% to 30% from the NP to the Herstigte Nasionale Party. In some affluent Afrikaans constituencies, there were swings to the Progressive Federal Party.

All told, some 38% of Afrikaans voters didn't choose the NP this time around, according to a careful estimate by Rapport's respected political commentator, Louis Oosthuizen.

At the same time, the NP held onto most of the seats it had won in predominantly English Natal and the big cities.

Underlying these voting shifts was evidence of a growing class split in the white electorate.

A pre-election poll by The Star in three representative seats found that the PFP crushed the NP among affluent English-speakers, 52% to 27%. But among working-class English speakers, the NP led the PFP by 42% to 36%.

Similar though smaller cleavages were evident among Afrikaners. Some 24% of the affluent Afrikaners in the poll said they planned to vote PFP, compared to just 9% of working-class Afrikaners.

On the other side of the fence, the HNP was the choice of 15% of working-class Afrikaners, compared to just 5% among the better off.

What's going on?

It looks as though working-class whites are swinging to the right in self-defence against reform while upper-class Afrikaners who've gained a stake in the economy are leaning to racial accommodation to protect it.

White workers and civil servants fear that the dropping of job colour bars would lead to wage cuts and their eventual replacement by cheaper black labour. Small farmers, too, feel threatened, as Government policies favour the big boys and their debts mount. (Whispers of homeland consolidation - costing them their land - send shivers up their spines.)

It's thus no small wonder that miners and ticket-takers and many others who know they owe their livelihood to the colour of their skins are drawn by the HNP's promise to go back to Verwoerd. A parallel reaction is alienating many working-class English voters, who were staunch UP voters, from the PFP.

On the other hand, those who've made it among Afrikaners and English-speakers seem to be drawing closer.

Thanks in good measure to the control of state resources, the Afrikaners' control of non-agricultural production climbed from 10% to 21% between 1948 and 1975. Their share of the professions went up from 16% to 38%. These changes brought into the ruling circles the very arguments for liberalisation which had been ignored coming from English-speaking businessmen.

As more Afrikaners rose out of the category of unskilled labour in the years after 1948, the 2:1 income gap between Brit and Boer also narrowed sharply.

Thanks to these shifts, the complex apartheid web of labour controls and racial restrictions is no longer necessary to protect the privileges of a large share of whites in both language groups. As long as the future of capitalism is assured, the white monopoly of capital and skills will keep them on top in the marketplace.

But the "little men" know they would be left behind in freer labour and housing markets, in the face of black competition. This first led to the HNP break-away back in 1969, and to the mounting pressure to backtrack as Prime Minister Botha timidly hinted at reforms a decade later.

The movements in the electorate raise the possibility of a new political lineup, uniting affluent English and Afrikaans-speakers (and the urban New Republic vote) in opposition to the HNP, the verkrampte Nats, and the NRP's rural reactionaries.

Such a purely bourgeois ruling party would hardly be radical. Indeed, it might split the difference between the current stands of the verligte Nats and the PFP.

It could be expected to be firm in its support for capitalism and in its opposition to simple majority rule. However, it would probably offer blacks more economic gains, re-institute some civil liberties, and seek to grant political rights to some black allies, in a bid to avert revolution by sharing some political and economic power.

The main factor inhibiting this realignment is traditional party loyalty in the electorate. In the three constituencies polled by the Star, for instance, 63% of upper-class and 59% of working-class Afrikaners normally think of themselves as NP supporters.

Nevertheless, it's clear that a large body of NP supporters think more like HNP members, and that a smaller group are closer to the PFP. Moreover, the Star poll found that 25% of Afrikaners and 47% of English speakers in the three seats had no party allegiance at all anymore.

But so far, the new divisions are just cracks in the old edifice of white politics, though they widen with every NP caucus battle. The problem for the MP's reformists is that they can't act decisively without an open split. But if they force it, they must ensure they end up with the larger share of support.

In the wake of the 1981 election, the pattern into which white politics may break is thus more clearly set out than ever before. Nothing may seem to have changed, but nothing can ever be quite the same. ●

MIDDLE CLASS LABELS SEEM OUT OF PLACE

Johannesburg SOWETAN in English 21 Oct 81 p 7

[Article by Mandla Ndlazi: "What's in a Name?"]

[Text]

THE NEW and not so well planned areas springing up in and around Soweto have been given names that will for some time rouse lively talk among its inhabitants. "Selection Park" is one such name.

"What's in a name", one might muse. Well, let us examine the naked truth about such names.

Fable has it that Truth and Falsehood went bathing; Falsehood came first out of the water and dressed herself in Truth's garments. Truth, unwilling to take those of Falsehood, went naked.

It is therefore so obvious that the name "Selection Park" is falsehood dolled-up in the garments of the naked truth. Most residents there had no choice but to grab the first available site they were offered. It was not of their choice to pick such disgracefully small sites.

The place is in Pimville's Zone 5, and while there are a few houses there that can match some in Johannesburg's posh white suburbs, most are moderate.

The size of the plots is one of the sore points that will forever irritate the people. A point that has tarnished the developer's good intentions and brought in some political connotations that embrace the cries for freehold rights.

A few residents who questioned the local authority successfully applied for a double site. But there was much left to query regarding the monthly rental of such sites. Mr Nico Malan, Soweto Council's chief executive officer, has said the matter has been resolved after some rectifications.

To get back to the name of the place, it leaves much to be desired. The deceptiveness of it is pointed out by critics who say the implications are very disturbing. They cite an incident at the local creche when children of the residents in adjacent Sun-Valley were barred from it.

This started a rumour that the creche was for a "selected" people. Such argument reached the political arena where such places have been labelled buffer strips for a "middle-class" created to stabilise black opinion on the status quo.

One is therefore bound to hold in contempt the very residents who coined the name and those who up till now encourage it. Especially in that not so long ago in this very Pimville there were places romantically called "Maseru", and Thaba Boseo", to give just two examples. Let alone that we have had greats like Sofasonke Mpanza who will forever be associated with the historical formation of Soweto.

"Elite Park", is the name given to the new place in Diepkloof's Zone 4 Extention. Your guess is as good as mine on how fitting that is to the people who live there.

This gives one a sneaking suspicion that there is a group influencing such names. One is in fact compelled to conclude that the intentions are obviously to create a new class of residents. Perhaps a "middle-class" that will say all is well on the Western Front.

But Mr Pat Dempster, executive official of the Urban Foundation, says it is not the goal of the Foundation to create a "middle-class" in Soweto. "Based on inappropriate overseas standards", he explains, "one cannot say that a middle-class has been or is being created in Soweto, nor is it the goal of the Urban Foundation to attempt such an exercise".

Mr Dempster says the term "middle-class" is a misnomer in our society. "It is an imposition from Europe describing conditions that existed there, especially in England.

"To insinuate a capacity and ability to control anything happening in Soweto as an attempt to create a middle-class results from a failure to understand the true developments that are occurring in this country.

As far as the Urban Foundation is concerned, we stand for values which we believe are beneficial to all people, irrespective of colour, sex or creed".

These values, he said, are that "people must have freedom of choice in their careers or their mode of life, but that they must be individually self-reliant and self-sufficient".

He added: "In exercising these values, we believe that people will determine their own standards of life and achieve the material benefits which they consider to be appropriate without interference or the imposition of false concepts or foreign labels. Undoubtedly this will result in people enjoying different material standards and modes of life which are the essence of a private enterprise system. People must be allowed to create their own goals and use their own efforts to achieve this".

But Mr Kehla Mthembu, national president of the Azanian People's Organisation, looks at the matter in a different way. "It is oversimplifying matters, or rather being too naive, to say there is no black middle-class in South Africa. Classes are inherent to any industrialised and capitalistic society".

He went on: "I would say the trend towards black middle classism is the result of the present ruling class in its total strategy plan. It is the universal tactic or strategy of every oppressor and exploiter to lure some members of the oppressed and the exploited to their camp in order to form a buffer area that will off-set the revolutionary mood of the oppressed when it erupts.

"It is in this light that we understand the role played by some elite blacks in being the barometer for the oppressor and exploiter. They sit with the oppressed and gauge their mood and thereafter report to the oppressor that "we are the last generation to negotiate". And thus the oppressor smoothes the rough edges of his exploitation and make it more acceptable to the oppressed".

Mr Mthembu wound up by saying: "Although we have these few dissidents, black nationalism supersedes all these deviations. Black consciousness calls on all members of the oppressed to identify themselves as one solid unit in spite of one's economic advantage or position. Black people should realise that they do not have the vote and therefore black middle classism become a false identity".

AIRFORCE FIRES ON ANGOLAN MIGS, DOWNING ONE

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 10 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] SOUTH African aircraft shot down an Angolan MiG-21 in the operational area, it was announced in Pretoria yesterday.

A Defence Force spokesman said South African aircraft were busy with a self-defence patrol flight when they detected by radar and radio that two MiG 21s were heading towards South West African territory to interfere with their exercises.

The pilots of the SA planes came to the conclusion that they were about to be attacked and immediately took action in selfdefence, hitting one of the aircraft, which crashed.

Since South Africa was not at war with Angola, the second aircraft was deliberately allowed to fly off in a north-westerly direction.

The incident occured last Friday. The spokesman said that according to Angolan authorities their planes were on a "so-called patrolling flight."

He emphasised that the Defence Force was in SWA to protect the people of the territory against terrorism and had no desire to get involved in action with her neighbours.

Angola claimed earlier that South African jets had shot down an Angolan military aircraft over southern Angola on Friday.

The Angolan news agency, Angop, quoted a Defence Ministry communique, issued in Luanda, as saying that the plane had been on a routine flight when it was attacked by two South African Mirage 111 fighters near Mlondo, more than 200 km inside Angola.

Angop did not identify the type of plane shot down, but said its pilot had been wounded.

PANAMANIAN FREIGHTER IS DETAINED IN DURBAN

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 7 Nov 81 p 7

[Text]

DURBAN — A Panamanian freighter at present in Durban harbour was attached yesterday after an urgent application in the Supreme Court.

Frank Fehr Capital Commodities (South Africa) a private company of shippers, brought the application against Companie Naviera Regina SA Panama, owners of the Regina S.

Mr Justice A J Milne ordered the Deputy Sheriff of Durban to attach the Regina S pending a court action by Frank Fehr Commodities against the owners for the recovery of R18 778.

Frank Fehr commodities were also given authority to sue by edictal citation. In an affidavit Mr Uwe Walter Lanzendorf said Companie Naviera Regina was represented in South Africa by Medite Shipping Company (South Africa).

Mr Lazendorf said Medite entered into a contract with Frank Fehr Commodities in August last year to carry a cargo of 1 300 to 1 500 tons of copra in September last year from Quelimane, Mozambique, to Rotterdam.

On August 29 Medite repudiated the contract on the grounds that the size of the ship was such that it would be unable to leave Quelimane with the cargo aboard because of draft limitation of the port.

Frank Fehr commodities claimed they had suffered damages of R18 778 because of the repudiation of the contract.

Mr Lazendorf said the ship was due to leave Durban in a day or two.

If it was allowed, to leave Frank Fehr Commodities would be unable to pursue their claim against Companie Naviera Regina, he said.

Mr Justice Milne said attachment would apply until satisfactory security was lodged to cover the claim and costs. — Sapa.

STUDENT BAIL REFUSAL SPARKS DEMONSTRATION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 7 Nov 81 p 2

[Article by Sandra Lieberum]

[Text] A JOHANNESBURG magistrate's courts was disrupted yesterday by Wits students who stood with their arms raised in Black-power salutes chanting Nkosi Sikele I'Afrika after bail was refused for final year BA student Mr Benjamin Greyling, who has been in detention for three months.

The magistrate, Mr F Z Kraynauw, said: "The interest and safety of the State weighs heavily with the court just as does the interest and freedom of the accused.

"If these interests clash, the court is of the opinion that preference must be given to the interests of the State.

"It is considerably better for the individual to suffer, and possibly even to go under, than for the existence of the whole to be threatened by a solitary individual. Bail is therefore refused."

Yells

As court adjourned for a provisional trial date to be set, Mr Greyling (20), turned to the public gallery and gave the Black power salute to fellow students who in turn saluted, sang and yelled "Amandla" — (power to the people)

"He's got to pay for all your nonsense," Mr Greyling's sister yelled at the singers as she left the courtroom.

Prosecutors from other courts came to quieten the group without success. Court officials of the court in question were still out determining the date.

Order was restored when another magistrate, Mr A H Barlow, came from another Regional Court and had the message passed round: "All the students will be before court if the noise does not stop immediately."

Mr Greyling, who was arrested on July 31 and held under Sections 22 and 6 in the interim, will appear in court again on November 18 on three charges of contravening the Official Secrets Act.

Suspicion

Mr Krynauw said the onus had been on the accused to prove on the balance of probabilities that once released on bail he would not prejudice the ends of justice.

The court felt, however, that there was a strong suspicion that the accused was sympathetic to the communistic cause, also that he was against the ruling Government, and as was usually the case where politics were involved, there were possibly people waiting across the border to whisk him out of South Africa to states with which there were no extradition treaties.

"Out of the accused's own mouth is evidence from which only one reasonable inference can be drawn — that his contacts in Swaziland are not well inclined towards South Africa's Government."

The court accepted that the accused was an above-average student and that his final year studies would suffer because he was in custody, but "it is obvious to the court that his mother does not have much control over him.

Surrounded

The accused appeared to be the sort of person with strong political ideals who meant what he said. The police had information the accused might be taken out of the country.

"South Africa is surrounded with hostile states. It is all too easy to slip across these borders. Even if an accused person reports to the police twice daily — it takes a person only four hours from Johannesburg and the border between South Africa and another state is crossed."

Mr A Bassillion (instructed by Mrs P Jana) appeared for Mr Greyling and Mr A van Wyk for the State.

GOVERNMENT IS WARNED AGAINST MEDIA CENSORSHIP

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 7 Nov 81 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text] There are some very disquieting developments with regard to the media.

The first concerns the South African Broadcasting Corporation.

One might have thought that after the Mouton controversy, the Government would be very careful not to do anything that would suggest that it intended tightening its grip on the corporation.

You may recall that the controversy over the chairman of the SABC, Professor Mouton, started in a certain Nationalist newspaper which suggested that Professor Mouton could not be both chairman of the SABC and rector of Orange Free State University and that the SABC post should be a fulltime one.

The reason for this brouhaha was that several so-called verkramptes were in senior positions and were more in tune with Professor Mouton's predecessor, Dr Piet Meyer, than with him, consequently, the SABC was not able to create a climate for what was described as "vital reform."

Reports at the time were that Professor Mouton and the Government had disagreed on the nature of his SABC post, informed sources suggesting that Professor Mouton was not prepared to allow the SABC to be used as a political platform.

There were also allegations that the Department of Foreign Affairs and Information, under which the SABC falls, had attempted to influence the corporation's news coverage and that top SABC executives were dissatisfied.

The dispute culminated in talks between Professor Mouton and the Prime Minister, Mr PW Botha, attended by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr Pik Botha, which led a few days later to an announcement that Professor Mouton would keep his SABC post "for the foreseeable future."

Professor Mouton emphasised that the Government did not prescribe to him as chairman of the board, he still believed, "with my whole heart, that the SABC must retain its independence," he had never had problems with the Prime Minister's initiatives, and "the SABC wants to work with the Government — it will be a sorry day when we work against each other."

Subsequently the joint Directors-General of the SABC retired and Mr Steve de Villiers, a radio man with a wealth of experience in broadcasting, became a caretaker Director-General, having only two years to go before retirement in 1983.

It is not by chance, therefore, that the same Nationalist newspaper which started the Mouton controversy has now disclosed that the Government is preparing important legislation to restructure the top management of the SABC to make it "more effective."

The legislation will make provision for the possibility of the posts of chairman and Director-General to be held by the same person, though this will not necessarily be the case.

Provision is also made for the Director-General to sit on the board and for the Cabinet, and not the board, to appoint the Director-General.

This smacks of the Government taking a more direct hand in the affairs of the corporation.

It is all the more ominous when one takes into account Mr Pik Botha's statement to Parliament that the Government and senior management of the SABC regularly consult each other about news coverage and choice of programmes (although senior officials claimed they were not aware of this, we are sure the Minister would not make an idle statement on a matter of such importance).

What we fear is that the Government is making itself ready for a political appointment of Director-General and chairman, with the two positions probably combined.

It will be a sad day when, and if, this happens, because the SABC, then, will become an outright propaganda medium of the Government (at the moment it does a great deal of propaganda without acknowledging that it is propaganda).

The second worrying item about the media is the Prime Minister's warning to newspapers — elements of which he described as negativist, destructive and anarchist — to put their house in order, or the "Government will take steps to do it for them."

The Steyn commission on the media has still to report, which makes the Prime Minister's warning inappropriate.

But all signs in recent months have pointed to new curbs being imposed on the Press whatever the Steyn commission says.

Our advice to the Government, both with regard to the SABC and the Press, is: Hands off.

TIGHT MONEY POLICY WILL CONTINUE

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 7 Nov 81 p 19

[Text]

SOUTH Africa's present tight monetary policy will continue in view of existing inflationary pressures and a large current account payments deficit, the reserve bank says.

It said in a statement it remained Reserve Bank policy to permit natural forces, including the decline in the value of gold output and other exports, to exert a contractionary influence on money supply and domestic monetary demand.

It noted tight monetary policy had helped cut annualised M-2 money supply growth to about 12 percent in the third quarter this year from 34,6 percent in the year ended March 31.

South African inflation, as measured by the consumer price index, was running at an annualised 15,8 percent after 15,8 percent in calender 1980, while the annualised current account payments deficit was about five billion rand in the third quarter, compared with a R2,8 billion surplus in full 1980.

The flow of bank credit to the private sector had slowed despite a substantial increase in land bank credit related largely to financing a record maize crop, it noted.

The bank said to the extent that it was called upon to assist in financing the present current account deficit it preferred financing techniques which did not hinder the operation of a balance of payments adjustment process.

For the present, the Reserve Bank would make less use of quoting large discounts on forward dollars, it noted.

The large discounts, which have in varying degrees been employed since August, encouraged use of overseas trade credits by South African banks and their clients through utilising differentials between domestic and foreign interest rates.

INDIAN COUNCIL, INTEGRATED SUBURB VOTES SCRUTINIZED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Nov 81 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text]

ON THE same day that the low percentage poll in an official election for the South African Indian Council had shown a "massive rejection of apartheid", a private referendum in Constantia, Cape Town, at short notice had "struck at the jugular vein of the Group Areas Act."

So says Mr Roger Hulley, Progfed MP for Constantia, after the referendum in which Constantia and Tokai property owners gave an overwhelming "yes" to the area being opened up to all races instead of having new, separate townships for Coloureds in between.

Of the two, the referendum and the election, the referendum is the less significant.

Constantia is a wealthy suburb. Prices of properties advertised for sale yesterday ranged from R108 000 to R270 000 and plots are going at R35 000 to R45 000 each.

Constantia is a liberal PFP suburb which can afford to be liberal, since very few Coloureds could afford to live in the area and those who could would be in the same high income bracket as the White residents.

It is a fact that Progfeds in the very wealthy suburbs of northern Johannesburg also have no objection to having Black or Coloured neighbours.

There, again, they argue that those Blacks or Coloureds who could afford to live in their suburbs — and there are mighty few — would be of the same high moneyed and perhaps educational status as they are.

It does not strike them that this selective admission of the wealthier Blacks and Coloureds to White areas is a form of racial prejudice.

In other words, that as long as there are few who would qualify for residence by means of wealth, their presence is acceptable.

These wealthy Progfeds know that it is in poorer and lower middle-class suburbs that integration would be at its peak if suburbs were thrown open to all races.

And the real test of public opinion, for or against residential separation, can only be made in such suburbs, since they could be the most affected.

Besides that, the Constantia referendum can be faulted in another way. The vote in favour of opening up the area to all races is less from conviction and more from the fact that the alternative proposed by the Government is considered by property owners to be far worse.

State of panic

We quote from the liberal Sunday Express: "Since the Government announced its intention to investigate the reproclamation of two areas in the suburb with a view to creating Coloured townships, the constituency's 4 000 property owners have been thrown into a state of panic.

"Exacerbating the insecurity and confusion of Constantia residents is the fact that the sites chosen by the Government are the historic Steenberg farm and the coveted Tokai forest, jealously guarded by the environmentally conscious Constantia residents.

"But apart from the environmental considerations, which have become the main focus of Constantia's resistance, residents fear the creation of Coloured townships in the heart of the suburb would dramatically depress property prices and lead to a possible source of conflict in the sedate valley.

"On the other hand, some feel that if it was declared an open area and upper middle-class Coloured families could be absorbed on a diffused basis throughout the community, property prices would increase and the conflict potential of adjacent segregated areas would be eliminated."

There were, therefore, major issues which made the referendum more than just a simple test of whether Coloureds should be allowed to buy property in a White suburb.

In the case of the South African Indian Council election, the massive stayaway which resulted in polls ranging from 2,89 to 23 percent shows a hardening attitude in the Indian community.

To a great extent, the Government can only blame itself for the poor poll, because it refused to hand Pageview back to the Indians and its decision was ill-timed, coming only shortly before the election.

However, although the South African Indian Council is spurned, and a cloud hangs over its future, plans to draw the Indians into a constitutional set-up with the Whites and Coloureds may emerge from the President's Council's deliberations.

What the Government accepts or rejects will be of paramount importance; on the other hand, there is no purpose in the Indian community, sandwiched between the Whites and the Blacks, taking an obstructionist or defiant attitude towards the Government.

It may be bad if the Blacks turned their backs on the Indians, but it would be far worse if the Whites did.

NATIONAL TRAINING BOARD GETS OFF THE GROUND

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Nov 81 p 12

[Text]

THE Minister of Manpower, Mr Fanie Botha, formally launched the National Training Board in Pretoria yesterday.

Addressing its members, he said the goal the Board should try to achieve was simply, the development of the highest possible level of the knowledge, skill and talent of the total work force, bearing in mind differences in individual aptitudes and preferences, and the needs of the South African economy.

Mr Botha said the NTB, established with effect from November 1, this year, was not simply an additional Board which would provide additional advice in regard to manpower training.

"It has actually replaced three existing bodies, namely the National Apprenticeship Board, which had 14 members and which was established as far back as 1945, the Co-ordinating Council for the In-service Training of Black Employees, with 16 members, which was established in 1976, and the In-service Training Council with 13 members, which was established in 1979."

The NTB would not merely replace these bodies. Its activities would have to cover a much wider field, and for that purpose it had been given much wider powers. The NTB would have advisory as well as executive functions.

It would, be required to advise him on:

- Matters of policy arising out of, or connected with, the application of the provisions of the Manpower Training Act, 1981.
- Any matter relating to training.

The NTB would have executive powers in that it would be required to perform functions assigned to it by the Manpower Training Act, 1981, which was to be its handbook. — Sapa.

POLICE HANDLE SECURITY JOB ALONG LIMPOPO

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 28 Oct 81 p 7

[Article by Emielia Jaroschek: "Police Whose Beat is First Line of Defence"]

[Text]

TEAK-TOUGH and bronzed, they patrol snake-infested farmland with 20kg of kit, arms and ammunition slung around their backs.

Gruelling bushwalks by police are part of a crackdown on infiltration by insurgents in the Northern and north-western Transvaal, where unoccupied farms have left large holes in the country's first line of defence.

Working from a row of interspersed base camps along Botswana's border, the police units — on border stints of three months or more — are now working hand-in-glove with local farmers and labourers.

Last week they gave the Press a look at their base camps, hidden in the remotest areas of the north-western Transvaal bush.

It is basically cattle country, but grain and game farms also dot the area. Economic hardship in these strategically vital areas has caused a massive exodus of farmers over the past two years.

High fuel costs, the low farming value of the land, scant rain and expensive irrigation are main factors behind the trek.

Absentees

Police disclosed they also face the problem of large stretches of land left open, inviting insurgent use, by many absentee game farmers who live in cities.

Counter-insurgency units fill this gap in defence by making regular patrols of the land.

During patrols they intercept hundreds of illegal immigrants crossing the border from Botswana, arrest burglars and car and stock thieves, while remaining on a constant alert for contact with insurgents.

Armed with light machine-guns they keep a close lookout for hidden mines, communist boot patterns, explosives and possible caches of arms.

Top secrecy is maintained over their encounters in this line.

For security reasons, neither the locations or names of the camps visited, nor the number of unoccupied farms they guard, may be revealed.

Fenced off and guarded by armed men, the base camps usually consist of a few houses which serve as shelters, a kitchen and recreation rooms.

The unit at the first base camp the Mail visited — about 30km from Mafikeng — protects 120 farms, a great number of them unnocupied. The company commander controls four bases across a stretch of 650km.

The camp consists of a few houses, a swimming pool and a recreation hall. Flower and vegetable gardens are cultivated by the men in their spare time.

The only female at the camp is . . . a cat with five kittens.

And when the pet cat at another unit about 400km away had a litter of five the same Saturday, it was the news of the day for both camps.

A quiet atmosphere pervades. Pet monkeys and dogs play in the sand. Men carve ashtrays out of bamboo and entire platoons have engraved their names on cacti.

It belies the undercurrent of readiness for contact with insurgents at any time.

Patrolling unoccupied farmland is the main function of the unit.

At another base camp north of Zeerust, where only a small percentage of the 182 farms are unoccupied, farmers help ease the load on police.

But at a border post near Messina, on the banks of the Limpopo River, where many of the 100 or so farms are unoccupied, constant vehicle and foot patrols across desolate farmland are necessary.

On foot

In addition, the counter-insurgency men there are faced with foot patrols along the 90km of river bank, keeping a special eye on crossing points.

At a base camp about 400 paces from the border, in an area of mostly large game farms, foot patrols take an average one to two days.

The counter-insurgency men's task in guarding strategically vital border areas is tough and becoming increasingly important.

They know any slip-up could mean a terrorist attack in the heartland.

MEDICAL PROFESSION FACES SHORTAGE OF TECHNOLOGISTS

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 23 Oct 81 p 1

[Article by Pamela Kleinot: "Technologist Shortage Is Critical"]

[Text] There is a critical shortage of medical technologists in South Africa. They are leaving the profession at an alarming rate to go to commerce and industry where they can earn double their pay.

The loss of technologists could have serious repercussions on diagnostic medicine, which involves the analysis of speciments that can be life-saving to patients.

Professor H.J. Koornhof, acting director of the South African Institute for Medical Research (SAIMR) said: "If the loss of technologists continues it may reach the stage where laboratory services in this country start deteriorating."

He also said lack of staff was preventing the opening of new laboratories in rural areas.

But Professor Koornhof denied the poor staff situation had caused a deterioration in SAIMR services in the past three years.

Senior technologists told The Star that lack of professional recognition and poor pay in South Africa was driving many technologists to commerce and industry.

Medical technologists--the "backroom boys"--play an important role in diagnostic medicine.

They work in a high-pressure situation and have to pore over thousands of specimens.

A technologist who is leaving the profession said financial rewards were not commensurate with the training and responsibility of the job.

With 12 years' experience he earns R900 a month--and has a wife and child to support.

A recently qualified technologist who earns R540 a month says she is leaving because she sees no future.

"I would have considered staying if I were given more money," she said.

HEALTH DIRECTOR CALLS FOR SHARPER POPULATION CONTROL

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 11 Nov 81 p 9

[Text] CAPE TOWN. — Unless South Africa's population groups voluntarily accepted family planning measures, future generations might have to apply unpleasant, enforced birth control, the Director-General of Health, Welfare and Pensions, Dr J de Beer, said in Cape Town yesterday.

He was giving evidence before the science committee of the President's Council and warned that Black leaders who expressed opposition to family planning programmes for expedience or political reasons, that "they're doing disastrous damage to their peoples future."

The birth rate simply could not carry on unchecked, Dr De Beer said. It would become impossible to create the necesssary socio-economic infrastructure and development required to carry the population if it was allowed to continue with the present high birth rate among Blacks in particular.

"One (Black) leader correctly stated that the biggest problem of his people is poverty," Dr De Beer said.

"Poverty stems from too few jobs and there are too few jobs because there are too many people," he said.

Family planning was not the White man's idea to reduce Black numbers, he emphasised. It was a scientific demographic necessity.

The commitee's terms of reference, he noted, put emphasis on development and the upgrading of the quality of life. To achieve this, all communities would have to share in a measure of modernisation and this would cut across traditional concepts and ideas.

Family planning was not the White man's idea to reduce Black numbers, he emphasised. It was a scientific demographic necessity.

Studies had shown that the ideal maximum population the country could sustain physically, particularly in terms of the limited water supplies, was 65-million.

"In demographic terms we are just around the corner from 68-million," Dr De Beer said. A population policy was urgently required but even if it were effective its results were very long-term realities.

"Any solutions to a population problem will take ages to come into effect," he said.

The ideal family birth rate in his view was 2,5 per woman and if this could be reached in two decades, then wonders would have been achieved.

This figure meant a birth rate of 18 per 1 000 to which the Whites, with 16 per 1 000 were closest. Blacks were at a difficult threshold of 35 per 1 000, coloureds at 28 and asiatics at 16.

There had been a significant change of attitude among the urban Blacks over the past eight years regarding the view of the ideal family. Surveys showed that whereas Soweto Blacks believed eight years ago that six children were the ideal, they now believed it was two.

It was important to remember that such changes in attitude, even when being put into practical effect, would only result in discernable population trends 40 and more years later.

The nil population growth birth rate was 2,1 per woman (one each to replace the parents and 0,1 to replace the childless), and even if this was immediately achieved in South Africa, it would take 80 years before the population actually stopped growing.

"It is important that people should realise that it is not easy to get the birth rate down other than penalising people and having sterilisation and abortion both on demand and by command, as it already is in some countries.

"This, of course, is not an acceptable population policy for South Africa, but unless all the population groups accept family planning on a voluntary basis, future generations will have to take these other, less pleasant, compulsory measures.

"We should take note and try to avoid these very unacceptable methods in the future," Dr De Beer said. — Sapa.

GROUP AREAS REMOVALS ARE LABELED WITCH-HUNTS

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 23 Oct 81 p 20

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE current Group Areas witch-hunt in Johannesburg reached some sort of nadir yesterday with the prosecution of Mrs Bibi Mohammed. She was born in Newtown and has lived there for all of her 56 years. Her particular "fringe" area of the city is nominally reserved for whites, but has been occupied only by Indians for decades. The only "white" building nearby is the new Stock Exchange, which is not residential. Nonetheless Mrs Mahommed was hauled before court, fined for living in the wrong area and ordered to move elsewhere by the end of January.

At this point all the usual apologias for Group Areas removals start to wear very thin indeed. Race "friction" and race "swamping" can have no application to Mrs Mahommed's home. It is not an area, as her attorney pointed out, where whites would want to live. The case begins to look like a matter of malicious racial harassment, and the analogy that comes to mind is of the "smelling-out" of Jews in nazi Germany.

Not that there is much better to be said about the other recent convictions of people caught living in the wrong area. In such cases the State is not even required to prove that white neighbours were inconvenienced, overcrowded or upset; merely that the accused were of a race "disqualified" to live in a white area. The evidence that made more sense was that of the accused. Many of them said they were desperate for accommodation, having hunted unsuccessfully for years in Indian or coloured areas before they found vacant "white" places. Yet an immoral law has to take its course, making criminals of otherwise honest people and spreading fear among thousands of others who are in a similar predicament.

The manner in which discriminatory laws bring the police and the system of justice into disrepute was noted this week by the president of the South Africa Foundation, Mr Gavin Relly. "A society can only sustain itself," he said, "if the bulk of the people perceive the laws which affect them to operate in the general good. The present state of affairs is degrading for the police and an appalling failure in a multi-faceted society where dependence on the representatives of the law should be absolute."

BLACK GROUP OCCUPIES CENTRAL BUSINESS DISTRICT OFFICES

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 22 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Yussuf Nazeer]

[Text]

The Government has given a black business group permission to occupy white premises in the heart of Johannesburg's central business district.

This go-ahead decision from the State for the National African Federated Chambers of Commerce (Nafcoc) to move out of Ga-Rankuwa, north of Pretoria, on to the 25th floor of Sanlam's Kine Centre opposite the Carlton Centre, Johannesburg, has been hailed by the Central Business District Association.

"This is a right move by the Government in the right direction," said CBDA's chairman, Mr Nigel Mandy, who was largely instrumental in making the successful application — the second after the first was turned down — on behalf of Nafcoc.

Nafcoc's president, Mr Sam Motsuenyane, who is also chairman of the African Bank, and a member of the Urban Foundation, said he was pleased the Group Areas Board had abandoned its initial stand.

Nafcoc's inittal application to be allowed to take up offices in the centre of Pretoria was flatly rejected by the Government.

Nafcoc is based in the Pretoria district. Its large staff live in Ga-Rankua. Commuting daily to Johannesburg is going to provide some problems initially, a Nafcoc spokesman said.

When CBDA's first application on behalf of Nafcoc for premises in Johannesburg, was turned down, an Indian company in Fordsburg offered Nafcoc part of its offices.

Mr Mandy said he saw the permit system for black business enterprise at this stage as an interim trading measure. The CBDA, he added, did not favour the permit system, nor discrimination on the grounds of race or colour.

Mr Motsuenyane is one of the top businessmen who has been invited by the Prime Minister, Mr Botha, to his business summit in Cape Town on November 12.

Mr Motsuenyane said he declined the invitation as he would be away on business.

He moves into his Kine Centre offices at the end of this month. The rent, he said, would be more than R2 000 a month.

PATON DISCUSSES SA'S TWO 'TERRIBLE MISTAKES'

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 22 Oct 81 p 27

[Interview with Alan Paton by Brenda Robinson, date and place not given]

[Text] "I don't see a way out of our present political dilemma. But I am not prepared to say there isn't one. If I thought there was no way for our races to live together now or in the future I would go and live somewhere else."

The speaker was Alan Paton. Tough, crusty and as intellectually incisive as ever, Alan Paton at 78 has changed only a little. He is writing with the same care and precision, but with an awareness that time is closing in, and that he has much to do before he lays down his pen for good.

Last year he published the first half of his autobiography, "Towards the Mountain," which takes his story up to 1948 and the eve of General Smuts's fall from power and the advent of the Nationalist Party. Shortly to be published is "Ah, but your land is beautiful," the first of a trilogy of novels based on events in South Africa from 1952 and 1958.

The second part of the trilogy, 1958—1966, is nearly finished now, and Paton is thinking of calling it: "New heaven and new earth." It will range over Dr Verwoerd's period as Prime Minister, Sobukwe's role, Sharpeville, the 1960 referendum, South Africa becoming a republic, the Rivonia trial, ending with Dr Verwoerd's assassination in 1966.

Paton is clearly deeply concerned about the effect our security legislation is having on people. "Mewa Ramgobin has now been banned for 16 years. It makes no sense. This is a country that thinks it is part of the West, but this is the only country in the West that uses such a system.

"We are so violently anti-communist, yet we copy our security laws from Russia. Our security laws must be among the worst in the world. They have resulted in the deaths of 41 people in detention."

People might die in detention in Transkei "but they have never had a Biko and they are not likely to because Biko died in a white man's prison. If a black man dies in a black man's prison nobody gets excited about it."

If the Russians wanted to play rugby in New Zealand there would be nothing like the outcry created when South Africa played there. "This is because we are the only country in the world where white still rules black. It is true that in the United States blacks don't get equal rights, but they have equal rights under the constitution. But not in this country.

"Judges here have to judge in terms of laws which they may disapprove of, and the late Barend van Niekerk was very critical of the judiciary. As a result of our laws it is Sharpeville which is remembered overseas, not Bangladesh where hundreds of thousands of people died. That is black killing black, but when white people kill black people it is never forgotten."

Looking back, Paton believes white South Africa made two "terrible mistakes." One was the first law which enabled the Government to detain people without trial, and the other was when the police were allowed to detain people without giving them access either to their relatives or to legal representatives.

"I don't think there has been any death in detention since 1977, but up to then I believe the security police were a law unto themselves.

"As for Boss, I believe General van den Berg was a law unto himself and he was encouraged in that belief by his Prime Minister, John Vorster.

"I think it has taken me to this stage in my life to accept that politics and creative literature don't go together. I probably realised it long ago but could not break away from politics or an interest in the affairs of the society I live in. I still have that strong interest in society, but I no longer feel the obligation to take any active role — that is for younger people."

Dr Paton does not have any set hours for writing. He writes mostly in the morning, occasionally in the afternoon if he is in really good form, but never at night.

For an author, he says, a book has an unconscious and a conscious development in the mind. In his case, the conscious process gets to work at awkward hours, usually at 2 am. But he does not get up and write because he finds that if the book is really developing "you won't forget what you have thought of or imagined during the night."

He finds the idea of characters "running away" with their authors totally untrue. "Once you have decided on your characters they go on developing in your mind. To suggest that it is a process entirely independent of the writer is quite wrong."

Returning to fiction after writing history and biography for so long was a welcome change. "I formed the idea of going back to the novel and there is no doubt one gets more satisfaction out of creative, imaginative fiction."

It is a slow process. If he writes 1 000 words in a day's work he is very happy, and he does not write every day.

If he has struck a sequence and "it just goes," he may write as much as 3 000 words a day, all by laborious hand. Sometimes, on bad days, he may write only 100 words. On the worst days, nothing at all.

"I don't know about other writers, but I get periods of anxiety when I wonder if the emotion needed to write is deserting me altogether. I did not experience that 35 years ago, when I wrote 'Cry, the Beloved Country.' In any case, I don't think I would want to experience at 78 the same feelings I had at 43. It would be a sign of not growing up."

BUTHELEZI'S INKATHA SEEKS MIDDLE COURSE

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 14 Oct 81 p 25

[Article by Craig Charney]

[Text] Chief Gatsha Buthelezi's Inkatha movement presents a paradox: it opposes the Government, yet forms part of it. This fact is a key strength--but it could also prove to be a fatal weakness.

Such is the message of recently-published study by Mr T.P. Venter of Potchefstroom University, "Inkatha: The Movement's Position in South African Politics."

Inkatha claims a membership of more than 300 000 and was placed second among black political groups in a recent poll by The Star of urban blacks.

Because of its situation, Mr Venter argues, Inkatha is trying to play a "broker's role," in the formulation of a deal to grant political rights to blacks. But the attempt forces it into a risky balancing act between the ruling National Party and the banned African National Congress, which The Star poll found to be the most popular movement among urban blacks.

"Inkatha is an anomaly in the paradigm of separate development," Mr Venter writes.

"Chief Buthelezi has enough political perspective to realise that the NP Government is at present the vehicle for political change in South Africa.

"But the other side of the matter is that Inkatha has its support from the black part of the population. This part of the population must be satisfied by Inkatha.

"NP policy on the one side and black demands on the other oblige Inkatha to practise 'broker politics' to maintain its political position. This has consequences for Inkatha because broker politics inevitably mean compromises if Inkatha wants to change politics peacefully."

Because of this broker's role, Mr Venter says Inkatha has unique relationships with both the Government and the ANC.

"In the NP, Inkatha sees a parallel. There are equivalent ethnic ties, cultural anchors, and political aspirations.

"The relationship between Inkatha and the banned ANC has more the character of opposing parties than that of political allies.

"Though it sometimes looks as if Inkatha supports the ANC, on the basis of discussions and statements--this is in reality a subtle strategy that Inkatha is conducting towards the ANC. Through policies closer to the ANC, Inkatha is moving to erode the ANC's internal support."

"The fact that Inkatha now wants to open information offices in Europe is also more than anything else an attempt to counteract ANC campaigns.

"Inkatha's political position outside kwaZulu is thus governed by the ANC's influence. This affects, among other things, Inkatha's actions in connection with community councils, Soweto, unrest and the Buthelezi Commission.

"Inkatha's ongoing position in white politics remains a great risk for the movement. Contact which Inkatha has with the Government and other bodies as an extension of its search for a peaceful solution is relabelled by its opponents as 'sellout politics' and co-operation with the establishment."

In his conclusion Mr Venter writes: "Inkatha's political future will involve increasing criticism because of the broker nature of its political activity.

"In the event that this activity alienates the whites on one side and the blacks on the other, Inkatha would be merely the ruling party of a self-governing black state. Such a development would dramatically increase the support and status of the ANC."

WOMEN MAY GET BIGGER ROLE IN SADF

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 20 Oct 81 p 13

[Text]

CAPE TOWN — The controversial 30-day credit accorded to Citizen Force servicemen on 90-day operational duty may be replaced with a credit for the full number of days on the recommendation of a committee now investigating service conditions.

The interdepartmental committee is expected to put its recommendations before Parliament in the next session beginning on January 29.

Its recommendations are also expected to ease the strain on the Citizen Force by involving women and coloured people to a greater degree in the SADF.

This would be in line with the Israeli and United States armies where women are filling many of the backroom roles previously held by men.

OPERATIONAL

There is, however, little chance that women will take on a combat role that Israeli women, for example, play.

The present operational service credit system has for long left a bad taste in the mouth of Citizen Force men striving to complete their required 240 days of service subsequent to national service.

At the moment men on 90-day operation stints are given the minimum credit of 30 days for "peacetime training." The other 60 days are, under the Defence Act, active training for which no credit against the mandatory 240-day Citizen Force service is given.

Defence sources said yesterday there was no possibility of the committee recommending extending the present two years of national service.

"The Minister of Defence is on record as saying that the present period of national service will not be increased," they said.

Any increase in the basic period of service would lead to congestion in camps already having to cope with four intakes over every two years.

TRAINING

The committee is expected to base its findings on the need to spread the Citizen Force load.

The committee may also recommend that each day in uniform be counted towards the 240-day commitment, reducing the eight to ten years it now takes to complete training.

The Minister of Defence, General Magnus Malan, said last week that women might be subject to a "ballot system" of national service.

According to the Afrikaans newspaper Rapport, the escalating threat against South Africa might mean that SA's operational forces would be deployed over a wider front, with women and coloured people taking over administrative posts to release soldiers for front-line duties.

BLACKS MAKE NEW BID FOR UNITY

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 26 Oct 81 p 2

[Text] A major bid for black unity was made at a political meeting in Lenasia yesterday when leaders of the black consciousness and non-racial democratic movements called on followers to close ranks.

But despite the unity call, tensions flared several times between supporters of the two camps among the crowd of 200 Indians and Africans at the Jiswa Centre--site of bitter clashes between them in June. Mr Kehla Mtembu, President of the Azanian People's Organisation, a black cosciousnesss body, said: "Now is the time for all black revolutionaries to identify common interests. The recent skirmishes which blew our differences out of proportion served no one but the ruling class.

"I would challenge all progressive black revolutionaries to work with one another. As long as we allow these petty contradictions to prevail over unity, the establishment of a free, democratic egalitarian Azania will be delayed."

A prominent non-racial leader, Dr Ram Salojee of the Transvaal Anti-SA Indian Council Committee added: "We in this struggle have equal unity of purpose. It might differ in interpretation, but in our hearts...we all serve one cause, the cause of liberation.

"The enemy does not sit on the left and right of this table. It sits with the guns in Pretoria."

Mr Ahmed Mundat from the Anti-SAIC group, stressed its commitment to the search for a peaceful settlement in South Africa through a national convention.

He said black groups should put off displaying their differences until they came before such a body.

ARMS FIRM IS QUIZZED IN CHEMICALS CASE

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 16 Oct 81 p 7

[Text]

A munitions firm which has claimed in the Westonaria Regional Court that it was sold a chemical which did not comply with military specifications, was also allegedly guilty of not adhering fully to the specifications, it was stated yesterday.

Four men, Mr Marius Barnade (30) of Dan Pienaarville, Krugersdorp, Mr Hendrik Jacobus van Wyk (38) of Greenhills, Randfontein, Mr Christoffel Johannes Fourie (31), of Greenhills, Randfontein, and Mr Petrus Coetzee (38) of Rhodes Street, Krugersdorp, have pleaded not guilty to defrauding Naschem by supplying 420 kg of lead thiocyanide valued at R38 776, which did not comply with military specifications.

It has been alleged Mr Hendrik van Wyk, who together with Mr Barnade and Mr Fourie, worked for Naschem, tested 180 kg of lead thiocyanide from America and found it did not comply with military specifications.

He suggested that Naschem buy a supply of the chemical from a local firm, Pafan Enterprises — in which he and the other accused had interests.

Pafan Enterprises is owned by Mr Coetzee, a Krugersdorp estate agent.

A witness, Mr Nicholaas van Wyk Naschem's laboratory manager, agreed that in testing the lead thiocyanide supplied by Pafan he had not fully adhered to the military specifications.

Mr J A Redelinghuys, for Mr Coetzee, said it astounded him that Naschem should demand compliance with a specification which it did not adhere to itself.

Mr Michael Stewart Adendorff, a construction superintendent for Naschem, said the 420 kg of the chemical bought from Pafan was far too much. About 45 kg would have lasted for two years.

The case was postponed to January 11.

BUSINESS LEADERS URGED TO MOVE INTO ACTION

Johannesburg SOWETAN in English 23 Oct 81 p 14

[Editorial]

[Text] THE chairman of Anglo-American, Mr Harry Oppenheimer may have one of the best minds in the country and some awful financial clout, but we are afraid that like everybody else he is caught in the usual rhetoric in an effort to effect change.

For until men like Mr Oppenheimer who wield formidable power get into action, or at least see to it that those who have the power get a move on, nothing will come of all his talk.

Mr Oppenheimer told a banquet in London that South Africa had to move boldly towards a new dispensation and warned of the dangers of half-hearted reforms.

With all due respect, we are afraid Mr Oppenheimer and other businessmen have been making the same hoary platitudes for years, and still have to see the action. As long as these men who have a lot at stake here do the pussy-footing, there will be no magical change from Pretoria.

At the Carlton Centre meeting several powerful businessmen met the Prime Minister and very much unlike the cool-headed managers they are, they thought all the talk with the head of state would mean change.

We are in a manner of speaking quite glad that those talks were a flop. For the businessmen were forced to realise that talk without action will never lead to movement.

The P M is hampered by a formidable right-wing sector in parliament and an even more formidable group of conservatives in the National Party caucuses.

These business leaders should put their money where their mouths are and move into aggressive action, allowing the Government to follow. We believe the P M with all the good intentions in the world will never be able to move past those reactionaries in his party and amongst his people.

The financial wizards not only have the monetary clout, but have the expertise to draw up plans that the P M would be foolish not to follow. He has the logical mind of a militarist, and the logistics of any situation, if we sell out, will impress him.

There are signals from the business sector that they will be going out aggressively when they meet the P M in Cape Town in November. There is no need for confrontation, for that will only stiffen the backs of the right-wingers and lead to Mr Botha's complete immobilisation.

It would be better for them to set out a programme of action for the P M, and like the good managers they are, set time limits to it.

MAKGOTLA PATROLS COULD POLICE RAILWAYS AS RESERVISTS

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 22 Oct 81 p 2

[Article by Jon Qwelane: "Railways Give Ruling on Makgotla Patrols"]

[Text]

The Makgotla movement — the self-appointed law enforcer in black townships — has no chance of being allowed to police trains unless it agreed to certain conditions, the Deputy Commissioner of the South African Railways Police said yesterday.

General J H Visagie said in an interview that there was no way the movement would be allowed to operate as "an arm or an extension" of the Railway police.

But he said that if the movement made application for its members to be registered as part of the Railways Police reservist force, it would be granted.

"The only way they can co-operate with us is if they join our reservist force. That will mean they will then have to obey police rules.".

General Visagie said that at present the contribution Makgotla could make would be to report any crime detected in and around Railway premises and trains.

He said there was a "Dolos" telephone system which anyone in the Western Transvaal could use to report crime committed on Railway premises or trains.

"Dolos" is the Afrikaans word for a witchdoctor's bones.

"With the 'dolos' we have a tape recorder connected to the telephone. All information telephoned in is recorded. The police staff then play back the tapes and make transcripts. From there we assemble the pieces of information, and maybe after some vital clues get a good start."

He said he was aware that some people refrained from using the "dolos" because they feared being labelled informers.

Nevertheless, it was important to report crimes even if one did not disclose one's identity. All that was necessary was to speak into the telephone, giving the number of the train, the station, and the time of the crime, and the police would handle the rest.

General Visagie appealed to commuters not to carry large sums of money.

COUNTRY ARRANGES GOLD SWAPS WITH FOREIGN INSTITUTIONS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 7 Nov 81 p 19

[Text]

SOUTH AFRICA arranged a number of new gold swap agreements with foreign financial institutions last month, selling gold to the institutions for cash and repurchasing it forward at market-related prices, the Reserve Bank said yesterday.

The bank declined to detail the amounts involved but said in a statement the new swaps would provide substantial additional foreign exchange reserves without increasing the liquidity base of the domestic banking system.

The swaps therefore did not conflict with the Reserve Bank's current restrictive monetary policy, and further swaps with other banks were at present being considered, it said.

The new swaps had temporarily reduced the Reserve Bank's gold holdings and increased its foreign exchange revenue, it noted.

South African gold holdings fell R1,03-billion in October to R3,61-billion from R4,64-billion in September, reflecting the effects of the new swaps, the Reserve Bank said.

In volume terms holdings fell about 2,64-million ounces to 9,7-million ounces from 12,36-million in September.

Gold reserves were valued at R375,29 an ounce against September's R373,29.

Gold content fell to 86,56 percent from 94,63 percent in September, while the ratio of gold reserves to liabilities fell to 61,3 percent from 66,9 percent.

The bank said total gold and foreign assets fell R735-million in October to R4,17-billion from R4,90-billion in September.

However, the full effect on the reserves of the new swaps was not reflected in the October figures, as over R500-million of additional foreign exchange holdings were immediately used to make early repayments of drawings under the bank's existing foreign credit facilities, it said.

Those credit facilities could be utilised again as and when required, it noted.

The gold swaps would allow more flexibility in sales policy, giving more scope to withhold supplies from the market when the price was weak, bullion dealers said in Zurich.

However, the news had no immediate impact on a market which remains very sluggish for lack of investor interest, they said.

Gold closed at $427/430 an ounce, the same as its opening and previous close.

During the day it dipped briefly to $426/429.

Some of the new swaps were concluded with Zurich gold pool banks, which had concluded similar deals with South Africa in 1976 and 1977, bullion sources said.

However, German and other banks may well have also participated, they said.

Earlier in the year South Africa re-negotiated some existing swaps on the basis of ruling market prices, which were higher than when originally concluded.

Reserve Bank Governor Gerhard de Kock said this had provided South Africa with an extra R700-million in foreign exchange since September 1980.

The swaps, which are in effect credit on gold collateral, will mean South Africa is no longer under quite such pressure to sell all its mine output in order to sustain its balance of payments, which has moved into deficit after being in surplus last year.

However, although the swaps give scope for the Reserve Bank to withhold gold for perhaps up to a week in order to support prices when they are weak, South Africa is still expected to sell its whole mine production this year, they say.

One dealer said the news could be interpreted bearishly, since it implied South Africa did not see its balance of payments problems being solved by a rising gold price. — Reuter.

ANGLO URGES NEW MINES POLICY IN CONSTELLATION

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 20 Oct 81 p 10

[Text]

A strong plea for a common exploration and mining policy in South Africa's proposed constellation of states has been made by a director of Anglo American, Mr Denis Etheredge.

He was speaking at a seminar on "Alternative Structures for Southern Africa Interaction" held by the Institute of Foreign and Comparative Law at the University of South Africa.

Praising the role of transnational companies like Anglo American and De Beers, he said they had played a greater part in the economic development of southern Africa than the colonial powers.

Many countries in the region had chosen socialism after independence, and transnational companies — including the mining giants — had been subjected to government interference which had made them less effective.

"Taxation arrangements have been tampered with, marketing subjected to interference, and nationalisation of assets has taken place," Mr Etheredge said.

The initial constellation would comprise "old" South Africa, including the newly independent states and the homelands in which the transnationals operated across political boundaries. And these included economic, legislative and tax regime boundaries he added.

"Gold and coal aside, the immense mineral wealth of South Africa has been fragmented among a number of independent countries, and includes such strategic minerals as manganese, platinum and chrome."

Mr Etheredge said the fragmentation of mineral resources had happened at a time when mining and treatment of minerals involved such high risks and massive capital investment that only the large mining houses could assemble the funds, technology and expert manpower to get new mines started.

"The concept of regional development co-operation transcending political borders spelt out by the Prime Minister in his speech at the Assocom Congress in October last year offers the best opportunity for co-ordinated and constructive industrial and commercial development.

"The standardisation of laws and practices affecting prospecting and the opening of mines, common and fair tax regimes, and in the overall, the continuance of private enterprise in mining, will ensure that the many political boundaries do not impede the best exploitation of our mineral resources," he said.

MINE UNIONS ISSUE REMAINS UNRESOLVED

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 27 Oct 81 p 13

[Article by Rieaan de Villiers]

[Text]

AFTER the bloody 1922 miners' rebellion, the Wiehahn Commission has written, the Government introduced job reservation for the mining industry "to settle what the employers and employees seemed unable to settle themselves".

Sixty years later, the wheel has turned full circle and the three parties are more or less back where they started.

The conflict between mining employers and unions at the beginning of the century resulted in a grossly discriminatory labour dispensation which has taken South Africa over half a century to shake off.

Now, it is the last major industry charged with the task of negotiating its way out of it.

However, the Chamber of Mines and the unions remain at loggerheads over much the same issues, and it is not at all clear that they can settle their differences this time around either.

Once again, there is a threat of Government intervention if they don't.

It is believed that the Minister of Mineral and Energy Affairs, Mr F W de Klerk, recently met mining employers and unions and warned them that he would unilaterally change the Mines and Works Act if they failed to reach a negotiated solution soon.

The employers face a formidable obstacle in the Mineworkers' Union, which has pledged to restage the 1922 rebellion if blacks get blasting certificates — one of the major certificates of competency restricted to whites in the Act.

However, the problems in the industry are by no means restricted to the MWU alone and black job advancement on the mines has stalled on other levels as well.

All but two job reservation determinations in terms of the Industrial Conciliation Act, were scrapped some two years ago.

One of them, Determination No 27, applied to some members of the Underground Officials' Association, one of the three officials' associations on the mines.

Deep-seated

Shortly afterwards, the UOA announced it was prepared to allow it to lapse if certain conditions were met. However, it is still in force and the Wiehahn Commission has noted that it has "no evidence that the parties have indeed achieved an accommodation on this matter".

Earlier this year, the same artisan unions which have widely allowed the indenturing of blacks in other industries rejected proposals by the chamber which would have allowed this on the mines.

Over 50 black apprentices have been indentured on mines not covered by the agreements between unions and the chamber — but there still isn't a single black apprentice on a chamber mine.

This seems to point to deep-seated problems in the industry, and there are.

With the exception of the MWU, the unions say they are not opposed to black job advancement and several, as well as the officials' associations, have changed their constitutions to open their ranks to blacks.

But in line with their protectionist philosophy, the unions say they will only allow blacks to move further into skilled jobs if they all become union members, thereby subjecting them to the same employment conditions as existing union members.

All white workers on the mines are covered by closed shop agreements, whereby the mines undertake not to appoint any whites who are not union members.

Also, in a unique feature of the mining industry, white workers are covered by so-called allocation of occupation agreements as well, whereby workers in certain jobs are allocated to specific unions.

What the unions are demanding is that their closed shop agreements be extended to cover blacks entering the affected jobs. And some are demanding that the allocation of occupation agreements be extended to blacks as well.

Approach

This they see as the best way of maintaining their control over skilled jobs, protecting existing members against undercutting by the introduction of cheap black labour, and protecting skilled black workers against exploitation.

This approach has also been adopted by the officials' associations.

However, it seems the chamber is unable to make up its mind whether it is prepared to meet this demand or not.

Unionists blame the chamber for the delay. They also deeply mistrust the chamber's motives, and accuse it of still wanting to undercut skilled labour and weaken unions — a belief which the Wiehahn report suggests is at least historically justified.

As a prominent unionist has put it: "We have told the chamber they can train black artisans in our trade as long as they have to belong to unions — but it refuses to agree to this.

"The impression we get is that the chamber doesn't want blacks in unions and they want to pay them black wages. When we object, we are held up as obstructing black job advancement."

Sources close to the chamber deny that it wants to undercut white workers. But they concede that the chamber is deeply divided over whether to extend the closed shop to blacks or not.

One mining man says: "The chamber has debated the closed shop for two and a half years — and is still divided on the issue. When the trade unions say they will permit black advancement provided the closed shop is extended, we cannot give them an answer."

Consensus

He adds: "The industry has paid a very high price for its failure to reach consensus."

Sources close to the chamber say the main mining houses opposed to the closed shop and allocation agreements are Gencor and Anglo American. The main group in favour of retaining the agreements is Goldfields, backed by Anglo-Vaal, with the others somewhere in between.

If this is interesting, the arguments used by the pro-closed shop group are even more so.

They are said to be motivated by two fears. The first is that the Mineworkers' Union will swallow up all the whites on the mines if the agreements are lifted.

In reply to this, opponents of the agreements point out that whites don't necessarily have to be MWU members to join a strike, and that the MWU can "mimic" the closed shop by threatening to expel members who won't toe the line — who will then lose their jobs.

The second is the fear that a mass-based black union will arise if black workers are not made to join the established unions — and that the only way to preserve industrial peace is a "divide and rule" strategy of splitting them up under "responsible white leadership" for the time being.

Other mining men dismiss this as a pipedream.

At the same time, opponents of the closed shop point to major problems surrounding the unions' demands.

One issue is whether the closed shop and allocation of occupations can continue to be used as an informal barrier to black job advancement, as the Wiehahn Commission has suggested.

They believe it will. They say the closed shop can be formally deracialised but will continue to provide the unions with control over access to skilled jobs. This will allow them to retain control over the extent and pace of black advancement — which is likely to remain restrictive as long as the unions remain white-dominated.

They also argue that it is wrong to force blacks into unions they have not chosen to join.

Proviso

As one mining man puts it: "What the unions are in effect saying is you can advance blacks provided you force them to join our unions. But these will be unions without real mandates."

He adds: "The closed shop and allocation of occupations are very real barriers to the orderly extension of collective bargaining rights to black workers."

These men are disappointed with the official attitude to the closed shop. The Wiehahn report has described the existing closed shop and allocation agreements as a "prime example of industrial work reservation" and has urged the parties to devise a "more satisfactory basis for the recognition of unions".

However, the Government had decided that the closed shop should be retained — a decision reflected in its White Paper.

At least one leading unionist partially agrees with these criticisms.

Mr Ike van der Watt, secretary of the Boilermakers' Society, supports the closed shop as he says he cannot agree to union labour being replaced by non-union labour. But he opposes the allocation of occupations in principle.

"In the end, unions have a paper membership of resentful members because they were forced to join. This creates more problems than it is worth."

Employer sources point out that the chamber only has allocation agreements with the officials' associations and was not responsible for the allocation of occupations agreement between the unions, which is an inter-union agreement ratified by the chamber.

Mr Van der Watt concedes this but argues that the chamber has been in favour of it as it has suited its purposes.

"The chamber doesn't want strong unions with large memberships. Its strategy is to divide and rule, and the allocation of occupations has helped to keep unions fragmented."

Findings

Unionists generally reject the argument that the closed shop will continue to be discriminatory.

And in reply to arguments that it is wrong to force blacks to join certain unions, one simply replies:

"If you want a train ride, you must buy a ticket. My members and I have put together a train over the years. Now, if the blacks want to ride, they must buy a ticket as well."

The industry's problems do not end here. Another major obstacle is the inadequacy of the existing industrial relations structure.

Ironically, as the Wiehahn Commission has pointed out, the industry has never formed an industrial council — despite being directly responsible for the introduction of the industrial council system.

In line with the commission's findings, unionists complain that negotiations are not formalised enough, that agreements are not binding on individual mines and that there is no monitoring mechanism to ensure that agreements are implemented.

A unionist says the unions have long argued that the whole industrial relations structure is inadequate and that the challenge posed by the Wiehahn report has only cast this in a more serious light.

"How does one solve these problems without a proper negotiating mechanism?"

He says the chamber has been reluctant to change the system because its inefficiency actually worked in its favour — and this is why it has been opposed to an industrial council.

"However, now that we actually have to reach agreement, the chamber is also beginning to realise that something has to be done.

"But", he adds, "we are sitting with a crisis which should never have arisen."

Steps are being taken to try to find a solution.

Optimistic

In an unprecedented move, all the mining unions and officials' associations met together recently and decided to demand joint talks with the chamber on all these issues.

The chamber has agreed and talks are due to begin soon.

Some unionists are optimistic, but others less so. One says there is no negotiated solution in sight, and that a long, drawn-out process is in the offing which no one can afford.

A mining man concedes: "There is no doubt that the chamber needs to improve its relationship with the established unions. It will have to learn not to treat them like children — or else it will stand little chance of negotiating a solution."

He adds: "What happens next is anybody's guess."

Meanwhile, waiting in the wings are the silent majority — the vast mass of half a million black workers with which the chamber, in the words of the Wiehahn Commission, "has no formal system of communication".

Sooner or later, black unions are going to emerge on the mines and if recent history is anything to go by, they are unlikely to pay much attention to the niceties of blueprint-making by other established unions, employers or the Government.

STEEL, ENGINEERING INDUSTRIES FEEL LABOR SHORTAGE

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Nov 81 p 22

[Article by Peter Moscarui: "Skills Shortage Hobbles Seifsa"]

[Text]

CONTINUING constraints in the labour supply situation, particularly in relation to a worsening in the shortages of professional, technical and certain categories of skilled labour, contributed to the slowdown in the growth tempo of the steel and engineering industries during the third quarter of this year.

This was the finding established by the Steel and Engineering Industries Federation of South Africa (Seifsa) in its quarterly survey of business conditions.

Conditions in the metal and engineering industries during the third quarter mirrored the levelling-off in national domestic demands, reflecting the slower overall tempo of growth.

The exception to this, says the report, are the automotive component manufacture industries, the building industries supplies sector and certain sub-sectors of the electrical machinery industry.

Increasing inflationary pressures experienced during the third quarter, together with substantial volume of imports, were now impairing the effectiveness of South Africa's import replacement programme.

Difficulties also continued to be experienced by Seifa's export sectors, with no real corrective to the recessionary tendencies of South Africa's major trading partners anticipated before the final quarter of 1982.

Nonetheless, says the report positive growth factors are seen in capital spending — estimated at about R188-million for the calendar year 1981 — now taking place in the basic metal industries.

Remedial action, in the form of intensified in-company training, is now being undertaken by a number of Seifsa member firms and further alleviation of the skill shortage was being achieved by recruiting contract workers from overseas.

The thrust towards new productive capacity in the metal fabricating and engineering industry — estimated at about R188-million for the current year — was being maintained.

Favourable order intakes during the third quarter are reported by South African steel mills, but the cumulative January to August 1981 output of six million tons was 0,5 percent below the tonnages recorded for the comparative period of 1980.

Steel mill output for 1981 is expected to be fractionally below last year's high level of nine million tons due to the anticipated easing in the domestic demand for steel products during the final quarter.

Cut-backs in production level have also been noted by the export-intensive ferro-alloy industry, with the eight-month output for 1981 showing a 13,8 percent decrease on last year's comparative period.

An 0,8 percent rise for the private sector foundry output for all types of metal cast is reflected in the cumulative January to August 1981 tonnages, as compared with the same period last year.

Growth prospects, reports the survey, are indicated in the improved output levels for grey iron, malleable and other iron castings — up 4,5 percent for the current eight month period — and non-ferrous metal base castings, up 6,4 percent compared with the same period last year.

SASOL PROFITS PICTURE CONTINUES ROSY

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Nov 81 p 20

[Text]

SASOL Ltd's take-over of the South African government's 50 pct holding in Sasol Two, scheduled for sometime after 1984, will not dilute the earnings of the company, managing director Joe Stegmann said yesterday.

Interviewed by Reuters he said the company had not yet decided in detail how the government's capital investment in the project, some R2,5-billion, would be repaid.

But he noted the government would start getting a return in the second half of the current financial year, ending June 30, when Sasol Two is expected to pay its first dividend.

Stegmann said Sasol would finance the purchase of the outstanding equity in Sasol Two from the government by a combination of a further Sasol share issue commercial interest-bearing loans and possibly a cash element.

He said a major bearing on the timing of the take-over would be the level of international oil prices.

He noted that oil prices, which are expected to remain stable around current levels for at least the next year, would obviously have an adverse impact on Sasol's profit growth this year.

Last year Sasol pushed net profit to R166,4-m from R121,7-m, a rise of over 30 percent, and analysts expect growth this year to be only around 15 percent.

Stegmann said the company would have to strive to reduce costs in the coming year, if margins were to be maintained, but noted in times of previous static oil prices it had been able to do this reasonably well.

He said one of the factors in its favour in this regard was the company's ability to produce coal extremely cheaply.

The new Bosjesspruit Colliery, which will serve both Sasol Two and Three, is already producing over 12-m tons of coal annually, at under R10 a ton.

When it reaches full production in 1984, producing around 27,5-m tons, it will be the largest coal mine in the world at almost twice the size of its nearest competitor.

Stegmann said there had been enormous overseas interest shown in the technology developed at Sasol, but in most instances, particularly western Europe, the cost of coal made the proposition prohibitive.

BRIEFS

RAW DEAL FOR BUTHELEZI--Durban--There are strong indications that the New Republic Party plans to refuse to sign the final report of the Buthelezi Commission which has mapped out a joint future for Natal and kwaZulu based on political accomodation among the leaders of the province's various groups. Although it is understood that another attempt is to be made to persuade the NRP to sign the report, it is known that the NRP member of the commission has already refused on behalf of his party. The NRP is apparently clinging to its national "federal-confederal" policy, which differs little from the old "race federation" policy and encompasses the idea of independent homelands within a constellation of states. But it had indicated a willingness to extend cooperation with kwaZulu, a stand which does not go much beyond the present status quo in Natal. It is understood that the NRP, led by Mr Vause Raw and the governing party in Natal, is the only major representative on the commission that refuses to sign the final report. Black leaders do not seem to be too worried by the NRP's refusal to sign because they are convinced that all other major and significant bodies represented on the commission will accept the compromise agreement. There are also signs that some senior people in the NRP in Natal do not like the party's stand and some have gone as far as to apologise to the black leaders over the issue. STRICTER BORDER CONTROL--Dr M. Hough, director of the Institute of Strategic Studies at the University of Pretoria, said at the NDMF conference that it may be necessary to enforce stricter border control and other measures to prevent a build-up of terrorist arms in South Africa. Speaking on political and military developments in southern Africa, he said that the stricter control was necessary but would have to be carried out with "circumspection." Dr Hough said that if SWAPO won the SWA/Namibia election it would undoubtedly join the other Frontline states, but it would be difficult for any SWA government to sever ties with South Africa completely. There was increasing pressure on the moderate members of the Frontline states to become more radical and the Soviet presence in southern Africa was becoming more entrenched. Referring to the ANC, Dr Hough stressed that it was important for South Africa to defeat or neutralise it, not only on the military level but also on the political level. It is important, therefore, for the government to create a better alternative than that offered by the ANC. [Text] [Johannesburg THE STAR in English 21 Oct 81 p 35]

TWO NEW BULK CARRIERS--Bulkcharters, a South African shipping company which specialises in the ocean transportation of bulk cargoes, has signed a contract to acquire two bulk carriers costing R46-million in a joint venture with an overseas shipowner. The two vessels, a 60 000 ton deadweight Panamax and a 41 000 ton deadweight craned bulk carrier, will be built in Japan and delivered by the end of next year or early in 1983. They will be operated by Bulkcharters on long-term charter to ports throughout the world. The acquisition of the ships makes bulkcharters, which claims to be the fastest-growing ship operators in South Africa, the country's newest shipowners. The company was established only in February 1979 but already operates an average of 11 bulk carriers, ranging in size from 16 000 to 50 000 tons, on time charter. In the first year the company carried more than a million metric tonnes of bulk cargoes--including anthracite coal, chrome, grain products, gypsum, iron ore, manganese, pig iron and refractory bricks--and expects to double this figure by the end of the current tax year. The managing director of Bulkcharters, Mr Norman Stobs-Stobart, said that the acquisition of the two bulk carriers was an extension of the joint venture concept which his company has "pioneered in South Africa." SAIC POLLING FLOP--Durban--The Natal Indian community, the biggest in South Africa, boycotted the elections for the South African Indian Council. The percentage return in most constituencies in Natal was low and in the Merebank constituency, where there is a big Indian population, only 2,8 percent of the people voted. In many other constituencies, particularly in the Durban area, the return of votes varied between 10,5 percent and 15,9 percent, reflecting a massive stay-away. The highest percentage polls were recorded in two rural constituencies. Umzinto, on the Natal south coast, where the percentage poll was about 22,3 percent and at Verulam, on the Natal north coast, where the poll was about 21,2 percent. The Citizen did a tour of most of the polling stations on Wednesday and yesterday and found widespread apathy. At some polling booths there were more policemen and returning officers than voters. Several influential Indians in the province have claimed that widespread intimidation kept the average voter away from the polls. This claim has been rejected by the Natal Indian Congress. According to Dr Jerry Coovadia, vice-president of the group, the elections were a "total flop." He said the stay-away of voters was a clear indication that the Indian community did not want anything to do with the SAIC. This applied not only to Natal, but to other parts of South Africa. He claimed that the average turnout was 10,15 percent in 20 of Natal's electoral divisions. He said the Indian community in the province had rejected the elections because they wanted direct representation in parliament. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Nov 81 p 3]

TROCHEM'S FATTY AMINE PLANT--Phases 1 and 2 of Trochem's fatty amine plant at Wadeville are nearing completion. Trochem, jointly owned by Chemical Holdings and Henkel Corporation of the US, will produce a range of amines for Industrial and mining use at the plant--the first of its kind in South Africa. Phase 1 of the project involves the manufacture of Alamine 336, a tertiary amine used for the recovery of uranium. In the Phase 2 operation, Trochem will produce a range of primary, secondary and tertiary amines for industrial uses which include fertilizer anti-caking, bitumen emulsification and fabric-softening. The plant is expected to replace between R3-4 million worth of imports during its initial year of operation. The capital expenditure on the plant to date totals R4-million. HORWOOD ON GOLD STANDARD--The Minister of Finance, Mr Owen Horwood, was last night surprised and pleased to hear that Professor Laffer, one of Mr Reagan's key advisers, predicts that the US will return to the gold standard by mid-1982, writes Aida Parker. Mr Horwood, himself a conservative economist, has always maintained that the international monetary system needed gold as a pivotal stabilising force, and urgently necessary to return confidence to international currencies. He told The Citizen last night: "As one who has been putting the case for an effective monetary role for gold in the international monetary system for a long time, I welcome any constructive move in this direction. "It is a little early to say what the outcome of the American Gold Commission's investigations will be. I can only hope that Mr Laffer's expectations will come true. "I myself have never argued for a return to a gold standard but rather for a gold-based international currency system." [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Nov 81 p 2]

ALL-RACE SUBURB--Cape Town--The Prime Minister, Mr P.W. Botha, should honour the will of the people of Constantia and allow the area to be opened to all races, Mr Claude van Wyk, the director of the New Republic Party's national secretariat said yesterday. Reacting to the outcome of a referendum held in the Tokai-Constantia valley, Mr Van Wyk said the overwhelming mandate in favour of opening up Constantia to all races should be a clear indication to both the government and the official opposition that they should rethink their attitudes on the right of communities to decide for themselves on the nature and character of their own suburbs. The Prime Minister should now honour the clear will of the people of Constantia and allow it to be open to all races as a first dramatic step in the normalisation of group relations in South Africa, he said. NEW TOP SADF OFFICERS--The Chief of the Defence Force, General Constand Viljoen, has announced promotions for three senior officers. Brigadier Hercules Dawid Viljoen has been made major-general and appointed Inspector-General of the SADF from December 1. Brigadier Frans Engelbertus van den Berg also becomes a major-general and General Officer Commanding Northern Transvaal Command. Brigadier Hercules Gerhardus du Plessis becomes major-general and chief of air staff logistics--the latter appointments from January 1. Brigadier Viljoen has for the past year led a programme to rationalise the SADF in line with the Government's decision to make the public service more effective. His primary task will be to assist the Chief of the Defence Force in administration. Brigadier Van den Berg, Officer Commanding the Army Combat School, succeeds Major-General P.M. Hanekom, who has been transferred to the staff of the Chief of the SADF. Brigadier Du Plessis, SAAF director of electrotechnical engineering, succeeds Major-General D.J. van Niekerk who has been appointed chief director (logistical support) on the staff of the Chief of the Defence force. ANGRY PM CASTIGATES WHITES

[Text]

THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said yesterday he had at last become quite convinced that Zimbabwean whites had not changed their racial attitudes.

Addressing one of his biggest rallies since independence at Rimuka Stadium, Gatooma, late yesterday afternoon, the Prime Minister said whites had failed or refused to recognise that the worker was the most important person in Zimbabwe.

Pointing out that all riches came from the worker, Mr Mugabe said farmers, mine and factory owners, businessmen and managers had never tried to see the fact their expensive cars and posh houses had all come from their workers.

In a voice hoarse with indignation the Prime Minister said: "It is the blood and sweat of the workers that has made these people millionaires.

"They have sucked the blood of their workers like vampires so that they could board expensive aeroplanes and go on long holidays."

From now on, he said, employers must start respecting their workers — they must be treated in accordance with our policies.

When we put the minimum wage at [words indistinct] those who were earning more to be brought down to $85 as well. That is what employers are doing.

"We said workers must elect workers' committees to represent their interests.

"But on mines, farms, factories and other businesses, workers' committees are being rejected or appointed by the management. What kind of workers' committees are those?"

Referring to managers and foremen who scolded and beat up workers, the Prime Minister also said he had heard that there are still many whites who continued to address their employees as "kaffirs".

Angry, he declared: "From today I give you my permission to hit every one who calls you kaffir. But don't go beating the innocent ones, only those who ill-treat you.

Earlier at Llangula Mine, Mr Mugabe took the management to task for its ill-treatment of black workers. He demanded to see and talk to the mine management after the rally there.

Mr Mugabe was greeted at Rimuka by a cheering and chanting, but orderly, crowd of about 40 000, the biggest since the start of his meet-the-people tours of the country's provinces.

Earlier, when the crowd was waiting for Mr Mugabe the Deputy Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Enos Chikowore, told ZANU (PF) youths in the crowd to go into Rimuka to see those who had not come to the rally.

"When you see them, do what we in ZANU do. Then we shall see them coming to report what has been done to them. Take down their names and bring them to us in Salisbury so that we know who they are."

Mr Chikowore said that by Christmas and New Year ZANU (PF) would have destroyed "stooges Nhomo, Muzorewa, Sithole and Chirau".

"We have put all portraits of former white oppressors in their own museum. By New Year we shall have prepared a library for the portraits of the four stooges so that whoever wants to see them can go there."

There were low rumbles of disapproval from the crowd. A man in a shed prepared for VIPs said the deputy minister was exciting hatred and disunity.

APPRENTICES WILL BE BONDED TO MINISTRY

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

ALL apprentices will be bonded to the Ministry of Manpower Planning and Development and will have to work in Zimbabwe after qualifying, for the same number of years they trained, the minister, Dr Frederick Shava, said yesterday.

"The conditions of the bond will be clearly stated," he told a Press conference in Salisbury, "and anyone who fails to sign the bond will have his contract cancelled.

"My ministry will do everything possible to ensure the employer gets a replacement in whom he can have faith to plan his business comfortably for expansion."

All apprentices being trained now would have to sign the bond, as would all new apprentices. New contracts would be registered only after the bond was signed.

The minister said the continuing racial imbalance in apprenticeship training had to end.

Zimbabwe was acting as a technical college for the rest of the world, including countries who were her avowed enemies. He produced figures showing correlations between the number of emigrants in each skill and the number of apprenticeships terminated.

Most contracts were cancelled because apprentices were emigrating, with unsuitability being the second criterion.

The ministry had no wish to discourage people who had loyalties elsewhere from emigrating, but it did want the limited local training facilities used for the benefit of employers and industry as a whole.

"It is high time that those who have a commitment elsewhere paid for our continued generosity.

But the minister also promised to aid employers taken for a ride by apprentices unilaterally cancelling their contracts or absconding.

MUGABE REASSURES COOPERATING FARMERS ON GOVERNMENT'S ROLE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] Karoi--The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, told farmers in Lomagundi yesterday the Government will not interfere with those who comply with its socialist principles.

It would continue to pursue socialist policies although it took note of the realities of the situation it had inherited, he said.

"We build our socialism not on the basis of destroying the economic infrastructure that we inherited, but by preserving that infrastructure."

Addressing more than 230 commercial farmers from the Lomagundi area at the Karoi Country Club, he praised them for their work and pledged continued Government support in their efforts to increase the country's agricultural output.

But he told them he had received more complaints from the workers about the farmers than anyone else during his tour.

They ranged from ill-treatment of farm workers, the circumvention of the Minimum Wages Act, poor working conditions and insults.

Reconciliation

"You get things like: 'This farm does not belong to Mugabe; I am prime minister here; Zimbabwe is yours; we are in Rhodesia'.

"I do not understand it when we are pursuing a policy of national reconciliation.

"In some cases there are reports of assaults on workers and I am just wondering what is happening in Karoi," Mr Mugabe said.

He said about 250 families had been evicted from a vacant farm by a white farmer next to it. They were now living somewhere in Karoi as refugees.

Mr Mugabe told the meeting: "We said vacant farms will constitute land that Government will acquire and that is the land we are going for at the moment."

The Government was committed to the policy of reconciliation and while it recognised that adjustments of attitude took time, there should be a process to indicate that something was happening.

The Prime Minister disclosed that the country would soon receive locomotives from Brazil and that more were expected in April or May next year.

The beef shortage was not because of transport problems but because of the cattle population and foot-and-mouth disease.

Earlier Mr Mugabe told a mass rally at Karoi Stadium that he had received reports of white farmers in the Lomagundi area who had not changed their "baaskap" mentality and continued to insult the Government through their workers.

"We now have the country and they must not think that because they produce crops nothing can be done to them. We can feed ourselves. Those who do not want can go. We can farm and train our own people.

"We are now in the process of setting up a new minimum wage. We are looking at workers as a whole. When we come up with the new minimum wage it will also include pensions, leave and pay equality for women workers.

"That the white man gets more, and the black man less, for the same job must go."

GOVERNMENT IMPOSITION PRICE CONTROLS IMPENDING

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Nov 81 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE introduction of more effective price control has come a step nearer with the announcement that the Ministry of Trade and Commerce will soon overhaul the legislation to give it more teeth, and increase the number of inspectors.

What the Government is able to do to enforce fair play over prices can only be welcomed by both wage and salary earners who find it more difficult to make ends meet as the weeks go by.

The Government's intention to increase minimum wages must not be accompanied by higher prices all round, although to the extent that wages form part of production costs some rise in prices may be justified.

Price control also must apply only to maximum prices — let there be free competition by manufacturers and retailers to bring their prices down when they can.

It is questionable whether sufficient attention is being paid to the packaging of many commodities available in Zimbabwe.

Why should a man's shirt, for example, contain a sheet of cardboard, collar stiffeners, studs and pins in addition to being wrapped in a plastic bag? Why should the contents of a box or carton not fill it, particularly when both are mass-produced and of standard mass? Why in some cases should the container appear to be worth more than the product it contains?

These and similar questions receive the constant attention of the Consumer Council. But a stronger arm than this is apparently needed to have a lasting effect on the problem. It is one the Government should tackle in conjunction with price control, to reduce both costs and waste.

FOREIGN BID TO BLOCK MINERAL MARKETING REPORTED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 8 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

FOREIGN governments have tried to put pressure on the Ministry of Mines to scrap plans to take over the selling of the nation's minerals.

"They didn't just want us to modify the plans — they wanted us to drop them altogether," disclosed the ministry secretary, Mr Christopher Ushewokunze.

"The foreign governments were those with interests in our mines," he added, but refused to name them.

"That wouldn't be right," he said.

The Mineral Marketing Corporation will be set up next year after a Bill has gone through Parliament. All minerals—which bring in hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign currency — will then be sold by the State-run body. At present selling is carried out by the private companies.

Mr Ushewokunze said the Government had every right to control a natural resource as crucial as minerals.

"We must do what is in the interests of Zimbabwe and not foreign governments," he stressed.

"The corporation will help secure foreign investment and give Government confidence in those investors."

Another reason given for setting up the corporation is to stamp out alleged malpractices. Some mining firms have been accused of selling their minerals on the cheap to their overseas parent companies in a bid to get profits out of the country.

But Mr Ken van der Plank, chief executive of the Chamber of Mines, said this was incorrect.

"All figures are freely available," he added.

He claimed that taking over the selling of all minerals would drive away potential investors.

"We're not totally opposed to the corporation," said Mr van der Plank.

"We think it has a role to play to help smaller mine companies and to act as a monitor."

A mining expert said the greatest fear was that a State-run enterprise would be less efficient and go-ahead than the private sellers.

"The sellers are entrepreneurs best able to get top prices for minerals," he said.

"A Government body may be less adventurous and not get such good prices at a time when mining firms are being hit by spiralling costs and low rates."

CLOUD HANGS OVER BIG FURNITURE EXPORT ORDER

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Nov 81 p 1

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

ZIMBABWE is set to earn more than $500 000 in foreign currency in office furniture exports.

Sterling Furnishing Company, Belmont, has won an order to supply a firm in the Johannesburg area with furniture worth $100 000 a month for the next five months.

But there is a hitch.

General Manager Mr Brian Smith said yesterday that the cut in foreign exchange for material imports this quarter was "bad news" because he was running out of Danish hardware and Filipino veneers for the order.

"Work has started on the order in the hope that the Government's industrial import controller will soon give us approval for additional currency for materials," he said.

"It is a matter of urgency. Our existing material stocks will run out early next month and unless we get an allocation the company loses that part of the order it is unable to fill."

The order — enough to fill five double-rig lorries each month — generates additional foreign currency for Zimbabwe in the form of transport costs paid by the customer, based on 10 percent of the value of the furniture.

Mr Smith said they had fought for the order in a highly competitive market.

A spokesman for the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries said provided Sterling had a firm order, its import content of the exported product did not exceed 60 percent and the return of the payment did not exceed 12 weeks, they knew of no instances of the Government refusing currency allowance.

BRIEFS

CUBAN COOPERATION--Cuba is considering co-operating with Zimbabwe in the exchange of information and documentation, technical, research and training. In an interview yesterday in Salisbury, the director of the Africa, Middle East, and Asia division of the State Committee for Economic Co-operation, Mr Ramon Soto Recio, said Zimbabwe would become the 35th country to receive aid from Cuba. Mr Recio, who is leading a three-man mission to explore areas for economic co-operation, said he held talks with the ministers and officials of various ministries to draft an agreement and general conditions for future plans. To the Ministry of Education and Culture the mission submitted an offer for an education centre and to the Ministry of Youth, Sport and Recreation a sporting complex, he said. "After establishing diplomatic relations Zimbabwe and Cuba decided to put their economic cooperation on the same level with the political. "We have had great pressure and threats of intervention from the United States because of the aid to the Third World countries. Nevertheless, we will continue to assist the Third World countries," said Mr Recio. [Excerpt] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Nov 81 p 3]

SECONDARY DAY SCHOOLS--Bulawayo--The Government has budgeted $163 million to be spent on establishing rural day secondary schools within the next three or four years, the Minister of Education and Culture, Dr Dzingai Mutumbuka disclosed yesterday. Speaking at Umzingwane secondary school's prize-giving ceremony, the minister said it was hoped to put up as many as 1,000 schools. Once more secondary school places had been created, it was necessary to decide what the children should be taught. Dr Mutumbuka said he believed that theory and practice, carefully blended, should produce a well-balanced and useful citizen. "What I would therefore like to see is a comprehensive system of education where there is a harmonious balance between academic and technical training." Dr Mutumbuka said the Government was planning to establish A level schools throughout the country, including Fort Victoria, Sinoia, Marandellas and Que Que. As a start, Marlborough high school in Salisbury would be converted into an A level centre next year. Then a similar centre would be established in Bulawayo. "From 1982 selection for entry into A level will be carried out on a national basis--entirely on merit--and only the best students from O level irrespective of colour, creed or race will be selected." EGYPT TRAINS STAFF--Four Zimbabweans from the Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation are attending a training course for radio and television assistants in Egypt. The course comprises basic theory for about three or four months followed by a practical course of two to three months in studio operations and transmitting centres. SOVIET ENVOY--The Soviet Union is prepared to help in Zimbabwe's reconstruction, its ambassador in Salisbury, Mr Georgi Ter-Garaziants, said yesterday. So far nothing had been done because the Government had not requested aid from the USSR. He was speaking in an interview after the USSR Embassy celebrated the 64th anniversary of the October Revolution of 1917. "We have now settled down and are beginning to do our best to take part in development in this country," he said. This year the Soviet Union offered 100 scholarships for Zimbabweans to study there. Twenty-four left Salisbury in September. "These students will study engineering in building and mechanics. Next year a new batch of scholarships will be offered, on recommendations from the Ministry of Manpower Planning and Development, for students to study agriculture, animal husbandry and related subjects," Mr Ter-Garaziants said. His country had also begun contacts in the cultural field. "The Soviet people appreciate highly the independent foreign policy of Zimbabwe and the constructive contribution it makes to the struggle for peace and international security," he said. MEETINGS BAN--The Patriotic Front has appealed to the Government to re-examine the reinteroduction of the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act and the emergency regulations which restrict the holding of political meetings and processions. A statement by the party's executive secretary for information and publicity, Mr Mark Nziramasanga, said: "The two weeks within which the regulations have been in operation have seen enough opposition to warrant their removal from the statute books." It added that many recent political gatherings had taken place without any violence. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Nov 81 p 3]

ARMY INTEGRATION COMPLETE--Army commander Lieut.-General Rex Nhongo yesterday told undisciplined soldiers that they would be dismissed. "Don't misbehave," he said, after reviewing the passing out parade of the country's last integrated battalion. He also called for the army to be productive. "We must help grow maize," he added at Inkomo Barracks, near Salisbury. The ambitious integration programme, which was launched at the end of last year, is now complete. And many observers think it has been one of Zimbabwe's greatest success stories. [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 8 Nov 81 p 1]

EXPORT TIES--Zimbabwe's biggest tin-can export order since independence has been netted by Metal Box Limited, the firm said yesterday. Paint, polish and oil containers worth $61,000 will be exported to Malawi and bottletops worth $8,000 will be exported to Zambia. The marketing manager of the firm's packaging division, Mr Martin Webster, said the company had close ties with Malawi, and had a further $39,000 of orders awaiting confirmation. Malawi had great potential because of its closeness. This gave the company an edge over South African competition, he said. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Nov 81 p 1]

PETROL DELIVERIES--Petrol will now be delivered weekly to garages to prevent month-end shortages, Mr Dick Parry, past president of the Motor Trade Association, said yesterday. And garages have been asked by the Government to limit sales of petrol to $15 a customer. "It's a form of soft rationing to prevent rationing proper. If garages can limit their sales and motorists cut their journeys by a quarter, there will be plenty of petrol to go around," he said. The closure of some garages on Saturday was caused by the new weekly deliveries of a quarter of their monthly allocations. Last month's shortage was caused by panic buying. The new measures would help make the supply of petrol more even, said Mr Parry. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Nov 81 p 1]

GOLDEN AGE OF SENEGAMBIA CONSIDERED

London WEST AFRICA in English No 3351, 19 Oct 81 pp 2440-50

[Article by F.A. Evans]

[Text]

SENEGAL has helped to restore equilibrium in The Gambia and as we look forward to an era of peace, we may take a glance backward at Senegambia over the centuries. Was there ever a golden age when the people living between the Senegal and Gambia rivers enjoyed a long period of stability? Perhaps only in the first millenium A.D. amongst the population of the middle river northwards of Kaur and Kuntaur where they smelted iron, forged spears and tools, carved rocks and buried their dead in the megalithic stone circles which they erected round them. They had pursued their crafts and their hunting there for a thousand years, say from 176 B.C. to 1,000 A.D., to judge from the carbon 14 dates of material from the stone circles recently published in Research Memoire 91 of IFAN/DAKAR on the protohistory of these parts.* Their culture, their burial customs, possibly their religious beliefs, which preceded the arrival of Islam and of Christianity in the area by many years, seem to have spread out centrifugally from a point somewhere up the valleys north of the Gambia River to the fishermen on the coast, with their vast shell middens all the way from St. Louis to the Cassamance and to the riverine people inland along the banks of the Senegal River. They do not seem to have intermarried or made much impact on either, but there they lived in conditions stable enough to smelt iron from the outcrops of ferruginous sandstone up the three great valleys, the Bao Bolon, the Nianija Bolon and that of the tributaries Sandougou and Kuntouata.

This part of Africa was then coming out of the New Stone Age into the Iron Age and ocean going vessels had not yet penetrated the Gambia River. The great Mandingo kingdoms were not yet established along the river banks up to the Barrakunda falls, Niumi, Baddibu, Niani and Wuli on the north, Kombo, Foni, Kiang, Jarra, Niamina, Eropina, Jimara, Tomani and Kantora on the south. They were predominantly Mandingo and were ultimately to amalgamate as The Gambia.

Each age tends to look back on its predecessors thinking life was better then. But was it? Did stability and peace follow treaties, conventions and Acts of Parliament? Not in The Gambia.. A hundred years ago the boundaries of Senegal and Gambia were delineated by a Commission following the Anglo-French Convention of 1889. It did not prove to be the end of turmoil which had plagued the country for half a century of the Soninki-Marabout wars. Powerful bandits or war lords such as Fodi Kabba continued to disturb the peace and had to be suppressed by military campaigns, as in 1892 when Lance Corporal Gordon won the Victoria Cross in the process of protecting Major Madden, his commanding officer — the third V.C. ever won by an African.

Nor did the Ceded Mile Treaty 50 years earlier with Burungai Sonko, "King" of Niumi, usher in an era of peace for those seeking entry to the mouth of the Gambia River. Just the opposite: a bloody defeat was inflicted by the "King's" men at Esau on a party of soldiers, merchant seamen and Bathurst townspeople, who had crossed the river to try to restore peace in a rebellious situation that had arisen at Barra, guarding the river's northern entry point. Fearing an invasion across the river by the triumphant "King" of Niumi's men, urgent appeals were sent from Bathurst to Sierra Leone and Senegal. The French sent the man-of-war Bordelaise from Goree with Commandant Louvel to the rescue and he, with help from the militia in Bathhurst, bombarded the rebels' stronghold. Largely through his action peace was restored; the "King" made an abject apology and gave new guarantees of free passage to the river. Senegal had come to The Gambia's rescue in 1832, as Louvel Street in Banjul testifies to this day.

Perhaps a century earlier in 1765 when the Province of Senegambia was established by Act of the British Parliament peaceful trading relations should have replaced the rivalry and sporadic warfare of three centuries between British and French and before that with Dutch, Courlanders and Portuguese that had created turmoil for the inhabitants. No real stability had existed for long, since Cadamosto first landed at St. Andrews island, now James Island, in 1456. Certainly it was hardly a golden age in 1767, when Colonel O'Hara was Governor of Senegambia in St. Louis and Kunta Kintay was supposedly captured by his red coats at Juffure and shipped as a slave, on the Lord Ligonier to Annapolis!

Insights into burial customs

It is with relief that we turn back from the pages of history to the legendary times of the Ghana and Mali empires; and before that to the megalithic period of Senegambia of which we have no record but the stones — and now Memoire 91. Here at last is assembled all the previous records of research in Senegal and The Gambia brought into perspective by the findings of the authors, who have devoted over seven years, including 14 months out in the field, on excavations in the megalithic area. The Memoire by any standards is a monument of the archaeologist's skill and painstaking deduction.

What makes it fascinating to the ordinary reader, apart from the carbon 14 dates, which for the first time shed chronological light on the megalithic builders, is the insights into their burial customs deduced from the skeletons now brought to light with infinite care, and the artist's drawings of how the bodies would have appeared at the moment of burial. The Memoire is lavishly supported by pictures, drawings, diagrams and statistics, which are lighted up by some original research, for example on the teeth of some of the megalithic people, which M. Khayat, a dental surgeon examines, showing how they filed the top incisors in various ways, seemingly as part of initiation rites and not unlike the practice still adopted in some remote parts of The Gambia today. A first glance at the Memoirs impresses the reader with the wealth of evidence of how these people of the first millenium lived — and died. In many circles, an older person was buried at the centre with a younger one on the periphery. In others there are groups of bodies, sometimes in a circular setting, as though laid in a pit within the circle, men, women and children. With them are found primitive spear heads, copper and brass bangles, anklets and even toe rings, with beads of a vanished era. In one there is the skeleton of a dog, perhaps the huntsman's faithful friend? And not a few of the skeletons must have originally been in a sitting position, as though taking a seat for a journey to the next world?

The Institut Fondamental at Dakar is lucky indeed to have professors and technicians, both Senegalese, French, Belgian and others to unearth such valuable materials for its museums. It would be a happy outcome, if from the present period of Senegal/Gambian co-assistance, Banjul's Museum would profit from this latest research and put on show some of the evidence of the Senegambia past. Hopefully, too, young Gambian students may be able to learn from the Institut at Dakar the archaeological skills, which they in their turn may devote to the stone circles at Wassu and Ker Batch. Senegal has much to offer The Gambia, apart from its soldiers, to promote pride in the Senegambian past.

DEVELOPMENT CAMPAIGN LAUNCHED ON ANNIVERSARY

AB111257 Luanda ANGOP in Portuguese 1000 GMT 11 Nov 81

[Text] Luanda, 10 Nov (ANGOP)--The sixth anniversary of the independence of the People's Republic of Angola, which is to be celebrated on 11 November, coincides with the launching by the competent party and government departments of a vast campaign on the fundamental guidelines for the social development of the country during the 5-year period 1981-1985.

These guidelines, laid down by the party's extraordinary congress of December 1980, will be discussed in roundtable talks presided over by members of the secretariat of the party's central committee, ministers, vice ministers, secretaries and state and national directors. About 30 sessions will be held in 15 and 1/2 weeks.

The aim of this campaign is to introduce the issues relating to the approved guidelines and take stock of what has been done during the first 6 months of the 1981 plan--the first part of the 5-year plan--since its implementation is a reflection of the importance attached to improving the economic situation.

According to Roberto de Almeida, the party official in charge of economic and social policy, the major principle upon which the country's development for this decade is based is the consolidation of the socialist policy with a view to eliminating economic backwardness and dependence.

In the short run within the 5-year 1981-1985 period, the party recommends speeding up economic development through a balanced policy aimed at correcting some of the economic problems inherited from the colonial period through the planned and massive training of manpower.

In a talk last week, Roberto de Almeida indicated that one of the tasks of the 5-year plan is also to establish an appropriate correlation between consumption and supply, while referring to the need for the country to create financial reserves so that it can cope in future with situations emerging from investments.

On the other hand, the party underlines the need to develop the farmlands within the next few years so as to reduce the gap and help the country to become self-sufficient in most of the essential commodities that it now imports.

The marketing of industrial products in the rural areas appears, in this context, as an example to be followed of trade between the city and the countryside. This procedure, which was already tested last year, will be developed to promote the organization of cooperatives.

As regards the development of the material [word indistinct], improvements in quality and quantity of production have been determined for the industrial sector with a view to reducing the enormous import bill.

The economic authorities further underscore the urgent need for stricter enforcement of the austerity policy which means, as far as investments are concerned, control over expenditures. Furthermore, as pointed out by Roberto de Almeida, special attention should be given to improving and managing corporations.

In brief, in the next 5 years, the principle of the development policy expressed at the first party congress will be maintained; agriculture is the basis and industry the decisive factor for the country's economic takeoff.

ANGOP INTERVIEWS ANTI-APARTHEID FIGURE

AN131300 Luanda ANGOP in Portuguese 0940 GMT 13 Nov 81

[Text] Luanda, 12 Nov (ANGOP)--On Thursday, Silas Cerqueira, executive secretary of the international committee against apartheid, severely criticized the economic, military and nuclear cooperation existing between Tel Aviv and Pretoria and supported by the U.S. administration.

In an interview with ANGOP, Cerqueira said that while South Africa is trying to create a sort of separatist enclave in the South of Angola with a veiw to delaying the independence of Namibia and destabilizing the frontline states, the government of Israel is continuing its acts of aggression against Southern Lebanon and independent Arab states.

Silas Cerqueira, member of the international secretariat of solidarity with the Arab people and their main cause--Palestine, came to Angola to discuss with the Angolan authorities preparations for the Afro-Arab solidarity conference which will be held in Luanda from 6 to 9 December. Cerqueira is also leader of the Portuguese council of peace and cooperation.

The Afro-Arab solidarity conference, he said, already promises to be a major international historic event at the political level. For the first time, prominent leaders and personalities. Representatives of national forces, parties, mass organizations, freedom movements and peace and solidarity committees of the African continent and the Arab world are going to meet together in mutual anti-imperialist solidarity and hold a direct dialogue.

Cerqueira recalled that several previous government attempts at Afro-Arab cooperation had failed.

He said that the present international situation is characterized by growing aggressiveness in the face of American imperialism.

The acts of aggression and all the maneuvers of the Pretoria regime, he continued, are aimed at undermining Angola's independence and sovereignty and destabilizing the People's Republic of Angola because of its socialist option and its firm policy of unwavering solidarity with the world's progressive revolutionary forces. Angola, he added, is the center of gravity of any international activity against imperialism in Southern Africa.

At a time when the Reagan Administration is also threatening the peoples of Europe and the world with the mysterious prospect of a limited nuclear war, the Luanda conference is going to endeavour to strengthen and expand the common front of all the peoples of the world in the struggle for peace.

The meeting will try to define, for the first time, a joint program for the African and Arab national movements, parties and forces to safeguard and consolidate national independence and peace.

Silas Cerqueira said that the discussions will focus on the total liberation of Southern Africa and the Middle East--Namibia, South Africa and Palestine--and cooperation between the African and Arab peoples.

The Luanda conference is the outcome of a program of action adopted in Lisbon in November 1979 at the conference of solidarity with the Arab people and their main cause--Palestine.

Two meetings were held, in Tripoli and Lisbon, within the framework of the preparations. Last August a mission from the Arab people's international secretariat, led by its chairman, (Omar al-Hamidi), finalized arrangements for the holding of the conference with the Angolan authorities.

However, this is not just another routine meeting but a dynamic international political event of prime importance which will pave the way for a new stage of cooperation and mutual solidarity among the peoples of the two regions and for the expansion and strengthening of the anti-imperialist world front for peace, Silas Cerqueira concluded.

MPLA YOUTH SEND MESSAGE TO CUBAN COUNTERPARTS

AB121200 Luanda ANGOP in Portugese 0925 GMT 12 Nov 81

[Text] Luanda, 11 Nov (ANGOP)--In a message to the Cuban youth, the first congress of the MPLA youth wing, held in Luanda from 7 to 10 November, strongly condemns all the plots of American imperialism against Cuba and demands a rapid end to such provocations as well as the immediate withdrawal of the yankees from the Guanatanmo base which they occupy.

In the text, the first congress of the Angolan youth expressed its trust in Commander in Chief Fidel Castro for his enlightened leadership over the destiny of Cuba and for the victory of socialism. The MPLA youth wing supports the legitimate struggle of the heroic and militant people of Cuba to defend their territorial integrity and national sovereignty, the message added.

The message went on to say that the participants give their unconditional support to the commitment by the Angolan youths studying in Cuba that in the event of an attack against that country, they will all fight shoulder to shoulder with the Cuban youths to defend Marti's motherland.

The message further stressed that the decision by the Reagan Administration to manufacture neutron bombs and install new medium-range nuclear weapons in West Europe, the deterioration in the Middle East situation, the annulment of the Clark Amendment, and U.S. interference in the internal affairs of other countries have been strongly denounced not only by the socialist countries and the communist movement but also by all democratic and progressive forces in the imperialist countries themselves.

The first congress of the MPLA youth was particularly concerned over the imminent threat of a military aggression by American imperialism against the first free country of America, the Republic of Cuba, the message stated, while adding that the congress was held at a time when world peace is at stake and international tension is worsening.

The message alleged that the increase in tension is the result of the belligerent policy of international imperialism, headed by the United States, whereby the Reagan Administration further the interests of big business and yankee industrial and military monopoly.

COMMENTS ON AFRICAN TOUR OF CONTACT GROUP

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 28 Oct 81 p 14

[Article by Achille Lollo: "Namibia: Constitutional Principles Debated in 'Top Secret' Atmosphere"]

[Text] The major debate of this week in Africa, and also in major capitalist nations, is the Namibian question and its resolution which, in principle, should respect what the UN Security Council decided in adopting Resolution 435, in which SWAPO is recognized as the sole representative of the Namibian people and hence fully entitled to govern that territory which racist South Africa continues to occupy illegally.

But, in fact, the principles of Resolution 435 did not go beyond good intentions, while the Western nations, especially the United States, aided and permitted the Pretoria government to continue its illegal occupation.

The Contact Group once again visited various African countries, including Angola, for discussions of the Namibia question.

The most inconsistent person on this committee is the U.S. representative, Chester Crocker, who, returning from his first visit to Africa and during a stopover in Morocco (a country that provides aid for the UNITA puppets), termed the continual diplomatic meetings of the delegates of the five Western nations "a useless diplomatic charade."

Maybe Chester Crocker does not like to travel to Africa and talk with African leaders whose positions are quite distant from U.S. policy. Certainly, no one gave him the right to judge what the other countries of the Contact Group consider necessary for Namibia. On the other hand, the reality of U.S. policy has shown that the diplomatic charade of the U.S. representative is, in fact, useless, since he, as well as the nation he represents, does not want to be realistic and objective with the people of Namibia, who only want to decide their own fate and be governed by their legitimate representative, the SWAPO.

In this context, the meeting today in the airport was an occasion to compare what the Reagan administration declares against SWAPO every day and what he, Chester Crocker, intends to propose to the members of the Contact Group, as it is not an accident that he himself met in Zurich with the South Africa representative on 20 September.

Being aware of Crocker's talkative manner, he was the first one we addressed, despite the "top secret" atmosphere prevailing in the Fourth of February Airport "VIP" lounge. It didn't do much good because, after having been asked what was new about this trip of his, Chester Crocker limited himself to saying "...well, there are new questions to discuss, but the representative of the French delegation will review the situation."

Shortly thereafter Jean Ausseil, French representative, began to say: "The foreign affairs ministers of the Contact Group, after our New York meeting on 24 September, decided that talks about constitutional principles for the constituent assembly, the timetable for applying Security Council Resolution 435 and a meeting about all outstanding problems will be held with all interested parties...," adding that: "...Talks with the RPA [People's Republic of Angola] president and Foreign Affairs Minister Paulo Jorge and with the SWAPO delegation as well, conducted by President Sam Nujoma, were very useful because they helped us advance toward the negotiated settlement we all seek for Namibia."

At the end of his short speech, Jean Ausseil stressed that "we are leaving Luanda with a better understanding that will assist our efforts to solve the problem that still remains: prompt implementation of Resolution 435." Finally, addressing himself to the Angola Government and the SWAPO, the French representative thanked them for their hospitality, stressing that "...we hope and desire that the support of the RPA Government and of the SWAPO for our efforts to reach a solution will continue."

So far statements by representatives of the Contact Group indicate that, in general, they intend to concern themselves only with constitutional aspects of Namibia's future, without considering them within the current context of southern Africa. That is, as if Namibia were a territory that a colonizing power had abandoned and the only problem to be solved by the United Nations would be to decide what kind of government it should have and with what kind of organization.

But it happens that Namibia continues to be occupied illegally, that the Pretoria army in the north of Namibia is expanding its military operations against the SWAPO, with almost 15,000 men. At the same time it is seen that one of the parties which will have something to say about the constitutional principles for the constituent assembly, namely South Africa, at this moment and for almost 64 days is and has been invading the sovereign territory of another party, the RPA. And, paradoxically, as if nothing had happened in Cunene, Angola is to sit down at the same table with the RSA [Republic os South Africa] to work out the constitutional future of Namibia.

As a matter of fact, the invasion of Cunene, which is a region as big as the state of Pennsylvania, is not unrelated to the Namibian context. This is because the South African invasion of Cunene represents an instrument to delay application of Resolution 435 in Namibia. It is, moreover, one of the maneuvers used by South Africa to revise Security Council Resolution 435 and, along with it, all the constitutional principles under discussion.

Based upon the context suggested by Angolan and Namibian reality, we asked the Contact Group spokesman, French representative Jean Ausseil: "Do the current problems related to Resolution 435 also include analysis of the South African invasion of southern Angola? Furthermore, doesn't the Contact Group think the current South African military offensive against the RPA and Namibia is being used by the Pretoria government to create pressure for revising the timetable for applying Security Council Resolution 435...?"

Our question was eluded in a very curt manner: "The purpose of our visit is related strictly to problems of constitutional principles; furthermore, our conversations were of a confidential nature and it is practically impossible for me to add anything more to what has been said in that respect. Thank you..."

In this brusque manner and without a specific reply the press conference ended, which logically, for our part, could not have been otherwise, since the only parties favoring diplomatic development of the Contact Group's work are essentially the Angola Government and the SWAPO, which at present are the principal victims of the racist Pretoria government's political and military aggressions.

ALL-OUT MEDIA CAMPAIGN ON DEVELOPMENT GOALS BEGINS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 28 Oct 81 p 3

[Excerpts] An extensive campaign in Angola to provide information about the basic guidelines for economic and social development in the 1981-85 period and also the 1981 National Plan and their respective achievements during the first 6 months of this year will begin on 31 October.

The campaign, which was decided upon by the Secretariat of the MPLA-Labor Party Central Committee, will comprise a series of speeches and panel discussions led by Central Committee members, cabinet ministers, deputy ministers and national directors. There will be approximately 30 sessions over a period of 15 and 1/2 weeks. Each session will be broadcast twice a week by all the nation's media. At the end of each topic, there will be a special session for replies to questions and concerns expressed by the listeners.

The sessions will appear on television every Wednesday and Saturday in a special program after the evening news. Angola National Radio will report them on Tuesdays and Thursdays on the program "Good-night, Angola." They will be printed in full in the Tuesday and Friday JORNAL DE ANGOLA and in the NOVEMBER magazine.

Specialized magazines will also reproduce in full all speeches and panel discussions related to their specific activity.

The official Angolan news agency, besides news coverage of the whole campaign, will also publish a series of special press bulletins dedicated to each session.

Simultaneous with this information, through the media, the basic guidelines for economic and social development in 1981-85 will also be studied in rank-and-file units of the MPLA-Labor Party and in business enterprises.

These guidelines, it will be recalled, were adopted during the first MPLA-Labor Party congress, held in Luanda during December 1980.

They cover all sectors connected with producing goods (agriculture, livestock and forestry, manufacturing industry, petroleum, electrical energy, geology and mining industry, fishing, construction, transportation, postal and telecommunications services, hydrometeorology and geophysics), as well as the social situation of the people (domestic trade, education and training, culture, health, welfare and social security, physical culture and sports, housing and community services).

They will also include the following fields: improving management of the economy, efficient use of manpower and improvement of workers' skills, international economic relations and foreign trade, justice and the work of the courts, and the party's role in managing economic and social change on the road to socialism.

The basic purpose of these economic and social guidelines is to speed up the pace of economic development, increase production efficiency and assure more rational and balanced solution of short- and long-term problems while at the same time improving living conditions of the Angolan people.

During the media campaign that will begin 31 October, the people will be called upon to participate actively, expressing their concerns, asking for explainations and raising questions through the media.

It is thus hoped that, thanks to this enormous popular mobilization, it is possible to create a clear and solid economic awareness so the complex problems which the nation faces, inherited mainly from colonialism, can be solved in short order.

COMMENTARY EXAMINES CANCUN CONFERENCE PROSPECTS

AB231507 Yaounde Domestic Service in French 1900 GMT 22 Oct 81

[Commentary by Joseph Makenzie]

[Text] The dialogue of the deaf between rich and poor countries has resumed. It is taking place in Cancun, Mexico. What is it all about? Globally, the poor countries continue to get poorer while the rich get richer. Today, the poor number about 800 million people and they are only asking the rich to create a new relationship which will finally enable them to become equal and respected partners. Nothing more! For the rich countries, these are excessive demands, but can aspiring for dignity and freedom be excessive? It appears to me that there are some who are quite satisfied with this endless dependence and this chronic underdevelopment which create a master-slave relationship. We are demanding, for example, honest prices for our raw materials, prices which will enable us to pull through. But the rich prefer buying them at very low prices and to later give us charity. And what sort of charity? The aid of the industrialized countries expressed in the percentage of their gross national product has decreased since 20 years ago and the present international economic crisis makes any rapid increase of this aid quite improbable. To compensate for this decrease in assistance, the Third World countries, whose debts amount to about $500 billion--that is about 125,000 billion CFA francs--continue to borrow from the foreign banks.

But these loans, which are already too heavy to pay back, are getting more and more expensive because the interest rates of the big banks are getting higher and higher. Moreover, one only lends to the rich. In the immediate future, therefore, something like a planetary new deal will be necessary, otherwise the number of bankrupt Third World countries will increase again.

But can anything be done in Cancun? Ronald Reagan does not want this sort of marshall or planetary plan which does not take ideologies into account and which would profit the Soviets, who are noted for their absence from such meetings. But even if Ronald Reagan has indicated that he will moderate his position, it is no pessimism to affirm that Cancun will only be a stage among many others in this dialogue of the deaf in which the north and south are engaged. It is not pessimism. No! The present world situation is simply less favorable than it was 20 years ago. For example, let us say frankly that Cancun came a bit too late. But perhaps you would tell me that it is better late than never.

'TRIBUNE' COMMENTS ON CHAD WITHDRAWAL REQUEST

AB311257 Paris AFP in French 1156 GMT 31 Oct 81

[Text] Yaounde, 31 Oct (AFP)--The withdrawal of Libyan soldiers from Chad formally demanded by President Goukouni Oueddei does not necessarily mean the end of difficulties; on the contrary it can bring about serious antagonism in Africa, the national daily, CAMEROON TRIBUNE, estimates in a commentary on Saturday.

The implementation of the Lagos accord of 21 August 1979 between the parties in conflict in Chad has, up to now, been very difficult, the CAMEROON TRIBUNE recalls. Many differences have appeared since French President Mitterrand rekindled this more than a year old African-initiated idea of sending a neutral pan-African force to Chad.

The Lagos accord clearly states that countries with common borders with Chad should not participate in the neutral force, the paper stresses. For this reason, Cameroon, which has a common border of several hundred kilometers on the north-east with Chad, has refused to send troops to Chad. But it is surprising to note, the CAMEROON TRIBUNE states, that some countries bordering Chad have announced their intention to send military contingents to Ndjamena after the departure of Libyan units despite the provisions of the accord drawn up in Lagos.

The paper particularly refers to Nigeria and Senegal, which showed their readiness to provide soldiers for the peace force in Chad as soon as Tripoli begins evacuating its army.

The actual stationing of the neutral force could also pose a problem, the CAMEROON TRIBUNE states. Who will lodge, (?transport) and equip the thousands of soldiers making up the force, it asks. Certainly France has already indicated that it was ready to participate materially and financially in this operation. But will it accept being the sole bearer of all the expenses which will be incurred?

Observers recall that Cameroon has always expressed its scepticism about the OAU's ability to restore a lasting peace in Chad. The head of state, Ahmadou Ahidjo, has always advocated the direct intervention of the United Nations in Chad, the only body which he believes can act efficiently through its material means. Gabon's President Omar Bongo, on his part, also recently adopted the same viewpoint by asking for the stationing of a UN force in Chad.

HEADS OF CHAD PEACE-KEEPING COUNTRIES TO MEET

AB161649 Paris AFP in French 1552 GMT 16 Nov 81

[Text] Lagos, 16 Nov (AFP)--The heads of state of the six countries which are to form the inter-African force in Chad are to meet in Kinshasa on Thursday or Friday, it was learned from official sources in Lagos on Monday.

This meeting follows the one held in the Nigerian capital on Friday and which was attended by foreign affairs ministers of the countries involved in the formation of the neutral force.

The heads of state are to examine the report by 14 officers of the neutral force. These officers left Lagos for Ndjamena on Monday. They were mandated by the ministerial meeting to go to Chad and examine the situation, then later report to their heads of state who will decide on the sending of troops.

Official sources pointed out on Monday in Lagos that no Nigerian soldier--contrary to Zaire's unilateral decision--would leave for Chad before this summit is held. It is unlikely, it was also learned, that President Shagari of Nigeria will travel to Kinshasa.

According to diplomatic sources in Lagos, Nigeria handed over to ambassadors of four countries (FRG, United States, France and Great Britain) a list of equipment the Nigerian contingent would (?require) within the framework of the inter-African force.

The list was reported to include categories such as weaponry and transport vehicles.

The Nigerian side does not, however, hide the urgency it is giving to this operation [words indistinct].

"Some people are not treating the matter with the urgency we would give it," an official spokesman of the presidency pointed out. We hope that the Lagos meeting (held on Friday) is the last. The Kinshasa meeting is not necessary, the spokesman added.

The countries involved are Benin, Guinea, Nigeria, Senegal and Zaire.

ABU SAEED BACKS NATION'S UNION WITH LIBYA

London AL-ZAHD AL-AKHBAR in English 30 Oct 81 p 6

[Interview with Mohammed Abu Saeed, founder of Frolinat and Interior Minister of Chad]

[Text] MOHAMMED ABU SAEED started the conversation by recalling that the historic relationship between his people and the people of the Libyan Jamahiriya is a very old and deeply rooted one. But beyond these historical ties, it was the present situation, and the future it heralded, which held the attention of the Minister of the Interior. He most forcefully insisted on the fact that 'the destiny of both our peoples will forever be a common destiny'. One of the main reasons for this common destiny is the existence of an identical revolutionary outlook on the problems of the world today:

Peace & stability

'We, as the leadership of the revolution, are determined to expose all plots and conspiracies fomented by the states and the agents which have fallen prey to imperialism. We are ready to and will sacrifice constantly until we will achieve our objectives. These are quite simply the realisation of peace, stability in our region and unity with our brothers and Libya. The wider aim is the liberation of all Africans who are labouring under the strictures of oppression and imperialism. It is therefore necessary to challenge with a strong African revolutionary will, all the powers of discrimination, racism, Zionism and imperialism.'

Abu Saeed went on to expound the necessity for the union with Chad and Libya and insisted that unity between the two peoples was 'one of the revolution's most serious tasks'. He said: 'It is not an easy task, but it is essential. Once achieved it will stand as a shining example of revolutionary will and success and the saving of the African continent from poverty, sickness, ignorance and imperialist encroachments such as foreign bases and multinational companies that exploit our lands and our people. It means a new life for the new free African individual and a blow against the forces of oppression.'

The unity between the two countries, the Chadian Minister of the Interior went on, was on the road to becoming a concrete reality. He pointed to the many efforts to achieve this noble aim and showed how the many meetings, at all levels, between Chad and Libya embodied the important steps already taken on the road to concretising the common goal.

Major conspiracy

Turning to the problems that his country is faced with at the present moment, and specifically to the internal military and security situation, Mohammed Abu Saeed made it clear that his country faced 'a major conspiracy fomented by the agents of imperialism'. Since Chad was liberated by the Frolinat and with the help of our Libyan friends, the Minister said, 'the imperialists have been busy trying to recruit those traitors who ran away and escaped from the people's justice'. It was clear to him that the aim of the imperialists was to halt the progress of the Chadian revolution by any means at their disposal, no matter how devious they may be. But, he suggested, 'with the help of the Libyan people and their revolutionary leader Muammar Qadhafi and through our unshakeable alliance, we will face and defeat all those rebels and agents of international imperialism, no matter where they are.'

The Chadian Minister went on to say that his government had accurate information which proved that Nimeiri was training and supporting those rebels inside Sudan. He also said that the ruler in Khartoum was doing this in close collaboration with the pro-Zionist regime in Cairo and under instructions from the United States. 'All this is being done in order to destabilise Chad, to prevent the success of our revolution, because such a success would act like a potent tonic to the oppressed people in Sudan and in Egypt and incite them to take the revolution into their hands and sweep away the puppet rulers in an unstoppable revolutionary tide.'

Immortal Alliance

Calling in the name of the people of Chad on their brothers and sisters in Sudan and in Egypt, he asked the latter to declare revolution and to reject and condemn the heinous crimes committed against the peaceful people of Chad. Only in this way could the whole region gain peace and stability and work together towards a new and free Africa, liberated from the shackles of imperialist intervention and hegemony.

Abu Saeed did not conceal the fact that all danger had not disappeared as far as Chad was concerned. He said that plots against the Chadian people were increasing, and that Nimeiri was especially to blame for this situation, although there were also dangers lurking elsewhere, such as on the borders with Central Africa.

Having examined all these imperialist threats he said: 'That is why we ask the Libyan leader, Muammar Qadhafi, and the Libyan Arab people to keep Libyan troops in Chad. We need their presence there until all danger to our revolution has receded and the enemies of the revolution are defeated. If the Libyan troops went home now, one can be sure that the virulence of the enemies' plots and attacks would only increase.'

The Chadian Minister also explained that the western powers have to realise that any power which objects to African freedom and to the people of Africa choosing their own way, is automatically an enemy of Chad — and that such an attitude can only lead to collision.

Finally, Abu Saeed stressed that both Capitalism and Communism are enemies of Chad and the Chadian people, and that the popular revolution of Chad had chosen the Third Universal Theory as its guiding beacon. Therefore 'the alliance between Chad and the Libyan Jamahiriya is immortal'.

PRESIDENTIAL INTERVIEW WITH 'AFP' REPORTED

AB161212 Paris AFP in French 1654 GMT 15 Nov 81

[Text] Djibouti, 15 Nov (AFP)--President Hassan Gouled Aptidon, who arrived in Paris on Monday for an official visit, stated that his trip to France would allow him to have detailed discussions on some problems which had already been discussed during the France-Djibouti joint commission meeting held last month.

We are awaiting a more cordial and concrete answer from the French Socialist Party which has supported our independence and which has to contribute to our development, Mr Gouled explained during an interview with AFP. He is expected to have discussions with President Francois Mitterrand on Tuesday, as well as with Claude Cheyson, the minister of external relations.

We will also talk about the Indian Ocean, the Horn of Africa and the Middle East, he explained.

At the Franco-African summit, the Chadian problem was discussed at length. In Djibouti we have our own economic and social problems which must be discussed. The Cancun North-South summit yielded no concrete results, and we have to continue negotiations, the president of Djibouti continued.

France, which has approximately 4,000 soldiers in Djibouti--at the entrance to the strait of Bab el Mandeb lying between the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden--is our largest donator. It is followed by Saudi Arabia and the UAE. We are not after permanent subsidies, President Gouled asserted; we need productive grants and technical assistance.

Since October, the tiny republic which is 4 years old has had a one-party government, the People's Rally for Progress [RPP], thus confirming a [word indistinct] situation.

Industrialized countries have difficulties coping with 36 parties, so Djibouti, which is walking the tightrope in order to maintain a precarious equilibrium in this troubled region of the Horn of Africa, cannot afford to have 36 parties, President Gouled said. The one-party system is a temporary necessity in order to maintain stability and to secure the confidence of investors, but this is a temporary situation until further notice, Mr Gouled added.

At the beginning of August a group of opponents tried to establish a Djibouti People's Party (PPD). A dozen people, including two former prime ministers, Ahmed Dini and Abdallah Kamil, were arrested. Six of them, including Mr Kamil, were released in October. The others are still in detention.

The investigation is going on, the president said. If we find that no foreign country is involved and that these were mere pretensions, they will be released. We are trying to ease the situation.

The RPP is open to those who were released, he affirmed.

The first legislative elections will take place next spring, about 30 to 40 days before the dissolution of the National Assembly whose term expires on 8 May and the RPP will be the only party authorized to draw up a single list of the 65 candidates who will be elected at the national level and not by regions.

The parliamentarians have to understand that they do not represent an enthnic group or a region but the whole population. These elections will constitute the second phase of the building of national unity.

Djibouti's population, about 450,000 people including the refugees from neighboring countries, is made up mostly of the Issa of Somali origin and of a small group of the Afar (from Ethiopia).

These new measures should avoid the risk of fighting, the creation of constituencies based on ethnic affiliations, and make each of the elected aware that he does not represent a fraction of the people but the whole nation, the president stated. Following the same objectives, last month the assembly adopted a third bill defining Djibouti citizenship in order to form a more exact image of national collectivity so as to avoid the influx of Ethiopians, Arabs, and Somalis who change their nationality when they change countries.

ECONOMY NOT YET ON SOUND FOOTING

London WEST AFRICA in English No 3352, 26 Oct 81 pp 2503-04

[Article by David N'dfiang: "Equatorial Guinea: the Visitor's Nightmare"]

[Text]

MORE THAN TWO YEARS after the bloody coup which overthrew Macias Nguema's decade of dictatorial reign in Equatorial Guinea, events unfolding themselves from that former Spanish colony are still not altogether promising. Life in the island of Malabo and the entire country is still a nightmare to visitors, despite promises made by the new regime and the Supreme Military Council headed by strongman Lt.-Col. Obiang Nguema Mbasogo.

Since the military coup on August 3, 1979, there have been many visits to foreign countries, including neighbouring states like Cameroon, Gabon and Nigeria, by members of the ruling SMC, sometimes including the new Head of State, Lt.-Col. Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, soliciting for aid for the country.

Recently I took off from Douala in a Cameroon Air Force Plane to Malabo, capital of Equatorial Guinea, to assess what progress has been going on in that country for the past two years.

We landed at the Malabo air port, which is still partially overgrown with grass and trees. The airport is being reconstructed and only the Cameroon Airlines, Iberia and some Spanish Air Force planes based in Douala use the airport. It is a problem for the visitor to go from the airport to the centre of Malabo town. Taxi services do not exist in Malabo or Bata. From the airport one begins to notice some of the abandoned coffee and cocoa plantations overtaken by the forest.

Some of the hotels which are being reactivated still do not have water or electricity. Radio Malabo and the Television are sometimes off the air because of a shortage of spares, I was told. Abandoned cars can be seen on most of the streets, again because of lack of spares. A few aged Spaniards can be noticed in Malabo and Bata on the mainland who heeded the government's call to return to the country and rehabilitate their plantations.

It should be noted that a few months after the overthrow of Macias Nguema's dictatorship and in December, 1979, the Spanish Transport Minister, Senor Sanchez Teran, led a delegation to Malabo to discuss technical co-operation and a joint commission was set up. During the meeting the Mbasogo Government announced plans to enable Spanish settlers whose lands had been expropriated to recover them on payment of maintenance tax. The settlers were required to submit investment plans and claim their land before February last year. Up to now not many of the settlers have responded positively to the call. The Mbasogo Government has since coming to power done everything to reinforce its traditional links with Spain and the Spanish influence in the country is gradually gaining ground. King Juan Carlos and Queen Sophia of Spain, after an official visit to Cameroon late in 1979, also visited Equatorial Guinea to reinforce the new entente between the two countries.

Joint commissions and bilateral accords have been signed between the Mbasogo Government and Cameroon and Gabon but nothing concrete has yet materialised out of such commissions. The Equatorial Guinean refugees still in Madrid have still not recognised the Mbasogo Government and still look at it as a cosmetic change. They still pose a threat and an opposition to the present regime.

The economy of the present regime is not yet on sound footing. The currency fluctuates and Ekudes are sold in open markets in Malabo, mostly by the Nigerians who have voluntarily returned to the island and now dominate the local markets both in Malabo and Bata. Life is still far from being luxurious in the entire country, especially in Malabo. The present leadership of the government is haunted by the Macias Nguema ghost. Sundays are specially set apart to celebrate on the streets of Malabo the fall of arch-dictator Macias Nguema.

Recent events on the island shows the instability of the Mbasogo Government and the Head of State's distrust in the Moroccan soldiers who have been his personal bodyguard. After the recent attempted coup it was alleged more than 60 to 180 people had been arrested, for plotting against the government.

The authorities in Equatorial Guinea recently banned the sales of three Spanish newspapers in the country for publishing what they called tendentious and subversive articles. The ban was lifted after only six weeks, maybe on pressure from Spain. The exiled opposition group has also recently been regrouping in some parts of the country, which disturbs the present government.

A delegation led by the Spanish Inspector-General of National Police, General-Saenz de Santamaria, last month visited Malabo and held discussions with the High Command of Equatorial Guinea on the training of at least two Guinean companies in Spain and the sending of Spanish instructors to the country to train the police and the army. At the heart of the five-day negotiations was the need to ensure the political stability of Equatorial Guinea to enable the country to achieve social harmony and economic recovery.

Both Cameroon and Gabon have cooperated with the present government for repatriating the hundreds and thousands of Guinean refugees in both countries and reports from Nigeria say that some Nigerians who left the country have now sneaked back illegally into the country, though the Nigerian Federal Government has not yet renewed its long-standing labour regulations with Equatorial Guinea.

The telecommunications infrastructure in Malabo is not efficient and foreign correspondents are often forced to return to Douala in order to file in their reports. Some diplomats from the mainland and island often come shopping weekly in Douala, especially to buy essential spare parts for their cars.

BRIEFS

SPANISH TREATY--A draft five-year friendship and cooperation treaty with Equatorial Guinea has been approved by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Spanish Parliament's lower house. The draft provides for Spain to grant emergency food, health and education aid, and for a joint commission to study how to make bilateral cooperation more efficient. An emergency credit of 131M. pesetas (about L700,000) was set aside for Equatorial Guinea in the Spanish draft budget for 1982 presented to parliament. Under a security agreement signed recently (WEST AFRICA, October 5), two companies of Guinean security forces will be trained in Spain and return home under the command of Spanish officers. Other Spanish advisers are to train the entire Guinean army. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 26 Oct 81 p 2543]

SPANISH TRADE DELEGATION--An important government delegation from Spain, headed by Agustin [name indistinct], secretary of state for trade arrived yesterday in our capital on an Iberia plane. The Spanish delegation, which will be in our country for several days and will hold talks with Equatorial Guinean officials, was received at the international airport by Commissioner of State of the Ministry of Finance and Trade Marcos Mba Ndong, the permanent secretary of the same department, the governor of the Bank of Equatorial Guinea, the Spanish ambassador to our country and several other personalities. ETHIO-SOVIET COOPERATION COMMITTEE MEETS

[Text] Addis Ababa (ENA)--The Third Session of the Inter-Governmental Ethio-Soviet Commission For Economic, Scientific and Technical Cooperation and Trade opened yesterday at the National Revolutionary Development Campaign and Central Planning Supreme Council (NRDC-CPSC).
